THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH...THE UNTOLD STORY OF CHRISTIAN ORIGINS

Disclaimer: It is important for the reader to understand that in this website, where we look into how the Essenes deviated from normative Jewish religious beliefs and inserted "literalized Sun-worship" into the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures which later become the foundation for all later Christian Bibles, that I will use a "literal-historical" approach to the "Jesus Story". If you have studied and ran across some of our other websites then you know that "the Christ" can be interpreted from 3 different perspectives down through recorded history: "mystical", "mythological", and "literal-historical". Only after one has spent a considerable time in dedicated and scholarly studies in such areas as Biblical Judaism, the Jewish Messiah and true Messianic prophecy as taken from the Hebrew Scriptures and not the later forged texts of Rome, comparative manuscript evidences, the history and origin of the Roman New Testament, the true origin and creation of the New Testament , the Gnostic Paul vs the falsified Roman Paul, the Essenes and their "literal godman", Ancient Wisdom literature, Jewish and Gentile Gnosticism, Egyptian religion and the ancient "Jesus Story" that beings with Ancient Egypt, Comparative religions, Astronomy and Astrotheology can he understand and be certain which two of the above three methods of interpretation of "the Christ" are accurate and factual. Again for purposes of comparing Judaism's truths vs Christianity's alterations of it over the early centuries and the implications that this holds for the "non-Jew" and "Godfearer" today then we adopt in this website and for all studies in this website a supposed "literal-historical" interpretation of "the Christ" as well as the Jesus of the New Testament. Only in so doing can we adequately contrast the truths of Judaism vs Christian theology and by so doing follow the lineage of these "Divine Truths" back down the corridors of history to the earliest Divine revelations given to mankind by the Creator which were intended for both "Gentiles" and "Jews" as well. You will, in time, come to see how the Jewish human Messiah becomes the Cosmic Godman of Christian theology. You will see how that from the beginning of time that the "allegorical" understanding of the Descent of the Soul, God, into all matter was later manipulated and this "linking" agent, God's Christ within all mankind, became "literalized" and confined to just one person, this supposed "historical and literal" Jesus of the New Testament. I will let you be the judge of the results of such studies and leave to the reader to draw the necessary conclusions as we attempt to compare Jewish and Christian theological perspectives concerning this "Christ" and the Jewish Messiah all the while dealing with the "New Testament Jesus" in a "literal-historical" manner in order for such an accurate comparison to be done effectively. Craig Lyons M.Div.

There is now a bibliography of more than 1,500 books and articles dealing with the Dead Sea Scrolls as well as hundreds of web-sites, all written since their amazing discovery in 1947. One may well ask, therefore, why another web-site detailing the rise and evolution of the Essene/Qumran cult as a religious cult should be necessary. There is, however, two pertinent answers to that question:

- It is from Essene religious thought that Gentile Christianity would draw most of it's religious doctrines...be they right or wrong...your intense study will show you which ones as it did me
- And the "traditional origin" of Christianity is completely different from what most have been told from the Catholic and Protestant perspective through a "received tradition"...it is time to reconsider if what we have been taught as "Christians" as a Divine and unique revelation can be proven to find its origin in the re-filtered "literalized" Sun-Worship of the Essenes which was later incorporated into their "Christology" concerning their expected "Godman" redeemer in their purposeful mistranslation of the Hebrew Scriptures into the Greek...this theology of the "Essene Angel Messiah" (a "literalized" rendition of a prior "allegorical" cosmic godman/"allegorical" always in Gnosticism of the "god" (Christ) in all of created mankind) will become much later the foundation for Christian beliefs concerning a supposed "historical" Jesus (Christology) and other doctrines concerning atonement which are also connected to him by these Essenes which find again their origin in a deviate "literalized" solar and astral worship....again beginning with the allegorical understanding of the Osiris of Egypt and flowing on down through history even unto this day in the disguise of a "literalized" and "historicized" Gentile Christianity.

Answer for yourself: What must we not miss here?

Simply that when you do the studies, like our "Egyptian-Cx" website and our "Jesus-Astrotheology" website and our "Gnosticism website" then you find that the Ancients, long prior to these 2nd century B.C.E. Essenes, really since the beginning of recorded time, possessed an Ancient Divine Wisdom of a highly metaphysical nature that was given to them by God, our Creator, whereby mankind was able to spiritually understand from the observation of the path of the Sun in the Heavens, a "Sun" by the way which was always only a "symbol" for the Invisible Divine Intelligent Energy, Architect, and Creator of this Universe, had sent Himself and emanated Himself into all "matter", including all flesh. This websites are not intended to be tackled now; they must wait for the reader to build a foundation in what happened that causes us to lose these earlier Divine Truths so wait until you find your study of this website before you tackle these other websites. This Descent of the Soul into all mankind was understood and described by the agency of personification, allegory, myth, and legends which were handed down with mankind in every nation under the Sun for thousands and thousands of years as "the Christ". Man was "created" in this image of God and "the Christ within" was the bridge from God to mankind. All mankind, both male and female, were the true "godmen" and the "Christ" lived in each of them waiting to be "awakened" by the Spiritual enlightenment of each "host". This is the core of all Divine Revelation until the 3rd century B.C.E. when Rome will follow this "Essene theology" and "literalize" this "Christ within" and confine Him to just "one person" in the form of an assumed "historical Jesus of Nazareth". This explains why all the previous "godmen" stories as taken from all previous Gentile nations since the foundation of the world have their "godmen" myths and legends that parallel so accurately with the "Jesus Story" from beginning to end. Our "Jesus Story" is but a "literalized" and "carnalized" version of this "Descent of the Soul" into physical matter; namely mankind. Never until the Essenes of the 2nd century B.C.E. and later with Rome in the 3rd century A.D. was this high Spiritual Revelation of God's descent into matter, this giving of matter "life", called a "death" on a cross (a cross being the intersection of the planes of matter and spirit/energy) "historicized" and "carnalized" into a supposed "historical and literal" godman whom the Esseses first taught as their hoped for retuning redeemer who was their "historical Teacher of Righteousness" who would later be killed. Later this same idea will be picked up by Rome in their religious and political expediency in the 3rd century when they adopt this "literalized" godman centered Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire under Constantine. Since Rome had "literal" godmen as Emperors on the throne this was but one small step in their world domination. These facts will become very clear to you as your studies advance and you see the hundreds and hundreds of parallels between the "Jesus Story" and the prior story of the Ancient's "sungods" beginning all the way back with Osiris and Horus, the original "godman" prototypes and coming down through history until the Essenes and later Rome. Let us come to understand and never forget from our accurate studies that ALL these "godmen" were but symbols for all mankind, a pattern or sorts, for their spiritual development of their souls from its birth in mankind, its life and spiritual development and maturation, its eventual release from this body of death at the demise of the physical body and its rebirth and ascent back to the realm of Heaven from which it came.

IT IS NOT AS SIMPLE AS YOU POSSIBLY THOUGHT...

This will not be an easy or a quick study I promise you; but one needs the facts to be CERTAIN that what he has accepted through tradition as his inherited religious belief system based off of a "literalized" godman is wrong before he should change it and repent of now recognized FALSE BELIEFS.

There are many reasons why we don't have the truth today as Christians and followers of this "Jesus" and "the Christ" . As far as our study here let it be simply said that in studying the origins of Christianity as it relates to the Essenes and the bridge from Judaism to Christianity most writers and scholars today have relied too heavily upon the summary comments of Josephus, Philo, and Pliny for their information about the Essenes. For that reason they have gravely misunderstood the Essenes and their role in determining Christian religious doctrine. The vast majority of the writers and scholars seem to approach the Essenes using the accounts of Josephus, Philo, and Pliny primarily as the substrate for their background information for the Essenes, all the while neglecting the internal evidence of the Essene documents which sheds great light as to their true identity and evolutionary "theological" development as a separatist religious sect over three hundred years. I wish it were as simple as reading a few pages left to us by these three men and their summary accounts of the Essenes but it is not.

This web-site will reveal to you what many others have either missed or chosen not to reveal due to the explosive nature of the materials that exists and their implications for Christianity today. But it won't be easy to see this for much time and effort must be devoted by you to cover the materials in question in order to see for yourself the facts concerning the gross departure from the "faith once given the saints" over 2000 years ago as practiced by the historical Jesus which sadly passes as Christianity today.

WHAT MOST HAVE MISSED WHEN STUDYING THE ESSENE/QUMRAN CULT...THE ORIGIN FOR ESSENE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

There are several things I desire to accomplish for the reader who undertakes a serious study of the materials presented in this web site:

- Few, if any writers, to the best of my knowledge, have endeavored to trace the religious evolution of the Essenes as a religious movement from their pristine, pre-Chasidic beginnings as a Zadokite reaction against Hellenization among the Jews, into the frozen, rigid, secret, and celibate communist mystery-cult which had grown in the first century to reject Biblical Judaism almost in toto as we find in the days of Philo and Josephus. Thus the need to reevaluate the summary accounts of Josephus, Philo, and Pliny as their descriptions of the Essenes fail to give the reader the whole picture needed to properly understand the Essene/Qumran movement and their religious beliefs that go much deeper than the simple accounts left to us by these three historians. Few writers have undertaken to systematically lay out before the reader the chronological and systematic evolution of the Essenes over a three hundred year period whereby they are shown correctly in their historical light. We will reveal, in these pages to the reader, how the Essenes, in their rejection of Judaism and the Temple, would absorb religious tenants originally from Zoroastrianism and later from Greek-mystery sources, particularly Pythagoreanism. On the outside the Essenes might have looked Jewish, but on the inside when their writings are examined and correctly understood they can be shown to betray an anti-Jewish theological bias and it becomes evident that they as a group evolved to reject Judaism in toto; and except for certain Buddhist accretions, the early pristine church reproduced the Essene pattern faithfully. Since, however, this form of "Christianity" was unacceptable in the pagan world and since it was spurned by the majority of the Jews, it was Hellenized in the Pauline epistles and the Fourth Gospel, both of which reflect Stoic influence; these eventually became an essential foundation for that reconstruction or restitution of Christianity known as the Protestant Reformation.

- Few Scholars yet have made the connection of Essene religious beliefs with Sun-Worship. The vast majority of scholars who have studied the Essenes have failed to recognize the Essene/Qumran cult's reliance upon astronomy and astrology, along with the religious beliefs of the mystery cults, for the core of Essene religious dogmas and beliefs. The failure to recognize the Essene religious cult's heavy dependence upon a "literalized" Sun-Worship and a "literalized" approach to Egyptian religion has unfortunately given a false validity to the Essene-Christian faith. In the website and pages that follow I plan to correct this grievous error of omission and make available to our reader the hidden truths in this regard; namely, revealing how the core of Essene religious beliefs are nothing more than the synthesis of the major doctrines of Sun-Worship and Astro-Theology which finds is basis in Osiris and the Egyptian religion of antiquity.

- To few scholars fail to pay attention to the Book of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and their importance in the evolution and synthesis of the core religious beliefs of the Essene community. Few writers have properly analyzed The Testaments and especially the interpolations found in them, which the majority of scholars to this day incorrectly consider Christian forgeries, although these supposed and alleged Christian "interpolations," when properly understood in their historical context, exhibit every evidence of true Essene origin and are themselves, when properly understood, reflective of accepted Essene Christological and Messianic theology and a window to the pre-existing Essene Messianic faith. Far too often many authors, when reading or writing of this material, are accustomed to call such “Essene Messianic Prophecy” little more than Christian interpolations or alterations of Essene writings. In this website I will prove to you that this is not the case as all; in fact these "Essene” Christological Beliefs" are to find their origin in Sun-Worship and can be traced down through the paths of prior non-Jewish religious beliefs; ultimately finding their expression as Essene religious tenants which provided the foundation for the vast majority of Christian Messianic dogma to follow. Let us not forget that these "Essenic Christological Beliefs," which would later become the very backbone of Christian dogma, can be proven to have originated in Sun-Worship and this will be proven in the pages that follow. One only need read the Catholic Encyclopedia and their information on the Essenes to begin to see what the scholars have known all along...that the Essenes were involved in religious manifestations of Sun-Worship! The NIV Bible makes the same admission.

- Also, few have ever given adequate consideration to the implications of the Pandera-Yeshu legend in relation to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness. Sadly this blasphemous story is applied to Jesus when, upon examination of facts and evidence existing, will show that the account was originally applied to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness and not Jesus. Only later, in the Jewish reaction to the Jesus Movement, would the story be applied to Jesus to discredit him.

- Few writers and scholars have seriously considered the significance of the Ebionite cult and its evident relationship to Essenism.

- Fewer scholar still have noticed, or examined in detail, the influence of these Essenes on the corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when they were translated into Greek. We will show the reader how important "theological changes and deviations" from the accepted Jewish texts were made by the Essenes of Egypt in the translation of the Jewish Scriptures....called the Septuagint. The reader will come to see, once acquainted with the "Osirian myth," how such personified Sun-Worship was cleverly inserted into the mouths of the Prophets by the Essene sect in Egypt. Important for our understanding is that these "changes" in support of Essene religious doctrines will become the foundational texts for all Christian Old Testaments. Moreover, as if that was not enough, all quotes from the Old Testament contained in the New Testament come from this "corrupted " translation of the Jewish Scriptures. This means that the New Testament applies to the life of Jesus religious beliefs and doctrines that find their origin in pagan Sun-Worship! The startling conclusion is inescapable: a false "literalized" approach to ancient religious Divine Revelation and prior "allegorically" interpreted religious doctrines since the foundation of recorded time, revelations expressing this Descent of the Karast, Christ into mankind (matter), were inserted into the Greek translation of the prior Hebrew and Jewish Scriptures by these Essenes and these Essene "literalized" sun-myths would be the source for the Essene's beliefs in their Godman soter/Savior/Angel-Messiah. These doctrines will later be applied to this New Testament "Joshua-Jesus" by the same group in Palestine; thereby making this Jesus a "literalized sacrificial Godman" as well. These Scriptural alterations will then be examined and evaluated on an individual textual basis with hundreds of examples whereby the reader can see for himself the alterations of the Jewish Scriptures whereby doctrines of a "literalized" Sun-worship were added to the texts and inserted into the mouths of the Prophets by the translators in Egypt.

We propose to examine all these problems and offer a realistic analysis. Most of the voluminous material found in the Dead Sea caves today is available for inspection; therefore we are today able, with substantial accuracy, to delineate the origin, evolution, discipline, doctrines, practices, rituals, and basic purposes of the Essene cult during the successive stages of its existence and how such practices and religious beliefs, many of which are nothing more than personified and "literalized" Sun-Worship, would become the basis of the vast majority of Christian dogma that we have today attached to this "Jesus". I hope you understand, especially if you hold to standard Christian dogma, the implication of such sad fact! I as an ordained Pastor surely do and this plus other things led to my resignation from my Pastorate once coming to the knowledge of the truth and the corruption of the Hebrew Sacred Texts and how these "corruptions" became the foundation for New Testament "theology".

Nevertheless, we believe that the reading public, interested students, and especially university, college, and seminary teachers of comparative religion are now ready for a more complete delineation of the Essene cult in its historical setting and progression. We have available to us today a wealth of good materials by which we can learn the truth about the Essenes and the truth about Christian origins. We at Bet Emet Ministries wish to re-create the living image of these fervent ascetics; analyze their driving forces; and explore the processes by which they formulated the ideology and the practice which gave them their extraordinary power.

BUT BEFORE WE BEGIN....QUESTION: WHY IS THE CORRECT UNDERSTANDING OF CHRISTIAN ORIGINS SO IMPORTANT?

It goes without saying that if you are a Christian you should want to know the truth about this "Jesus" and "the Christ". I do! Having been a pastor for over 15 years, in the early years of my pastorate I tried to relate to others what I was taught by my spiritual leaders which was the "accepted" truth about Jesus. Just a few years into my pastorate, using the skills learned at Seminary, I discovered that all was not well with what I had been taught nor with the documents I had been taught since a child were sacred and a unique and a Divine revelation. Intense study beyond my peers became my way of life and ultimately led to my resignation from the pastorate. Today, I try to reach more than I ever could reach through the church in hopes of sharing the truth behind the "religious traditions and myths" that have captured the imagination of millions. What is at stake is our relationship with God and our proper worship of Him. Obedience is better than sacrifice, the problem is that there are too many conflicting voices claiming to speak for God. The truth can be known but it comes with a price. You have the responsibility to read and study and verify if what I say is true or not. The following information is presented in hopes you will undertake a serious study of the materials presented whereby you can discern truth from error in your walk with God. Once you understand the pivotal position the Essenes had and their lasting legacy and their continued influence today as found in the Christian Church, then by understanding the origin for the Essene's changing religious beliefs then you are capable of making an intelligent decision as to whether such "religious beliefs" need be held any longer or if they need to be replaced with "truth" once you see it for yourself.

The necessary information is presented for your inspection in this web-site in hope you will acquaint yourself with such knowledge, information, and facts in order to assure your knowledge and worship of our Creator be in Spirit and in Truth.

JOSEPHUS AND HIS DESCRIPTION OF THE ESSENES

We turn now to Josephus, who was born about 37 A.D. and died about 100. He was a general in the Jewish army of insurrection during 68-69, but earned the clemency and favor of the Romans after he decided the war was hopeless. In his Life, he tells us that at the age of sixteen he became an Essene neophyte and dwelt for three years in the wilderness with a teacher named Banus, who bathed constantly in cold water to curb his libido, who, like John the Baptist, lived on uncooked food that grew wild, and who wore only such clothing as could be procured from trees. We conclude that this discipline lost its attraction, because presently Josephus joined the Pharisees, "which is of kin to the sect of the Stoics" (Josephus, Life, 2). Although he was never admitted to the inner circle of the Essenes, he certainly knew more about them than any other extant witness; and he has left us several descriptions of them. In Antiquities of the Jews, XVIII, I, 3-6, he declares:

The doctrines of the Essens this: That all things are best ascribed to God. They teach the immortality of souls, and esteem the rewards of righteousness are to be earnestly striven for; and when they send what they have dedicated to God into the temple, they do not offer sacrifices there, because they have more pure lustrations of their own; on which account they are excluded from the common court of the temple, but offer their sacrifices themselves; yet is their course of life better than that of other men; and they entirely addict themselves to husbandry. It also deserves our admiration, how much they exceed all other men that addict themselves to virtue This is demonstrated by that institution of theirs which will not suffer anything to hinder them from having all things in common, so that a rich man enjoys no more of his own wealth than he who hath nothing at all. There are about four thousand men that live in this way, and neither marry wives, nor are desirous to keep servants; as thinking the latter tempts men to be unjust, and the former gives the handle to domestic quarrels; but as they live by themselves, they minister to one another. They also appoint certain stewards to receive the incomes of their revenues, and of the fruits of the ground; such as are good men and priests, who are to get their corn and their food ready for them. They none of them differ from others of the Essenes in their way of living.

We find that the Essenes, like the Buddhists and the Pythagoreans, sought personal freedom and independence by rejecting marriage, together with all family ties and responsibilities; and they mortified "the body of this death," by renouncing sex-consummation, which has appeared to ascetics of all ages as the ultimate triumph over our lower nature.

The following is our most detailed account as taken from Josephus War of the Jews, II, vii, 2-13):

For there are three philosophical sects among the Jews . . . the third sect, which pretends to a severer discipline, are called Essens. These last are Jews by birth, and seem to have a greater affection for one another than the other sects have. These Essens reject pleasures as an evil, but esteem continence, and the conquest over our passions, to be virtue. They neglect wedlock, but choose out other persons children while they are pliable, and form them according to their own manners.

These men are despises of riches. . . Nor is there any one to be found among them who hath more than another; for it is a law among them that those who come to them must let what they have be common to the whole order, inasmuch that among them all there is no appearance of poverty, or excess of riches, but every ones possessions are intermingled with every others possession, and so there is, as it were, one patrimony among all the brethren.

They have no certain city, but many of them dwell in every city; and if any of their sect come from other places, what they have lies open to them, just as if it were their own, and they go into such as they never knew before, as if they had been ever so long acquainted with them. For which reason they carry nothing at all with them when they travel into remote parts, though still they take their weapons with them for fear of thieves. Accordingly, there is, in every city where they live, one appointed particularly to take care of strangers, and to provide garments and other necessaries for them...Nor do they allow of the change of garments or of shoes, till they be first entirely torn to pieces, or worn out by time. Nor do they either buy or sell anything to one another, but every one of them gives what he hath to him that wanteth it, and receives from him again in lieu of it what may be convenient for himself; and although there be no requital made, they are fully allowed to take what they want of whomsoever they please.

every one of them are sent away by their curators to exercise some of those arts wherein they are skilled, in which they labor with great diligence till the fifth hour. After which they assemble themselves together again into one place, and when they have clothed themselves in white veils, they then bathe their bodies in cold water. And after this purification is over, they every one meet together in an apartment of their own, into which it is not permitted to any of another sect to enter; while they go, after a pure manner, into the dining-room, as into a certain holy temple, and quietly set themselves down; upon which the baker lays them loaves in order; the cook also brings a single plate of one sort of food, and sets it before every one of them; but a priest says grace before meat, and it is unlawful for any one to taste of the food before grace be said. The same priest, when he hath dined, says grace again after meat, and when they begin, and when they end, they praise God, as he that bestows their food upon them; after which they lay aside their white garments, and betake themselves to their labours again till the evening.

And truly, as for other things, they do nothing but according to the injunctions of their curators; only these two things are done among them at every ones own free will, which are to assist those that want it and to show mercy; for they are permitted of their own accord to afford succour to such as deserve it, when they stand in need of it, and to bestow food on those that are in distress; but they cannot give anything to their kindred without the curators. They dispense their anger after a just manner, and restrain their passion. They are eminent for fidelity, and are the ministers of peace; whatsoever they say also is firmer than an oath; but swearing is avoided by them, and they esteem it worse than perjury; for they say that he who cannot be believed, without swearing by God, is already condemned. They also take great pains in studying the writings of the ancients, and choose out of them what is most for the advantage of their soul and body, and they inquire after such roots and medicinal stones as may cure their distempers.

But now, if any one hath a mind to come over to their sect, he is not immediately admitted, but he is prescribed the same method of living which they use for a year, while he continues excluded, and they give him also a small hatchet, and the forementioned girdle, and the white garment. And when he hath evidence, during that time, that he can observe their continence, he approaches nearer to their way of living, and is made a partaker of the waters of purification; yet is he not even now admitted to live with them; for after this demonstration of his fortitude, his temper is tried two more years, and if he appear to be worthy, they then admit him into their society. And before he is allowed to touch their common food, he is obliged to take tremendous oaths that, in the first place, he will exercise piety towards God; and then that he will observe justice towards men, and that he will do no harm to any one, either of his own accord or by the command of others; that he will always hate the wicked and be assistant to the righteous; that he will ever show fidelity to all men, and especially to those in authority; because no one obtains the government without Gods assistance; and that if he be in authority, he will at no time whatever abuse his authority, nor endeavour to outshine his subjects, either in his garments or any other finery; that he will be perpetually a lover of truth and propose to himself to reprove those that tell lies; that he will keep his hands clear from theft, and his soul from unlawful gains; and that be will neither conceal anything from those of his own sect, nor discover any of their doctrines to others, no, not though any one should compel him so to do at the hazard of his life. Moreover, he swears to communicate their doctrines to no one any otherwise than as he received them himself; that he will abstain from robbery, and will equally preserve the books belonging to their sect, and the names of the angels (or messengers). These are the oaths by which they secure their proselytes to themselves.

But for those that are caught in any heinous sins they cast them out of their society, and he who is thus separated from them does often die after a miserable manner; for as he is bound by the oath be hath taken, and by the customs he bath been engaged in, he is not at liberty to partake of that food that he meets with elsewhere, but is forced to eat grass, and to famish his body with hunger, till he perish

Moreover, they are stricter than any other of the Jews, in resting from their labour on the seventh day; for they not only get their food ready the day before, that they may not be obliged to kindle a fire on that day, but they will not remove any vessel out of its place, nor go to stool thereon. Nay, on other days . . . covering themselves round with their garment, that they may not affront the divine rays of light, they ease themselves. . .

Now after the time of their preparatory trial is over, they are parted into four classes; and so far are the juniors inferior to the seniors, that if the seniors should be touched by the juniors, they must wash themselves, as if they had intermixed themselves with the company of a foreigner. They are long-lived also, insomuch that many of them live above a hundred years, by means of the simplicity of their diet, nay, as I think, by means of the regular course of life they observe also. They contemn the miseries of life, and are above pain, by the generosity of their mind. And as for death, if it will be to their glory, they esteem it better than living always; and indeed our war with the Romans gave abundant evidence what great souls they had in their trials, wherein, although they were tortured and distorted, burnt and torn to pieces, and went through all kinds of instruments of torment that they might be forced either to blaspheme their legislator or to eat what was forbidden them, yet they could not be made to do either of them, nor once to flatter their tormentors, or to shed a tear; but they smiled in their very pains, and laughed those to scorn who inflicted the torments upon them, and resigned up their souls with great alacrity, as expecting to receive them again.

For their doctrine is this, that bodies are corruptible . . . but that the souls are immortal, and continue for ever and that they come out of the most subtile air, and are united to their bodies as to prisons, into which they are drawn by a certain natural enticement; but that when they are set free from the bond of the flesh, they then, as released from long bondage, rejoice and mount upward . . . and thence are those exhortations to virtue, and dehortations from wickedness collected, whereby good men are bettered in the conduct of their life by the hope they have of reward after their death, and whereby the vehement inclinations of bad men to vice are restrained, by the fear and expectation they are in, that although they should lie concealed in this life, they should suffer immortal punishment after their death. These are the divine doctrines of the Essens about the soul. which lay an unavoidable bait for such as have once had a taste of their philosophy.

There are also those among them who undertake to foretell things to come, by reading the holy books, and using several sorts of purifications.

Moreover, there is another order of Essenes, who agree with the rest as to their way of living, and customs, and laws, but differ from them in the point of marriage, as thinking that by not marrying they cut off the principal part of human life, which is the prospect of succession; nay rather, that if all men should be of the same opinion, the whole race of mankind would fail. . . . But they do not use to accompany with their wives when they are with child, as a demonstration that they do not marry out of regard to pleasure, but for the sake of posterity. .

SUMMARY

Instead of consuming the space necessary to analyze these quotations, we ask the reader to re-read and carefully consider every statement, for each is weighted with far-reaching implications. We proceed now to an analysis of several Essene documents, which corroborate fully the statements of Philo and Josephus, but which, in addition, reveal a great many facts and doctrines entirely unknown, or not attributed with assurance to the Essenes, before the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

PHILO'S DESCRIPTION OF THE ESSENES

It is indeed fortunate that we possess detailed descriptions of the Essenes from the pens of two great Jewish writers, Josephus and Philo Judaeus. The second of these was an Alexandrian, who made himself the master of Hellenic philosophy, especially that of Plato, Pythagoras, and the Stoics, and who had attempted a union of Greek metaphysics with Judaic theology. He it was who first gave the Logos doctrine, previously enunciated by Zeno, its final formulation. Since Philo was an earnest inquirer who lived a long life which ended about 40 A.D., he must have known intimately all the elements constituting Jewish life during the half century preceding his death. His testimony, therefore, must be accepted as authentic. We read that their leader had "trained to" community of living many thousands of disciples, who are called Essens, because of their holiness.

We are indebted to Eusebius Preparation For The Gospel, VIII, 8, for preserving for us passages from a lost work of Philo entitled Apology for the Jew where he states concerning the Essenes:

They dwell in many cities of Judaea and many villages, and in large and populous societies. . . . And their mode of life is our evidence of their liberty; none ventures to acquire any private property at all, no house or slave, or farm cattle, or any of the other things which procure or minister to wealth; but they deposit them all in public together, and enjoy the benefit of all in common. And they dwell together in one place, forming clubs and messes in companies, and they pass their whole time in managing every kind of business in the public good. But different members have different occupations, to which they strenuously devote themselves, and toil on with unwearied patience, making no excuses of cold or heat or any change of weather. .

Of the men, then, who thus differ in occupations, every one on receiving his wages gives them to one person who is the appointed steward: and he, on receiving them, immediately purchases the necessary provisions, and supplies abundance of food and other things of which mens life is in need. And they who live together and share the same table are content with the same things every day, being lovers of frugality . . Not only have they a common table, but also common raiment; for they are supplied in winter with thick coats, and in summer with cheap tunics, so that every one, who will, may easily take whichever he likes, since what belongs to one is considered to belong to all, and the property of all to be, on the other hand, the property of each one.

Moreover, if any of them should fall sick, he is medically treated out of the common resources. . . And so the old men if they happen to be childless, are wont to end their lives on a very happy and bright old age, inasmuch as they are blest with sons both many and good.

Further, then, as they saw with keen discernment the thing which alone, or most of all, was likely to dissolve their community, they repudiated marriage and also practiced continence in an eminent degree. For no Essene takes to himself a wife, because woman is immoderately selfish and jealous . . . For the man who is either ensnared by the charms of a wife, or induced by natural affection to make his children his first care, is no longer the same toward others, but has unconsciously become changed from a free man into a slave.

A second passage from Philos A Treatise to Prove That Every Man Who Is Virtuous Is Also Free, xiii, he provides us with complementary information:

There are . . . Essenes, in number something more than four thousand . . . not sacrificing living animals, but studying rather to preserve their minds in a state of holiness and purity. These men . . . not storing up treasures of silver and gold, nor acquiring vast sections of the earth out of a desire for ample revenues . . . are nevertheless accounted very rich, judging contentment and frugality to be great abundance, as in truth they are.

Among these men you will find no makers of arrows, or javelines, or swords, or helmets, or breastplates, or shields; no makers of arms or military engines; no one, in short, attending to any employment whatever connected with war, or even to any of those (ordinary) occupations even in peace which are easily perverted to wicked purposes; . . . they repudiate and keep aloof from everything which can possibly afford any inducement to covetousness; and there is not a single slave among them, but they are all free, aiding one another with a reciprocal interchange of good offices; and they condemn masters, not only as unjust, inasmuch as they corrupt the very principle of equality, but likewise as impious, because they destroy the ordinances of nature, which generated them all equally.

But in their view this natural relationship of all men to one another has been thrown into disorder by designing covetousness, continually wishing to surpass others in good fortune, and which has therefore engendered alienation instead of affection, and hatred instead of friendship; and leaving the logical part of philosophy . . . they devote all their attention to the moral part.

Now these laws they are taught at other times, indeed, but most especially on the seventh day, for the seventh day is accounted sacred, on which they abstain from all other employments . . . a great many precepts are delivered in enigmatical modes of expression, and allegorically

In the first place, then, there is no one who has a home so adequately his own private property, that it does not in some sense also belong to every one: for besides that they all dwell together in companies, the house is open to all those of the same notions, who come to them from other quarters; . . . and they cherish respect for their elders, and honour them and care for them, just as parents are honoured and cared for by their lawful children; being supported by them in all abundance both by their personal exertions, and by innumerable contrivances.

PLINY AND HIS DESCRIPTION OF THE ESSENES

"To the west (of the Dead Sea) the Essenes have put the necessary distance between themselves and the insalubrious shore. They are a people unique of its kind and admirable beyond all others in the whole world; without women and renouncing love entirely, without money and having for company only palm trees. Owing to the throng of newcomers, this people is daily reborn in equal number; indeed, those whom, wearied by the fluctuations of fortune, life leads to adopt their customs, stream in in great numbers. Thus, unbeleivable though this may seem, for thousands of centuries a people has existed which is eternal yet into which no one is born: so fruitful for them is the repentance which others feel for their past lives!" ESSENE PROCLAMATIONS OF THEIR "SAVIOR"

The Essenes, like most Jews, expected a Divine intervention in hopes of eradicating evil thereby preparing for the appearance of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth. Unlike the conservative Jews who expected a human Messiah as YHVH's representative, whom YHVH would work through to accomplish His purposes, the Essene theology accommodated a Godman whom they expected to appear in Jerusalem in the form of a man. Not only that, but the Essenes believed that this Godman would be an atoning sacrifice for the "elect;" for course that was them and those who agreed with their theology. This Godman was to be killed (crucified) and it was believed he rose from the dead and returned to Heaven and would one day return.

THE TEXTS

Enoch "Levi" 18"

The heavens shall be opened, and from the temple of glory shall the sanctification come upon Him with the Father's voice ... And the glory of the Most High shall be uttered over Him, and the spirit of understanding and of sanctification shall rest upon Him in the water..."

Enoch "Benjamin" 3

"In thee shall be fulfilled the prophecy of heaven concerning the Lamb of God, even the Saviour of the world, that spotless shall He be delivered up for transgressors, and sinless shall He be put to death for ungodly men in the blood of the covenant, for the salvation of the Gentiles and of Israel, and shall destroy Beliar, and them that serve him."

Enoch "Levi" 14

"I have learnt from the writing of Enoch that at the last ye will deal ungodly laying your hands upon the Lord in all malice. ... our Father Israel shall be pure from the ungodliness of the chief priests who shall lay their hands upon the Saviour of the world. . ."

Enoch "Benjamin" 9

"The Most High shall enter the front of the temple, and there shall the Lord be treated with outrage; and he shall be lifted up upon a tree . . . And He shall arise from the grave, and shall ascend from the earth into heaven: and I know how lowly he shall be on the earth, and how glorious in heaven."

Enoch "Asher" 7

"The Most High shall visit the earth; and He shall come as a man, with men eating and drinking. . . ."

Enoch "Levi" 16

"In perverseness ye will persecute righteous men...and the man who reneweth the law in the power of the Most High will ye call a deceiver; and at last, as ye suppose, ye will slay Him, not understanding his resurrection, wickedly taking upon your own heads the innocent blood. Because of Him shall your holy places be desolate. . . and. . . ye shall be among the Gentiles a curse and a dispersion, until He shall again look upon you and in pity shall take you to Himself through faith and water."

Judah" 23-24

"...whenever ye will return to the Lord with humility of heart, repenting and walking in all the commandments of God, then will the Lord visit you in mercy and in love, bringing you from out of the bondage of your enemies

"And after these things, shall a star arise to you from Jacob in peace, and a man shall arise from my seed, like the Sun of righteousness, walking with the Sons of men in meekness and righteousness, and no sin shall be found in Him. And the heavens shall be opened above Him, to shed forth the blessings of the Spirit from the Holy Father; and He shall shed forth a spirit of grace upon you, and ye shall be unto Him sons in truth, and ye shall walk in His commandments, the first and the last. This is the Branch of God Most High, and the well-spring unto life for all flesh. Then shall the sceptre of my kingdom shine forth, and from your root shall arise a stem; and in it shall arise a rod of righteousness to the Gentiles, to judge and to save all that call upon the Lord. Enoch "

Simeon" 6-7

"... the Lord God, the Mighty One of Israel, shall appear upon earth as a man, and save by Him Adam.. . . Then will I arise in joy, and will bless the Most High because of His marvellous works, because God hath taken a body and eaten with men and saved men.

"And now ... the Lord shall raise up from Levi as it were a Priest, and from Jacob as it were a King, God and man. So shall He save all the Gentiles and the race of Israel. Enoch "

ANALYSIS

To a traditional Christian this reads like the New Testament in many accounts. The theology is the same with only slight modifications. What we need to keep before us in our study is the fact that this was written about the Essene Teacher of Righteousness and not Jesus!

Many Christian scholars and writers, but not all of course, feel that such passages were later additions and alterations made to the Essene literature by an over zealous Christian writer who was in hopes of promoting his Christian beliefs and giving them a historical footing in antiquity by making it appear as if the Essenes had believed in "Jesus" or at least were expecting a similar "Jesus theology" when the Messiah appeared. Today, with the publication of the Dead Sea Scrolls which fill in the many blanks left by an incomplete analysis of the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, we now know for certain that the the above theological tenants were beliefs held by the Essenes about their Teacher of Righteousness and they have NO relevance to a historical Jesus who would come later.

WHAT WAS THE REAL ORIGIN OF AND TO WHOM WERE THE ESSENES APPLYING THE ABOVE CHRISTOLOGICAL PASSAGES?

Yet what is surprising and of which we must note is that this "same theology" was accepted by the later followers of Jesus and made to apply to him and has become the background for Christian theology today. We read such accounts today as if they were "prophetic" of Jesus all along never knowing that they were originally applied to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness and never meant by the original authors to apply to Jesus whom would come over 100 years later.

What must concern us in this web-site and the studies to be presented will concern the "origin" of these theological beliefs whereby the Essenes came to believe in a Godman whom they expected to appear in Jerusalem in the form of a man. Not only that, but equally we must be concerned as to the origin of the Essenes belief that this Godman would be an atoning sacrifice for the "elect;" as well as to the origin that this Godman was to be killed (crucified) along with the resultant belief that he would rise from the dead and return to Heaven only to one day return. If you have studied the website up to now then you should clearly see the Essene "Savior" is little more than the chronological continuation of the Osiris Pattern that has traveled down through recorded history and it is here, and here alone, that the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, draw their religious dogmas that provide for them the origin for the Essene Godman or Angel Messiah. It is Osiris all over again.

Answer for yourself: Is there the remotest possibility that the Essenes, having both lived in Egypt and having their own theological university and theological library in Alexandria, Egypt, have any connection to Osiris who also finds the origin of it's myth in Egypt as well? THINK!

It is to these issues we must continually turn our attention and this can only be done adequately through an in-depth study of the Essene-Christian Faith. I encourage you to study this website in-depth for such information.

THE ESSENES....AS TAKEN FROM THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

First, let us begin with a small commentary before we get to the article from the Catholic Encyclopedia.

The following exerpt is take from the Catholic Encyclopedia concerning the religious body called the "Essenes." What one is to take notice at this early stage of our study is the below notation in "red" signifying that there existed among the Essenes a strong link with Sun-worship which the Tanakh teaches us amounts to false worship and idolatry. Sadly it is this Essenic view of the Jewish Messiah as applied to Jesus we find in the writings comprising the New Testament which were later picked up by the Early Church Fathers which were taught by these Essenes in Alexandria, Egypt! One misses this fact concerning the Essenes when only reading Josephus, Pliny, and Philo who offer us so little about the Essenes. The key to understanding the Essenes and their religious doctrines and dogmas is this very fact so often overlooked by the vast majority of scholars today; namely, that the Essenes of the first century were a far-cry "theologically" from what they had been 200 years previously. No longer were they a separatist groups intent on purifying Judaism and restoring proper worship to the nation, but they had progressed and evolved away from such religious beliefs and had more in common with Sun-worship in the first century than normative Judaism.

ESSENES....AS TAKEN FROM THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

"One of three leading Jewish sects mentioned by Josephus as flourishing in the second century B.C., the others being the Pharisees and the Sadducees. Concerning their origin, history, and tenets there has been much inconclusive controversy. The only ancient authorities we have are a few paragraphs in Philo Judeaeus, a somewhat lengthier description in Josephus, and a scanty notice in Pliny. The following synopsis is derived mainly from the first two. They are styled Essæi by Philo, who derives it from hosios, "holy", and Essæi and Esseni by Josephus. Their numbers according to both authors was about 4000 and their chief place of residence along the west side, but away from the shore, of the Dead Sea. They also dwelt in other, but mostly secluded, parts and small towns of Palestine; yet some were found in cities. The sect arose about 150 B.C. (the first-named Essene is Judas, 110 B.C.) and disappeared towards the end of the first century A.D. They worshipped one God, Creator and Ruler of all things, omnipotent and omniscient. Moses was held in very high esteem and to blaspheme his name meant death. The sun was held in such reverence as to awaken a suspicion of idolatry. "

TIME FOR MORE COMMENTARY

It is important that we take not of what is recorded immediately above in the "red." Reference is made to the fact that the Essenes were involved in a type of idolatry that involved the sun. The reference to Sun-Worship is rather astounding as most current references to the Essenes omit this very important fact. Many of the doctrines espoused by the Essenes are taken only at face value and termed "Messianic" or "Christological" by those who fail to recognize the fact that such religious doctrines are little more than personification of Sun-Worship on behalf of the Essenes. Thankfully such critical understanding of the Essenes has not been overlooked by all and it is our intention at Bet Emet Ministries to help the typical believer and Christian become familiar with such information in hopes he can come to an adequate understanding of such idolatrous doctrines that pass today for Christian "orthodoxy." Now I continue with the Catholic Encyclopedia and their article on the Essenes.

"An all-disposing Fate was admitted, yet free will, apparently, was not denied. They refused to join in the Temple sacrifices through fear of pollution, though they sent gifts thither; it seems that no blood-sacrifice was offered by them, as they claimed that a reverent mind was the best offering to God. The Sabbath was observed with the most rigorous exactitude, not even the calls of nature being answered. Assembled in their meeting-places, where they sat according to seniority, the scripture was read and explained, generally in an allegorical manner, by some wise member. They washed frequently, as extreme importance was attached to ceremonial purity, and they followed scrupulously the prescriptions against Levitical defilements; even for a junior to touch a senior was pollution for the latter. What their esoteric doctrines were is not known. Death was welcomed, as they held "that their bodies were corruptible, and the matter composing them is not lasting, but souls are immortal and live forever, and proceeding from the most subtle ether having been drawn into bodies as into prisons by some natural longing. But when they are set free from the bonds of flesh, then they rejoice as being freed from a long servitude and mount upwards. And agreeing with the opinion of the Greeks they declare that the good dwell beyond the ocean in a place which is never oppressed by snow or rainstorms or intense heat, but is always calm and refreshed by a cool breeze breathing from the ocean. To bad souls they allot a gloomy, tempestuous cave full of never-ending torments" (Jos. Bell. Jud. I, ii, 8). Some conclude from the words just quoted that the Essenes disbelieved in the resurrection of the body.

Among the virtues the Essenes cultivated especially obedience, truthfulness, continence, justice, and temperance; they paid great attention to the sick, respect to the aged, and showed marked kindness and hospitality to strangers. All men were regarded as equal, and slavery was regarded as contrary to nature. Those guilty of great crimes were punished by long exclusion or complete excommunication which, since they were not allowed to eat anything prepared by outsiders, entailed always gat hardship and often death. Philosophy was rejected as useless and beyond man's capacity, but ethics was studied with zeal. They searched for medicinal remedies in nature, as they devoted special care to the sick irrespective of creed, and investigated the properties of minerals. They laid claim to magical powers and ability to predict. For the latter some cases are given by Josephus, among them that of the Essene, Manahem, who foretold Herod the Great's kingship when he was a boy without any royal prospects. All things were held in common, their very houses not being their own. The labored principally at agricultural pursuits or made farm implements or household articles, but never weapons of war, which they were not allowed to carry, except a staff for defense when travelling. Harvests and wages went to the stewards, who gave as each needed. Clothes and shoes were retained until worn out. No trading was allowed except barter. Anointing with oil was considered a defilement. Servants were forbidden as tempting men to injustice. their rulers or presidents were elected, likewise their priests -- if they can be so called -- and their stewards. In towns an officer was appointed to look after travelling brethren. One hundred members constituted a court of justice whose unanimous decision was irrevocable. The members were divided into four classes. The daily routine is given as follows: They were up before daybreak and spoke of no profane subject before the sun, and to it they addressed a prayer as if soliciting it to rise. Each was sent then to his appointed employment at which he worked until the fifth hour, i.e., eleven o'clock, when all assembled and having bathed in water specially exorcised, and clothed themselves in white, they entered the common dining room quietly and silently. Before each of them was placed some bread and a dish of one sort of food. A priest said grace and then, but not before, they might eat. At the end of the repast prayer was again said, their white garments laid aside, and resuming their ordinary attire they worked until evening, when the supped in the same manner. At the noonday meal, which was regarded apparently as a sacrificial feats, being prepared buy their priests, no stranger was admitted, but at supper it was otherwise. As they spoke only in turn and observed great moderation in food and drink, the silence at the meals appeared to outsiders, so we are told, something very solemn and mysterious. Many of the Essenes reached a great age and they acquired such fortitude of mind and body that the worst torments inflicted on them by the Romans failed to shake their constancy and they met death with a smile.

Most of the Essenes rejected marriage, not on account of any wrong in it but because they did not trust women and desired peace and harmony. They perpetuated their sect by adopting children and admitting adults who were "wearying of battling with the rough sea of life", as Pliny says. At their coming their received an apron to wear at their ablutions, a white garment, and a little spade-like instrument with which to dig a whole and cover their excrement from the rays of the sun. For one year their temperance was tested by observing outside the community its ascetic rules. Then came a fresh trial of two years, during which they shared in the lustral rites, but not in the meals, of the initiated. If found satisfactory they were chosen full members and bound themselves to fearful oaths to honor God, observe justice, to be loyal to all, but especially to those in authority, and if ever in authority themselves not to outshine others by dress, to love truth and honesty, to conceal nothing from their fellows, and to reveal nothing to strangers, also to keep secret at all costs their books and the names of their angels. This was the only time when Essenes took oaths, their word being regarded by all as so sacred that Herod excused them from the oath of allegiance. some of them observed the same rules yet married, but merely for the order's sake, and only after three year's probation and if the woman appeared healthy and likely to bear children.

The Essenes have received attention during the last three centuries out of all proportion to their numbers, their influence upon contemporary life, or their importance as factors in religious development. This sprang from two causes, one external and the other internal. The latter was the curious mixture of Jewish and foreign elements in their tenets and customs. This peculiarity aroused the curiosity and exercised the ingenuity of the learned to account for the combination. That the Essenes were really Jews, though speaking very likely Greek (Jews by race, says Josephus), is admitted. their belief in one God, reverence for one God, strict observance of the Sabbath, fanatic adherence to circumcision (Hippolytus), etc., all show this; while their attitude toward the sun, election of priests, mode of life, likened to the Pythagorean by Josephus himself, etc., seemed to show outside influence. The source of this influence, like everything Essenic, begets controversy, but so far no one has succeeded in determining it satisfactorily. Buddhism, Parseeism, Pythagoreanism (old, new, and Orphic) Hellenism, etc., have all had their claims put forth as one of the parents of this hybrid sect. Suffice it to say that Persian-Babylonian influence through the Captivity, and Hellenism filtering in through Alexandria and the use of the Greek tongue can amply account for foreign elements. The contention that their elements, if divested of their Greek appearance, could be proved top have their roots in Biblical ground is not lightly to be set aside. The External cause of attention was the bias of English deists and Continental Rationalists who strove to metamorphize the Essenes into predecessors from whom gradually and quite naturally Christians developed; and Freemasons pretended to find in Essenism pure Christianity. In reference to such chimeras it is enough to say that between Essenism and Christianity there are some points of resemblance; it could not very well be otherwise because Essenism was Judaic in its foundation and Christianity was not destructive but progressive. On the other hand, the differences are fundamental. That John the Baptist and Christ were Essenes are mere assumptions based on similarities which spring naturally and independently from asceticism and voluntary poverty. So likewise the vaunted dependence between Essenism and monasticism can be resolved into necessary traits of any ascetic, communistic life (see "Wuku" in "Studien u. Mittheilungen d. Ben. Cist. ordens", 1890, I 223-30; Berlière in "Revue Bénéd", 1891, VIII, 12-190). "The attitude of Jesus and his disciples is altogether anti-Essenic" (Jewish Encyc.). The strict silence about any Messiah is due partly perhaps to the secrecy of the Essenes and mainly no doubt to His rejection by their chronicler, Josephus. In fine, our present knowledge of the Essenes is slight and not at all trustworthy, as its sources as scanty, colored, and unreliable."

THE NIV BIBLE AND THEIR REFERENCE TO THE ESSENES AND THEIR SUN-WORSHIP

"The Essenes, the "pious ones," were a mysterious and solemn group who accounted for one of three leading Jewish sects which flourished in the second century B.C.E. There were about four thousand in number and they lived along the west side of the Dead Sea. The group arose around 150 B.C.E and disappeared towards the end of the first century. They worshipped one God and held great reverence for Moses, angels, and the sun. They lived and functioned as a community which emphasized working for the good of the entire people. The Essenes celebrated meals as a community and practiced some untraditional customs. These included their refusal to trade, the rejection of marriage, and silence during meals. Membership was contingent upon a three year period of trial and training which focused on the concepts of obedience and secrecy. Many scholars believe that the Essenes are associated with the Dead Sea Scrolls."

THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH...THE TRUE STORY OF CHRISTIAN ORIGINS..THE ARTICLES FOR STUDY

"A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change"...Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF THE ESSENES/QUMRAN CULT...& THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH...WHO WERE THEY REALLY?

Until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls we had only limited information concerning the Essenes and their religious belief system. Almost all scholars and historians were limited to three major pieces of information and the knowledge derived from them concerning these Essenes and their religious beliefs were quite limited as you will see after reading these three sources.

The Accurate Identification Of The Essenes...Looking At The Evidence

- Philo on the Essenes
- Josephus on the Essenes
- Pliny on the Essenes

After reading these three sources I hope you were struck by the lack of information concerning this very influential group of religious zealots that would shape the very form of a religious movement which would later develop as "Christianity." It is time now to reap the benefits of archeology and its discoveries over the centuries along with the information to be obtained by a through an in-depth study of Biblical History and the Dead Sea Scrolls as well as study of the chronology of comparative religions. In such a way we can come to understand completely what this group of religious reformers actually believed as their "theology," the origin of such religious beliefs as held by the Essenes, the evolution of their religious beliefs and their changes over 200 years, and the reason for their apostasy from Biblical Judaism. This information is critical in understanding how and why Christianity would so tragically depart from Biblical Judaism as it has yet was supposed to be the fulfillment of it. The answers to the above questions lay below.

EXAMINING THE ESSENE WRITINGS IN ORDER TO DETERMINE THEIR TRUE IDENTITY AND THE ORIGIN FOR THEIR RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

Let us summarize what you will see in the following articles. As you read take notice of the evolution of the Messiah concept in the writings of the Essenes for over almost 200 years of their religious growth. You should be alert to notice how the human Davidic Messiah of Moses and the Prophets was blended with religious concepts stemming from prior Gentile religions and Sun Worship; beginning with Egypt and Osiris, later grafting religious tenants from Adonis, Dionysus, Demeter, Persephone, Orpheus, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Pythagoreanism, Mithraism, Serapis, and not least, Zoroastrianism upon the Davidic Messiah by the Essenes in their almost total repudiation of Biblical Judaism since they, as the rightful Zadok Priests, were spurned by the Hasmoneans following the Jewish victory in Maccabee War and prevented from returning to their rightful Priesthood. Having acquainted yourself above events as you read the intertestamental events and their impact upon the Essenes you should now notice how these Essenes, over the next two hundred year period, came to progressively reject Biblical Judaism and gravitated progressively toward Gentile religious beliefs connected with Sun Worship and applied them to their "angel messiah/cosmic godman." Again what we see from the pens of the Essenes is the personification and literalization of Sun-Worship [beginning with Osiris] as it becomes their basic theology as not only applied to their Teacher of Righteousness but later Jesus as well (Acts 6:7). The Jesus Movement, under the influence of these spurned Zadok priests, the Palestine Essenes, would depart from conservative Judaism and stray from true Biblical Faith held dear by conservative Judaism. Now let us become familiar with the Essene theological writings and look for the evolution of the human messiah into the Essene "cosmic godman/angel-messiah as we trace such evolution through their writings; especially the books of Enoch which were their major theological books.

THE ESSENES AND THEIR "LINK" WITH ASTRO-THEOLOGY

Below you will get acquainted with Astro-Theology as it is the background for most of Essene and later Christian Theology which we acccept today. In particular you need to be aware of how the observations of the Heavens and its influence upon Mother Nature which were first preserved in myth and allegory by the Ancients, which also originally revealed to them their earliest understandings of God and His Eternal Divine Concepts and Patterns, are later personified and "literalized" as applied to various gods and godmen down through history. This tragic misunderstanding of Egyptian Religion down through history has not only robbed mankind of the truest picture of God by these earliest Egyptian montheists, but contribued to the errant theology of the Cosmic Godman through ever successive Nations on earth and we find no better example of this than the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, and in our day other than the Christian's theology surrounding the Jesus of the New Testament which comes from these same Essenes. Hopefully as you acquaint yourself with the following material you can separate the beauty of the Eternal Divine Truths first associated with the Osiris Myth and the later literalizations of these myths that robs us of these Divine Truth when applied literally to men like Adonis, and Aphrodite, Dionysus, Orpheus, Attis and Cybele, Mithra, and Jesus.

THE RETELLING OF THE OSIRIS MYTH AS LATER APPLIED TO VARIOUS GODS AND GODMEN... INCLUDING JESUS

It is very important as we continue our studies to not forget what we have previoulsy learned about the Essenes, their core religious doctrines as expressed in their writings which were detailed above, and especially the chronology and evolution of their Cosmic Godman beliefs in the books of Enoch which run paralled to the Osiris Myth and the theology surrounding these various star myths and observations of the constellations. Only in so doing will you be able to see the relationships and borrowing from the Osirs Myth as later applied by the Essenes to first their Teacher of Righteousness and later to Jesus. Coulded with that is the Essene's influences in Alexandria, Egypt (the home of the Osiris beliefs) upon the early Greek Fathers of the Church whom most were instructed in Alexandria, Egypt, the home of the Essenes and their Theological Univesity as well as the world's largest library. Also of interest as shown in the first article below is how these earliest beiefs associated with Osirs - Orion were influential in the major world religions that emerged and evolved over the centuries. Now let us continue our study.

SUMMARY STATEMENT OF THE MAJOR INFLUENCE UPON ESSENE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

The following articles and information will be new to the vast majority of our readership, and that being so, it is very important when reading the following information concerning world religions that you take careful note as to the various religious doctrines that you encounter. It won't take long before you begin to recognize the repetition of the vast majority of these different "religious beliefs" as you follow the evolution of world religions. What is of major interest to us is that many of these "core" religious beliefs can be shown to have originated from Sun-Worship in one way or the other. These "core" religious beliefs that find their root in Sun-Worship of the nation will later be synthesized into a concise set of beliefs by Pythagoras and others and will ultimately finds their home in the Essene religious community owing to their rejection of Biblical Judaism in the first century. That being so then it becomes very problematic when these same religious beliefs again surface as Divine and unique revelations in Christianity which is just another form of Essene religious expression. So, take a note pad and read carefully and look for repetitions of religious doctrines involving soteriology (salvation), redeemers (godmen), Eucharists (eating the body and drinking the blood of gods), etc. One you compile your notes then it will come in handy for a quick reference when we enter our Essene studies. One familiar with these "core" religious doctrines we will deal with Sun-Worship later in the web-site where you can see the origin for most of the world religious though.

THE NEW TESTAMENT AS AN EXPRESSION OF ESSENE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS AND THEOLOGY

It is assumed that you have acquainted yourself quite thoroughly with the above information as it will be of great benefit as we continue our serious study of the influence of Sun-Worship on world religions. This will be a consuming study that is very necessary if you intend on fully understanding how pagan astral concepts have become the foundation for the vast majority of cherished Christian beliefs, doctrines, and dogmas. It is not my intention to hurt anyone or destroy anyone's faith; rather, it is my purposeful intention to help others recover Divine truth lost and thereby help the restoration of Divine knowledge whereby our worship of the Creator be in both Spirit and Truth as it should. I wish this was not necessary, but the deceptions and conspiracies of the history of mankind by powerful priesthoods have blinded mankind to the truth. In the information which follows you find the culmination of over 15 years of serious inquiry in religious studies. Let us be fully aware that the New Testament consists of four basic components:

- Soteriology And The Savior Concept [which will now, having acquainted yourself with the above information, be seen to have come from Sun-Worship and the Mystery Religions]
- Ethics [which came primarily from India/Brahamanism/Buddhism]
- Eschatology [which is largely derived from Persia/Zorastrianism]
- Second Coming [An Essene Contribution]

I would ask that you not forget what you already learned from the above studies as it will be reinforced by further study as we investigate the origins for the vast majority of religious beliefs that were the foundation for the Essene-Christian faith.

THE INFLUENCE OF SUN-WORSHIP UPON THE ESSENES AND THEIR PAGANIZATION OF BIBLICAL JUDAISM

We have already seen a lot of this information in the above materials on this website. We now continue our study into the paganizing of Biblical Judaism and the corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures at Alexandria, Egypt, by the Essenes. It will be this corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures and the inclusion of a literalization of astral-theology by the Essenes that will later tragically impact and influence the Gentile world and distort prior Divine Truths sacred to the Ancients who were first revealed this through Divine Revelation. This forged translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, through the proliferation of a forged Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, will incorporate many pagan thoughts which will later be incorporated into the New Testament because of the Essene influence upon the Early Greek Fathers of the Christian Church as the Essene's "solar theology" is later applied to Jesus in the New Testament as the Essene's Angel-Messiah and Godman.

SUN-WORSHIP...THE RELIGION OF THE ARYIAN NATIONS AND THE RESULTING INFLUECNE UPON THE ESSENES AND THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH

Having now acquainted yourself with the necessary background information concerning Sun-worship and its multiple facets and theologies, now we can more easily begin to see these same "solar theologies" contained in the accounts of Jesus in the New Testament. The purpose, as I remind you again, in understanding these things is not the denigration of Christianity, but the hope that as worshippers of God, we can filter out manifestations of Sun-worship we inherited in our Christian upbringings; thereby making our worship of the Creator more pleasing and holy.

BET EMET MINISTRIES

"Hebrew for "House of Truth"

Craig Lyons M.Div.

The following is the recommended reading list for students of Bet Emet Ministries. Each of these following books is very important in your study of the origins of the Christian Faith for one or more reasons. If I had it to do all over again instead of the several hundred or so books collected and read over 20 yrs these would be the only books I needed to read to get the total picture of the corruption of "the faith once given the saints". From my viewpoint looking backward I consider each of these books mandatory for ones understanding of the difficult problems which confront us once we begin to study the origin and corruption of early Christianity. I make few promises but I will make an exception at this time: If one undertakes to read as many of these books in the following categories then there will be little that will escape him in his quest for truth concerning the Christian faith, the "Jesus Story", as well as Messianisms within Judaism which originated with Egypt in the beginning of time. This is all the more important when one gets down to the difficult task of trying to reconcile the Jewish Messiah as taught by Judaism and the blurred image of him as found in our depiction of the "Jesus Christ" in the Second New Testament which Rome gave us in refutation of the earliest Gnostic First New Testament which has been so tragically altered today and which so few tragically are aware. Blessings to all in your search for God's truth. These books will reveal to you the different "karast/Christ", or should I say "Jesus" which is found down throughout recorded history: the Mystical, the Mythical, and the Historical. Only two are "true" and one is an absolute falsity due to the tragic loss of the "gnosis" and knowledge of the previous two. Can you guess which one is false?

A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, the study of Gnosticism as well as Comparative Religions, Astronomy and Astrology, and Archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change.

Blessings.....Craig Lyons M.Div. 2004

Answer for yourself: What will these books teach me?

These books will help the reader confront the many challenges regarding the orthodox approach to the inherited "Jesus Story" and the history of Christianity and its true origins. These books point their critical finger at many of the rigid dogmas of Christianity as well as the LITERAL interpretation of the "Jesus Story" which has sadly created not only mental servitude with attendant idolatry but at the same time stifled the real understanding of the original Christian message that goes all the way back to the beginning of time in Egypt. If you read these books you will come to see beyond any doubt that the true meaning of Christianity is to be found in the Mystical and Mythological Teachings. These books will help you see through the false traditions inherited in our day and will show you the need for a revival of the effort to discover the esoteric significance of the Christian heritage, to understand the ALLEGORICAL method of Biblical interpretation, and to find behind the myths, legends, dramas, symbols, and allegories, the spiritual vision which they embody as understood by the Ancients. Only in this way will there ever be a new birth for Christianity and an new enlightenment which is no desperately needed in the Christian world comprising over 3 billion people in the world today.

I CONSIDER ALL OF THESE BOOKS A MUST....YOUR LIBRARY NEEDS EACH OF THEM OR AT LEAST REPRESENTATIVE FROM EACH CATEGORY.....IF YOU READ THESE BOOKS OR AS LEAST THE "GREAT ONES" THEN YOU WILL KNOW ALL THAT NEEDS TO BE KNOWN...(ALMOST)..BUT YOU GET THE POINT....MOST PROBLEMS WITH CHRISTIANITY ARE DEALT WITH IN THESE BOOKS AND FEW THINGS ESCAPE EXPOSURE IN THESE BOOKS...THEY COVER IT ALL..... needless to say I have many more books that I could recommend...but this is the best of crop.. you might can get some of them inexpensively at http://www.bibliofind.com under the "used" book searches.

THE ORIGIN OF THE SAVIOR-GOD: OSIRIS AND EGYPTIAN RELIGION

It all begins in the antiquity of Egypt. Herodotus, in his Persian War II, 14, and Diodorus Siculus, in Library of History, I, 10, both point out that civilization as known to them originated in the valley of the Nile; and did so because there the annual inundation of the great river with its rich deposits of silt made possible an abundant agriculture, which provided ample sustenance with little effort. Egyptian civilization antedates all other Eurasian cultures except the Sumerian; but just how old it is, no one can say with certainty. We know that the great pyramids were built during the Fourth Dynasty about 2700 B.C.; and that Nilotic civilization was then already hoary with age. The First Dynasty dates back at least to 3000. But there was a pre-dynastic culture stretching back, perhaps, to 8,000 B.C.E.

EGYPTIAN RELIGION AND PREOCCUPATION WITH THE AFTER-LIFE

For some reason, the Egyptians believed in, and longed for, personal immortality in a manner unique among ancient peoples. Perhaps the comparative ease of life in the Valley; the long periods of physical inactivity when the inundations made the cities and villages into isolated islands; the endless generations which, following one upon another, made each human life an infinitesimal speck in the vast corridors of time; and the fearful frustration resulting from class exploitation and social inequality—all these may have helped to turn the minds of men from this world to a better one of unlimited duration. Whatever the cause, we know that the Egyptians longed for, and therefore believed in, a blessed immortality beyond the grave: and the desire for it became ever stronger as one millennium succeeded another.

> The Egyptians therefore invented an afterlife replete with rewards dependent upon ethical and sacramental considerations in this life many centuries before any similar concept appeared elsewhere. The preparation for eternity became a vast industry requiring an elaborate priesthood and consuming a large proportion of all human energy. Cheops and Khafre, who built the two greatest pyramids, did so primarily in order to insure their own eternal triumph in the kingdom of Osiris. To build these required the labor of one hundred thousand men for sixty years and left the nation sullen and exhausted. And the bribe which drove these toilers on was the promise that they too might hope for immortality in the Elysian Fields. The savior-god Osiris was a creation of the ruling classes; but in time he became the supreme hope of an enslaved and tortured people, by them beloved more than wealth or freedom.

THE PRE-OSIRIAN RELIGIOUS RELIGIOUS BELIEF SYSTEM

In the Egyptian theology preceding Osiris, Tem or Ra was the God and Father of all, the ungenerated original of the universe. He it was who laid the egg in the chaotic waters from which he was himself reborn(born-again) or evolved. We find a fairly detailed description of the creation in the Papyrus of Nesi Amsu, reproduced by Sir E. A. Wallis Budge (Egyptian Ideas of The Future Life, I).

THE EMERGENCE OF ISIS AND OSIRIS

Tem, Shu, and Tefnut were worshipped by the primitive and dark-skinned aborigines some six or seven thousand years ago. But sometime before 3000 B. C., Egypt was invaded by a light-skinned race of Aryan-Sumerians who stormed out of Mesopotamia, conquered the natives, and the Aryan-Sumerians engrafted new gods upon the older pantheon. These newcomers possessed metal in place of stone tools and weapons and a much superior culture and economy. Osiris was undoubtedly an early ruler of theirs, whom they deified in order to establish their supremacy and who, during his progress, gradually absorbed the characteristics of various indigenous gods.

THE PRIMITIVE OSIRIAN THEOLOGY

The revised theology of prehistoric Egypt may thus be summarized: in the beginning there was only darkness, chaos, and a watery waste; however, God, or Tem, was there, although as yet quiet; but since he willed at a given point to evolve life and develop order in the universe, he reproduced himself from an egg into Ra or the sun-god, which is the creative power immanent in all existence. Ra evolved from himself, first, a daughter Maat, who is the principle of regularity or law in the cosmos; and, second, Thoth, who is the Word, or its creative agency.

Ra thereupon produced from himself by masturbation (line 465 of the Pyramid Text of Pepi II, cir. 2500 B.C.) the brother-sister divinities, Shu and Tefnut, who, in turn, gave birth to Seb or Keb, the earth-god, and to Nut, the sky-goddess, who became the wife of Ra. Tem, Ra, Thoth, Maat, Shu, Tefnut, Nut, and Keb—this was probably the Egyptian pantheon preceding the Sumerian conquest. At this point, the invaders engrafted their own divinities upon the indigenous theology of the aborigines. They declared that Nut, seduced by Keb, bore premature quintuplets: Osiris, Horus, Set, Isis, and Nephthys.

THE NEW CULTURE

Along with their religion, the Sumerians established also their superior culture: they controlled the flood waters of the Nile by constructing canals and by dividing the fields for agriculture, a science they had already mastered in the Tigris-Euphrates valley; they introduced a much more stable and civilized diet; they sowed grain and made it into bread; they brewed ale from barley; they forbade promiscuous cannibalism, [these events will be important later] especially the dismembering of the dead, who were now instead to be embalmed un-violated and buried in tombs built at great or considerable cost; they introduced a higher morality than was previously known; they practiced the arts of writing, brick-making, stone-cutting, and street paving; and they lengthened the year from 360 to 365 days. As these reforms could not be accomplished without supernatural sanction, they were attributed to the divine Osiris; he became the original god-man incarnate.

How Osiris and his brothers and sisters could be human although both their parents were gods, the naturalistic priests of ancient Egypt seem never to have explained. But divine they were and yet human no less. The age of the skeptic had not yet dawned. Many today look at the "Elohim" of Genesis chapter two as the importance reference to these "descending ones" or "giants" which came to this earth and created "homo sapiens" from "homo erectus" and this explains the second of the two "creation" accounts of Genesis. For further study I recommend Z. Sitchin and his anthology, the Earth Chronicles, which explains this dramatic creation.

NECESSARY BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON OSIRIS...THE PATTERN FOR ALL OTHER GOD-MEN

Of all savior-gods worshipped at the beginning of the Christian era, Osiris may have contributed more details to the evolving Christ figure than any other. Already very old in Egypt, Osiris was identified with nearly every other Egyptian god and was on the way to absorbing them all. He had well over 200 divine names. He was called Lord of Lords, King of Kings, God of Gods. He was the Resurrection and the Life, the Good Shepherd, Eternity and Everlastingness, the god who "made men and women to be born again." Budge says,"From first to last, Osiris was to the Egyptians the god-man who suffered, and died, and rose again, and reigned eternally in heaven. They believed that they would inherit eternal life, just as he had done."

According to Egyptian scriptures, "As truly as Osiris lives, so truly shall his follower live; as truly as Osiris is not dead he shall die no more; as truly as Osiris is not annihilated he shall not be annihilated." Believers were "in Osiris," the equivalent of being "in Christ."

Osiris' coming was announced by Three Wise Men: the three stars Mintaka, Anilam, and Alnitak in the belt of the constellation Orion, which point directly to Osiris's star in the east, Sirius (Sothis), significator of his birth. Angelic voices hailed the coming of the Universal Lord Osiris on this occasion which marked the rising of the Nile flood. Oriental paths of the Osirian tradition may be traced in Tibet, where the rising of the same star in the east marks the annual festival of "setting free the waters of springs," as the Egyptian festival set free the waters of the Nile. Tibetans named the star Rishi-Agastya, after a holy king of "a very ancient time." Ancient Hebrews called the same star Ephraim, or the Star of Jacob. In Syrian, Arabian, and Persian astrology it was Messaeil—the Messiah.

Certainly Osiris was a prototypical Messiah, as well as a devoured Host (in the form of a Eucharist). His flesh was eaten in the form of communion cakes of wheat called the "plant of Truth." Osiris was Truth, and those who ate him, in the form of the Osiris eucharist, became Truth also, each of them another Osiris, a Son of God, a "Light-god, a dweller in the Light-god." Egyptians came to believe that no god except Osiris could bestow eternal life on mortals. Osiris alone was the Savior, Un-nefer, the "Good One." Under this title he was even canonized as a Christian saint.

Answer for yourself: Is this just coincidence of could the Jesus story found in the New Testament be a retelling of the Osiris myth?

Egyptians were much afraid of death's corruption awaiting them without the kindly intervention of Osiris: "When the soul hath departed, a man seeth corruption, and the bones of his body crumble away and become stinking things, and the members decay one after the other, the bones crumble into a helpless mass, and the flesh turneth into fetid liquid. Thus a man becometh a brother unto the decay which cometh upon him, and he turneth into a myriad of worms, and he becometh nothing but worms, and an end is made of him, and he perisheth in the sight of the god of day." But Osiris could prevent all this nastiness:

Homage to thee, O my divine father Osiris, thou hast thy being with thy members. Thou didst not decay, thou didst not become worms, thou didst not diminish, thou didst not become corruption, thou didst not putrefy, and thou didst not turn into worms.... I shall not decay, and I shall not rot, I shall not putrefy, I shall not turn into worms, and I shall not see corruption before the eye of the god Shu. I shall have my being, I shall have my being; I shall live, I shall live; I shall germinate, I shall germinate, I shad germinate; I shall wake up in peace; I shall not putrefy, my intestines shall not perish; I shall not suffer injury; mine eye shall not decay; the form of my visage shall not disappear.... My body shall be established, and it shall neither Lad into ruin nor be destroyed on this earth.

THE INFLUENCE OF OSIRIS ON THE BIBLE

The cult of Osiris contributed a number of ideas and phrases to the Bible.

The 23rd Psalm copied an Egyptian text appealing to Osiris the Good Shepherd to lead the deceased to the "green pastures" and "still waters" of the nefer-nefer land, to restore the soul to the body, and to give protection in the valley of the shadow of death (the Tuat).

The Lord's Prayer was prefigured by an Egyptian hymn to Osiris-Amen beginning:

"O Amen, O Amen, who art in heaven."

Amen was also invoked at the end of every prayer. That is why we say "Amen" today following our prayers.

Answer for yourself: How much of our traditional Christianity comes from Egypt and we not know it?

Jesus' words, found in John 12:24

"Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit"

were taken from an Osirian doctrine that a dying man is like a corn of wheat "which falls into the earth in order to draw from its bosom a new life."' Jesus' words, recorded in John 14:2,

"In my Father's house are many mansions" came from an Osirian text telling of numerous Arits ("Mansions") in the blessed land of Father Osiris. Stories about Osiris turned up in Christian legends. Jesus' healing of a nobleman's daughter was based on a tale of an Osirian priest who cured a princesses. Worshippers of Osiris were promised that they would rule the spirit-souls (angels) in heaven, foreshadowing St. Paul's promise to his followers that they would rule even angels (1 Corinthians 6:3).

The bishop's crozier was the Osirian shepherd-crook. The Christian cross itself was a variant of the Egyptian ankh, symbolizing "the Life to Come." One significant difference between Osiris and Christ was that Osiris was restored to life not by his divine father but by his divine mother—who was also his bride, Isis. She put his dismembered body back together and raised him from the dead. Isis married Osiris and conceived Osiris' reincarnation, the Divine Child Horus who became Osiris again. This was the first immaculate conception!

She also took him to heaven where he reigned as Father Ra. Sometimes Ra was called Osiris' father, sometimes Osiris was called Ra's father, sometimes they were the same god, named Osiris--Ra. They were cyclically reincarnated as father-son and son-father, dwelling in the Mother as fetus, lover, corpse. Thus Osiris' cult centered on the theme of divine incest, apparent also in a Christianity that declared the Father and Son identical, and the Mother of God the same individual as God's bride. Osiris plainly expressed the archetypal wish for union with the mother, found in all men's religions. He was restored to life as the ithyphallic Min. Men, or Menu, "Moon-god," hailed as a Bull of lust, "the mummy with a long member," or "the Lord Who impregnates his Mother."

A symbol of Osiris's sacred marriage was the menat or "moon--charm." The Menat was a charm of Hathor, the Goddess of the Sunrise. It was worn especially by women, for whom Hathor was a favorite. It served to protect the wearer and was also something of a love charm. Usually only the head of Hathor was depicted as the amulet. In hieroglyphics a phallus-shaped jar pouring fluid into a wider pot or vase, signifying sexual intercourse with a deity. The menat amulet was borne by nearly every Egyptian god; it was also a title of Isis. The same sexual image of the two vessels was found in the tombs and temples of Babylon and Assyria. The male water-jar represented the seminal spirit of the Savior in all the lands of the Middle East and Egypt. In his processions, the god was preceded by a jar-bearer like the man with a jar of water who preceded Jesus in the Passover procession (Luke 22: 10).

The Jews' Passover meal called Seder may have descended from the Egyptian Sed, the oldest festival of Osirian regeneration and fertility. At the Sed, Osiris's masculinity was erected in the form of the Djed column, originally a simple phallic obelisk, later a representation of Osiris's sacrum, the "sacred bone" so called because it was once regarded as the source of seminal fluid. The Djed Amulet has been interpreted many ways. One theory says it represents the tree trunk in which Isis hid the body of Osiris after Set had dismembered him. As Isis found each piece, she hid it in the tree trunk. She finally had all but one piece of his body except his penis which leads into another interpretation of the Djed. Isis made for the body of Osiris a wooden phallus to replace the missing piece. She had intercourse with Osiris and became pregnant with Horus. Perhaps the Djed Amulet is derived from that symbol. An early interpretation of the Djed Amulet implied it was placed in with the mummies in order to give their backbones strength. When Isis brought Osiris back to life, her first care was to make him "stand up," which meant restoration of his phallic spirit.

Primitive elements in Osirian myth show its extreme antiquity, dating back to Neolithic Egypt. Before re-conceiving Osiris, the Goddess apparently devoured him as she hovered over his corpse in the guise of the archaic Vulture-mother. Like similar images of devouring Kali, this points to an age predating even the discovery of fatherhood, when reincarnations were believed to be brought about by cannibalism (in this instance pre-Eucharist...yet the eating of a god). Indeed, Osiris may have begun as one of the numerous forms of Shiva, for his name came from Ausar or Asar, meaning "the Asian" just like the Aesir or "Asian" gods of northern Europe.

About 4000 years ago, Osiris' cult was established at Abydos, where he was called Osiris Khenti-Amenti, Lord of Death or Lord of the Westerners, meaning those who had "gone west" into death's sunset land. He was incarnate in a succession of sacred kings who seem to have served as sacrificial victims. Their bodies were divided up and distributed to different parts of the country to assist fertility—as in Norway, up to the 9th century, where kings' bodies used to be quartered and sent to the four provinces for burial, so each locality would have royal flesh to assist the crops. As Christian churches used to be founded on spurious relics of apostles and saints, so Egyptian temples were founded on bits of Osiris' body.

Like the head of Orpheus on Lesbos, the head of Osiris was preserved in the temple at Abydos to serve as an oracle, providing much of the Egyptians' detailed knowledge of the after-world. The shrine had a sacred well called Peq or Pega, the original home of the Pega-nymphs who guarded the oracular well of Pirene in Corinth. Like Christians seeking burial in consecrated ground by a church, wealthy Egyptians bought burial space near the Osirian temple, so as to share the god's resurrection. Abydos therefore became the center of a great necropolis. The faithful claimed on their epitaphs that "I have become a divine being by the side of the birthchamber of Osiris; I am brought forth with him, I renew my youth."

When human sacrifices were replaced by animals, Osiris obligingly incarnated himself in a variety of beasts, notably the Apis bull who ascended to glory, carrying away the sins of all Egypt as he died in atonement. Osiris-Apis later became the composite deity Serapis, monotheistic god of Alexandria for six centuries. Let us not forget that at Alexandria the Essenes would be heavily influenced by such residual religious beliefs and this would carry over in their conversion to the Jesus Movement later.

There were several Osirian trinities. One consisted of Osiris the father, Isis the mother, and Horus the son. Another was Ra the father, Osiris the son on earth, and Horus the son rising in heaven. Another was (1) Ptah, "Opener of the Way," a phallic consort of the Virgin and the opener of her matrix; (2) Seker, representing the male spent, dead, and hidden within the female tomb-womb; and (3) Osiris, newly incarnate as the Min-phallus and standing for resurrection.

The sacred lunar numbers seven, fourteen, and twenty-eight were prominent in Osiris' cult. The lunar cycle of twenty-eight days corresponded to his descent into the underworld and ascent to heaven: fourteen days each way, or fourteen steps on his mystic Ladder. Buddha's ladder of descent to earth and return to heaven also had fourteen steps. Like Buddha and Osiris, the Tibetan sage is still supposed to pass fourteen days in the after-world before encountering enlightenment in the form of "the mandala of the animal-headed deities," reminiscent of the Egyptian gods. We are beginning to see how even Osiris influenced Buddhism. Some of these deities were named Heruka, a possible cognate of Osiris the sun, Heru-Harakhti.

Like Hindu sacred dramas, the cycle of Osirian drama seems to have been keyed to the menstrual cycle of the Goddess, incarnate in the priestess who bore the title of Divine Mother. In the month of Athyr (Hathor), Egyptian women made clay phalli as images of Osiris and threw them into the Nile when it "turned to blood" in flood time. This custom recalled the Oriental conviction that the Goddess must be menstruating at the time of her sacred marriage to the dying god. Later accounts explained Osirian lunar numbers by saying he was 28 years old at the time of his passion, or else that it took place in the 28th year of his reign on earth.

As Lord of Death, Osiris was sometimes identified with the Great Serpent of the underworld, and sometimes painted in the same serpentine form, bent around so his toes touched his head. In Ptolemaic times the whole underworld became Osiris's province, its seven halls collectively called the House of Osiris.

Between 1450 and 1400 B.C.E. the Osirian mystery-cult took form, with hundreds of verbal formulae for making the worshipper become an Osiris. He would be born of Isis and nursed by Nephthys. He would ride across the sky "side by side with the gods of the stars." He would be as virile as Osiris-Menu: "My palm tree (penis) standeth upright and is like Menu.... Therefore the Phallus of Ra, which is the head of Osiris, shall not be swallowed up." When he was in heaven, the gods themselves would bring offerings to him.

The Osirian Mysteries taught words of power for bringing about these desirable effects. Such words of power were "keys" to heaven, to be concealed from non-initiates as "a great mystery." The Saite Recension said with such keys, a soul could pass freely through the gates, gatekeepers, guardians, heralds, inspectors, and other spirits of the heavenly mansions, for he would know all their names.

And the Majesty of Anpu shall say unto me, "Knowest thou the name of this door and canst thou tell it?" . . . And the Majesty of the god Anpu shall say unto me, "Knowest thou the name of the upper leaf, and the name of the lower leaf?" On receiving the proper answers, the Majesty of the god Anpu shall say, "Pass on, for thou host knowledge, O Osiris."

Important for our study into the similarities of Christianity is the fact that during the first century B.C. the Osirian religion was established in all parts of the Roman Empire. Its popularity declined in the end because it became too complicated for the average mind. Necessary "words of power" developed into lengthy catechisms of divine names of doorposts, lintels, bolts, panels, doorkeepers, spirits of the hour, thresholds, gods' right and left feet, etc. Egyptians invented even a memory-god to bring back the spells and holy names if they were stolen by a spirit of forgetfulness. The important ceremony of "Opening the Mouth" was performed to let the dead person speak charms and words of power freely. Still, the catechisms became too long and complex to be remembered.

Budge remarks that the Egyptians believed in "the resurrection of the body in a changed and glorified form, which would live to all eternity in the company of the spirits and souls of the righteous in a kingdom ruled by a being who was of divine origin, but who had lived upon the earth, and had suffered a cruel death at the hands of his enemies, and had risen from the dead, and had become the God and king of the world which is beyond the grave.... Although the Egyptians believed in all these things and proclaimed their belief with almost passionate earnestness, they seem never to have freed themselves from a hankering after amulets and talismans, and magical names, and words of power, and seem to have trusted in these to save their souls and bodies, both living and dead, with something of the same confidence which they placed in the death and resurrection of Osiris. A matter for surprise is that they seem to see nothing conflicting in such a mixture of magic and religion." It is a matter for even more surprise that a scholar of Budge's stature failed to see exactly the same mixture of magic and religion in Christianity; for indeed he could have been talking about Christians as well as Egyptians. To this day, simple Christian folk still display the same hankering after crucifixes and medals, agnus dei, incantations, invocations of holy names and other formulae, saints' relics, holy water, images, even rosaries which they copied from the Egyptians. Christian formulae of exorcism, baptisms extreme unction, absolution, etc., were words of power under different names.

The notion of resurrection through identification with a resurrected god (by eating his flesh in the form of a Eucharist) was in itself magical rather than religious—and this was the basis of the Christian salvation as taught by Paul-idea no less than for that of Osiris' votaries. Moreover it seems the concept of Christ was no less syncretic than the concept of Osiris. If anything, the older god had more right to claim an original system of worship—or of superstition, depending on one's point of view.

THE TRIBAL TOTEM

Foreigners often noted with contempt and disgust the variety of animals worshipped in Egypt: the cow, the bull, the cat, the dog, the snake, the ibis, the hawk, etc. But these, understood correctly as symbols for the attributes of the One True God, is lost to most today unless they study a lot. Taken collectively they simply bear testimony to the antiquity of its religion. The same phenomenon has been found among Indians and other aborigines, concerning whom Lewis H. Morgan wrote his Ancient Society. There can be little doubt that all these animals were primitive clan-totems, worshipped at one time as ancestral spirits and absorbed by the Osirian cult to maintain the allegiance of the superstitious natives. And when any of these were slain and eaten, this was the literal sacrifice of a deity, by which his devotees absorbed his powers. This is one of the first recorded instances where men ate "gods" represented by animals and absorbed the gods powers.

THE PRE-EMINENCE OF OSIRIS

Over a period exceeding three thousand years, some half a billion Egyptians lived and died in devotion to Osiris; he was the beloved god of the people; and they had no conceivable hope higher than that they might in death become one with him in blissful immortality. They would become like their god in their death by becoming "one" with him ["in Osiris," or "in Christ"] and this was accomplished ritually by partaking of the Osirian Eucharist where the devotee shared in the immortality of Osiris; an immortal God following his resurrection. We call this same ceremony the "mass today."

We possess a remarkable series of Egyptian tomb and papyri inscriptions written over a period of several thousand years and known as The Book of the Dead. These are funerary formulas addressed almost exclusively to Osiris; they were to be learned by a man when living or inscribed on his coffin so that when dead he might enter the blessed abodes. Although none of them tell the story of the god, all assume a minute knowledge of him. Osiris was venerated by all Egyptians and was at least as familiar to them as is Jesus Christ to the Christian world.

THE RELIGION OF OSIRIS AND HIS MYSTERY CULT

SECRECY AND INITIATION

Only those initiated into the Osirian cult could know its doctrines or ceremonials: for these were "an exceedingly great mystery . . . in the handwriting of the god himself.... And these things shall be done secretly" (in the rubric accompanying Ch. CXXXVIIa of The Book Of The Dead).

Like the Egyptians, the Greeks, who copied their rituals, declared it a sacrilege to reveal the rites or doctrines of their mysteries. Herodotus tells us, II 3, that what the Egyptian priests "told me concerning their religion, it is not my intention to repeat." Plutarch says that he must "leave undisturbed what may not be told" (Isis and Osiris, 35). Pausanias declares: "as I was intending . . . to narrate all things appertaining to . . . the Eleusinians, a vision in the night checked me: but what it is lawful for me to write for everybody, to this will I turn" (Description Of Greece, I, 14). Once, when the Athenians believed that Aeschylus had revealed the Eleusinian ritual in a play, the audience stormed the stage, threatening to rend the dramatist limb from limb. It is therefore with some difficulty that we reconstruct these esoteric rites.

THE OSIRIAN MYTH

The Osirian myth itself, however, is fully told in Plutarch (Isis and Osiris, 12-20); and this account, reinforced and elaborated by Diodorus Siculus (Library of History, I, 11-27), runs briefly as follows:

The sun-god Ra detected his wife Nut embracing Seb, the earth-god. He therefore decreed that her illegitimate offspring could not be born on any day of the year. Thoth, however, came to her aid; for, playing at draughts with the moon, he won from her a seventy-second portion of each day. By this means, five intercalated days were added to the year, effecting a much-needed reform in the calendar. The year had previously consisted of 360 days, but this wide disparity between the solar and the calendar year was constantly creating a wide divergence between the seasons; although the Osirian reform still left a disparity between the calendar and the solar year of about six hours, the seasons now receded much less rapidly; their retrogression created what is known as the Sothic year, consisting of one thousand four hundred and sixty-one solar years, after which the sun again coincided with the season.

By winning the five additional days, Thoth rescued Nut and her offspring, because on these the curse of Ra was ineffectual; and she gave birth to five children, one on each of the intercalated days. On the first, which became the List day of the year, Osiris was born; on the second, Horus; on the third, Set; on the fourth, Isis; and on the fifth, Nephthys. Osiris married Isis; and Set Nephthys, while Horus became the celibate and intellectual scribe.

All were born of earth and heaven, and in them commingled the qualities of both. They were therefore equipped not only to understand but also to solve the problems of suffering humanity.

Osiris was crowned king of Egypt in his twenty-eighth year; according to another version he ruled during twenty eight years. It is obvious that this number relates to the days of the lunar cycle. It was said that he established the people in settled communities, taught them the arts of war and peace, and prohibited the practice of cannibalism, especially the eating of dead relatives, which, up to this time, had been common practice. Above all, he was credited with conferring upon his people the culture of wheat and barley and thereby transforming them from virtual cannibals into cereal-eating, civilized men and women (pre-Eucharist rite), who developed respect for each other and who came in time to abhor the eating of their parents and other relatives.

But Osiris was not content to confer his benefits upon Egypt alone. He therefore journeyed over the inhabited world to civilize all nations and peoples. Diodorus emphasized that he carried with him men and women highly skilled in music and dancing who taught these arts to less cultured peoples. It was necessary for him to kill and dismember the barbarian king Lycurgus, as well as others who resisted his reforms. In due time, he returned to Egypt, laden with gifts.

In his absence, Isis had governed Egypt justly and equitably; but the evil Set, who was violently in love with her, had been making illicit advances to her, which she had rejected. Set is depicted as the great serpent, and the Greeks called him Typhon; he symbolized the powers of darkness, storms, and all disturbances of nature. Jealous of Osiris because of the honors heaped upon him, Set conspired with seventy-two others to encompass his destruction. This indicates that Set was the leader of the old and now counter-revolutionary priesthood, who, proclaiming their 360-day year, attempted to overthrow the new dynasty and its reformed calendar.

Having measured Osiris, Set built a coffin in which he induced his brother to lie down; instantly he and his coconspirators clamped the lid shut and welded it tight with molten lead, so that Osiris died of suffocation. They threw the coffer into the Nile, on which it floated out to sea and then across the Mediterranean until it came to rest at Byblus. This indicates a generic relationship between Egypt and Syria, which has been established. For excavations carried out at Byblus (modern Jebeil) in 1922 prove that in the third millennium B. C., this city was a magnificent Egyptian colony which approximated the religion and culture of the motherland. It has also been established that any floating object thrown into the Nile will eventually be carried to this port. Lastly, this city became in time the center of the great Adonis cult.

Now in imminent danger of her life, Isis fled into the delta swamps, where she gave birth to the younger Horus. But Set pursued, and killed the child; but the ever-beneficent Thoth instructed her in the use of magic and medicine, which enabled her to restore the child to life. Leaving the infant to be reared at Buto, she set out to find the body of her husband, which she finally discovered at Byblus encased in a pine tree (body on a tree) and which, after various adventures, she brought to Egypt. But Set tore the corpse into fourteen parts (some accounts say sixteen) and buried them, one in each of the provinces of Egypt.

Isis thereupon began her celebrated search for the broken body; and whenever she found a portion, she pieced it together with others until she was able to reconstruct the whole. The male member (penis) alone she could not recover, because Set had thrown it into the Nile, where it had been eaten by the Oxyrhynchus (pike), which therefore became a sacred fish. Isis made images of the missing member out of balsam wood, and erected them as objects of adoration in all the temples. She also constructed wax figures of Osiris, gave one to the priests of each district, saying that they alone possessed the true god. Another account states that each temple received the portion of Osiris which was found in that province and which therefore became its sacred relic. The principal temples were established at Abydos, in Upper, and at Busiris, in Lower, Egypt, where the head and backbone (set) had been recovered. In addition, Isis generously provided that the priests should receive one third of the produce from the land, promised them munificent yields of grain, and exempted them from all taxation (Diodorus I, 73).

Isis breathed her own life into the nostrils of Osiris; and with the help of Thoth, and of Horus, who opened his mouth and gave him his eye to eat, she accomplished the resurrection of Osiris to a second and eternal life; and thus he became the first-fruits of them that slept, the first among humanity ever to rise from the dead. Upon rising from his bier, he instructed his son Horus in the arts of war and adjured him to revenge the foul deed done by Set. Thereupon Osiris departed to the world of the immortals in Khenti-Amenti (Elysian Fields like our Heaven), where he became judge of the dead and the ruler of the blessed.

In the meantime, Set had usurped the throne of Egypt; and when Horus claimed it, the wicked uncle accused Horus of illegitimacy and Isis of adultery. There was a trial before the gods, who determined that Isis was virtuous and that Horus was lawfully conceived and therefore entitled to the succession. A terrific battle now ensued between Set and Horus, who subdued his evil uncle and bound him in chains, himself sustaining a bruised heel. Finally, Horus crushed the serpent's head (see Genesis 3:15), and ruled Egypt happily for the remainder of his life. After a trial before the gods in Khenti-Amenti (Elysian Fields), annihilation by fire was inflicted upon Set, the diabolical Adversary [devil] (Hymn to Ra in the Papyrus of Nekht). The illusion and similarity of many of these events and the Christ story of the New Testament are amazing.

THE GROWTH OF HORUS AND ISIS

During the ages when The Book of the Dead was written, a definite development took place. Horus (a precursor to Jesus) gradually assumed expanded powers, and was identified with his father. The cultists began to identify themselves with Horus also; and with his growth came also a vast expansion in the worship of Isis (precursor to Mary). She it was who established the civil law while Osiris was traveling over the world; she taught men to transform the golden grain of Osiris into the bread of life; when Horus was slain, she gave him life again; she revivified and made possible the resurrection of Osiris; and she established his worship throughout Egypt. In short, without Isis there would have been no Horus, no resurrection, no mystery, and no hope of an after-life. She became the universal and infinite benefactress of humanity, the eternal protective mother, the queen of earth and heaven. Images of her and her son were sacred objects in every Egyptian household, resembling the Madonna and the Christ-child, both in appearance and in the veneration they elicited.

SYMBOLISM IN THE OSIRIAN MYTH

The dynamic power of the Isis-Osiris myth lay in the fact that these deities symbolized abundant life and natural vitality in all their aspects: astronomical, sexual (discussed above), and most of all agricultural. The sun was often identified with Osiris and the moon with Isis (Diodorus I, 11). We know that at the time when the Osiris-cult was established, the dog-star appeared in the East just before sunrise in the month of June, which was also the time the Nile began to overflow. Osiris is called "the great one of Abydos . . . the morning star which appears in the eastern part of heaven" (The Pyramid Text of Pepi, I). The Egyptians sometimes called it Sothis, the star of Isis, who was the goddess of love, and life, and motherhood, mourning for her departed lover and awakening him again to life. Isis was a dynastic reconstitution of the older Hathor, the goddess of love, identified with the cow. The dog-star was also the "star of Osiris" (Plutarch, Isis and Osiris, 52) or Sirius, as it is still known. Thus, Isis and Osiris were the heavenly powers which regulated the seasons, caused the Nile to inundate the fields, and made the grain to grow.

We find that Osiris is also identified with the bull and Isis with the cow. Plutarch tells us that in Memphis the bull of "Apis is kept, being the image of the soul of Osiris." At Sakkara, sacred, living bulls were worshipped for centuries and at death were buried in the Serapaeum in regal splendor, as if they were gods indeed. These animals may have been considered sacred because of their economic value; we believe, however, that this veneration depended even more upon astronomical symbolism. For when the cult was first fully established, some five thousand years ago, the precession of the equinoxes during the zodiacal year, which equals some twenty six thousand solar revolutions and is known also as the Great or Platonic year, had reached the point at which the sun passes through Taurus, or the Sign of the Bull, at the summer solstice, when the Nile begins to overflow. This is terribly important for us to recognize as this was the salvation of the Egyptians which culminated in the overflow of the Nile and the fertilization and watering of the land that produced their food. Salvation came from Heaven and the influence of the stars; thus the importance of Taurus and the sun as connected to "salvation." The cow and the bull, therefore, were the animals identified with Isis and Osiris; they were believed to bring the inundation of the Nile and were consequently sacred and worshipped as gods. About four thousand years ago, this precession had so altered the position of the zodiac that the sun passed through the Ram at the summer solstice (precession of the equinoxes); and then this animal, or the lamb, gradually became sacred (Lamb of God), although the change was neither immediate nor everywhere uniform. The "bull/Taurus" was not replaced by "lamb/Aires." This is the major problem few see in the Old Testament that produced a terrific upheaval in Egyptian religion and precipitated the Exodus with Akhenaton (Moses who was supportive of changing the worship of Egypt from "bull" to "lamb" worship. The followers of Akhenaton came out of Egypt in the Exodus under the sign of the lamb [Aires replacing Taurus in the precession of the equinox] only to return in their hearts to making a golden calf/bull at Mount Sinai which angered Moses/Akhenaton (THINK)!

It was for this reason that in the old temple at Memphis, Osiris is represented as a bull (Taurus);but in the later temples at Busiri, and Philae, he is depicted as a Ram (Aires), which is there called the soul of Osiris incarnate (Budge, Osiris and the Egyptian Resurrection II, p. 15). The altered position of the zodiac is also reflected in the Jewish scriptures, in which we find that the calf and the bull of Genesis are eventually replaced by the lamb. And still later, when the sun had passed into Pisces, the fish became the sacred symbol of the Christians and is found everywhere inscribed in the Roman catacombs where they buried their dead.

Isis and Osiris were also the deities of generation; without them there could be no children and the human race would become extinct. We have seen that Isis set up an image of her husband's phallus in all the temples of Egypt; and we know that its worship was a characteristic not only of the Osirian cult but of others directly derived from it, as the Dionysian in Greece. Osiris, we are told, "is the Lord of the Phallus and the ravisher of women" (The Book of the Dead, CLXVIII, 15). Isis became not only the symbol of motherhood, but also goddess of childbirth. Osiris gave men the power to impregnate, and Isis gave women the power to conceive and bear new life.

But the most important symbolism of the Isis-Osiris concept was agricultural: "When the Nile begins to rise, the Egyptians have a tradition that it is the tears of Isis which make the river rise and irrigate the fields" (Pausanias X, 32). Ancient writers knew that the dismembered body of Osiris buried in all the provinces of Egypt symbolized the grain which had been sown; and that his death and resurrection were symbols of the death and rebirth of the wheat and the barley [first harvest of the spring/first fruits]. In countless representations of Osiris, we see the grain sprouting from his body: and in thousands of funerary inscriptions we are told that the sacred bread is the body of the god. At the annual Osirian celebrations, images of the god were made of wheat paste and eaten as a holy sacrament (eucharist). And even as Osiris was the grain which was planted, died, and sprang to life again, so Isis symbolized the earth mother who received it and in whom it was nurtured.

John 12:24 24 Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. (KJV)

"They regard both the cow and the earth as the image of Isis" (Isis and Osiris, 39).

EGYPTIAN DOCTRINES CONCERNING THE SOUL

The hope of every Egyptian was to achieve immortality by being transformed into an Osiris and to obtain "a homestead forever in Sekhet-Aru" (the Elysian Fields) "with wheat and barley therefore (Hymn to Osiris, Un-nefer).

In order to understand the eschatology of the Egyptians, we need to know their metaphysical concepts concerning themselves. The physical body was called the Khat, which was the foundation also for immaterial reality. In this, or rather in the heart of this, dwelt the Ba, the heartsoul, which was considered the essence of life, and the destruction of which meant annihilation. Now this Ba projected its Khu, which was its double, a sort of shadow being or spiritual duplicate, and which could come or go, having a being separate from, if not independent of, its original. At death, the Khu lived on, required food and drink, could visit the tomb or go abroad, and starved when the funerary offerings ceased; and if it had not entered Elysium by this time, it was reduced to eating human excrement, and, on this diet, withered into nothingness.

The Khat and the Ba, therefore, were always ephemeral. It was the Khu, only, a kind of celestial body, which possessed the potential of immortality. In order that a human being might be transformed into an Osiris and live eternally, it was necessary that this be endowed with incorruption; and this could be done only by uniting it to its Sahu, which was its spiritual essence. This is the very basis for Paul's theology of the glorified body upon resurrection.

REASONS FOR MUMMIFICATION

And this brings us to the question of why the Egyptians made such an industry of embalming and mummifying their dead. In the first place, this was necessary because Isis, Horus, and Thoth had embalmed and swathed the body of Osiris before his resurrection; and in all things it was necessary, in order to become an Osiris, to duplicate his experiences. Before his cult was established, the dead had been eaten, and their dismembered bones cast helter-skelter about the tombs. But the new priesthood taught that immortality was impossible unless the deceased entered the after-life with his Khat inviolate. It was therefore imperative that the body be preserved intact so that, as a result of the magical incantations and ceremonies to be performed over it by properly qualified priests, the Sahu might germinate from it. If such corruption were only avoided, the Khu could be united with the Sahu; and if this, a new and wholly spiritual entity, was victorious in its trial before Osiris, it would attain blessed immortality. Without preserving the Khat through mummification, then, there could be no immortality. The practice continued well into the period of Christianity and was only abolished about 350 A.D. when Antony and Athanasius assured their followers that at the resurrection Christ would give them celestial bodies even if the earthly ones had been consumed by worms.

PREREQUISITES FOR ENTRY INTO SEKHET-AARU...THE ELYSIAN FIELDS

It was no small achievement to become an Osiris. The requirements to become as Osiris are:

1. A man or woman must first be initiated into the exclusive cult of the god
2. He must be clean of hand and pure of heart
3. His essence must needs already have been transmuted into divinity by eating and drinking the sacred Eucharist
4. The deceased must be properly embalmed
5. He had to be vindicated at a public trial before the funeral ceremonies could be performed
6. Unless all his creditors were satisfied, he could not be buried
7. The effectual incantations had to be recited by the official priests.

THE HALL OF JUDGMENT

Once all these requirements were met, however, the deceased was to be ferried without delay across the Great Lake and into the Hall of Maat. Egyptian funerary literature teems with references to what the aspiring Osiris might there expect. One of the most important documents dealing with the subject is the judgment scene from the Papyrus of Ani, composed during the XVIIIth Dynasty, about '550 B. C., in which we see the royal scribe Ani and his wife Thuthu approaching the great scales and Anubis weighing the heart of the suppliant against the feather of Maat. When it is found perfect, Thoth announces the result to the gods, who declare: "Osiris, the scribe Ani victorious, is holy and righteous.... It shall not be allowed to the devourer Amemet to prevail over him. Meat-offerings and entrance into the presence of the God Osiris shall be granted unto him, together with a homestead (mansions) for ever in Sekhet-hetepu (Heaven)."

At the side of Thoth is seated the great monster Amemet or Apep, with crocodile-head, forebody lion-shaped, and with the rear of a hippopotamus ready to devour the heart and the heart-soul of those who are damned. But, as the Osiris Ani has emerged victorious from the weighing of the heart, by the records of Thoth, and by the consent of the company of the great gods, he is conducted into the august and awful presence of Osiris himself, seated on his throne, grasping the scepter, flail, and slave hook, wearing the tall white crown. His body is still encased as a mummy, and behind him stand Nephthys, who advises him, and the beloved Isis, who makes constant intercession for the deceased.

Heb 7:25 25 Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. (KJV)

Horus leads Ani before the throne, where he sinks to his knees; whereupon Horus, acting as mediator, prevails upon his father to admit the suppliant to his blessed realm. With this, the judgment is complete; and the victorious Osiris Ani enters the Elysian Fields.

1 Tim 2:5 5 For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; (KJV)

The celebrated Chapter CXXVII of The Book of the Dead is an elaboration of the judgment scene just described. It consists of three parts: first, the addresses to Osiris by the scribe Osiris-Ani and by the Overseer of the Seal, Nu, triumphant; second, the well-known Negative Confession by the scribe Nebseni; and, third, the final address by Nu to the gods.

When Nu first enters the great hall, he does homage to the "Great God"; thence he proceeds to the hall of Maat, where he must face the gods of the forty-two Egyptian names. Since each of these is the avenger of a particular sin or crime, he must declare his innocence to all of them. The Negative Confession, therefore, consists of forty-two articles summarizing Egyptian ethics about 1600 B.C.: the deceased has not committed robbery, violence, theft, or murder; has not lied, deceived, cut measures, or purloined what belongs to God; has not slandered anyone, wasted the land, killed any sacred animals, pried into holy secrets, given way to wrath or terrified anyone; has never been guilty of adultery or sodomy; has not been deaf to the truth, stirred up strife, or caused any one to weep; has never abused anyone or judged hastily; has never scorned the god of the Kiev or been irreverent to God; has never cursed the king, used too many words, made his voice haughty, been insolent, fouled the water, or increased his wealth unjustly.

The judgment before Osiris was not, to be a mere formality. Osiris could search out the secret places of the heart, and before him no one could be perfect or even sufficient in his own right. Every aspirant to "Osiris-ship" knew that if the Law of Maat were strictly enforced, he could never enter the blessed abodes. Were it not for the advice of Nephthys, the intercession of Isis, the advocacy of Thoth, the mediation of Horus, and the mercy of Osiris himself, no one could see salvation. Nu therefore exclaims: "Do ye away with my evil deeds, and put ye away my sin which deserved stripes on earth, and destroy ye any evil whatsoever that belongeth unto me" (The Book of the Dead, CXXVI).

In the third portion of Chapter CXXV, the suppliant elaborates his declaration of social morality: "bring ye not forward my wickedness . . . [for] I have given bread to the hungry man, and water to the thirsty man, and apparel to the naked man, and a boat to the shipwrecked mariner. I have made holy offerings to the gods.... Be ye then my deliverers, be ye then my protectors.... I am clean of mouth and clean of hands; therefore, let it be said unto me.... 'Come in peace; come in peace.'" For thousands of years, the initiates of the pagan mysteries were to repeat: "I am clean of hand and pure of heart."

ANNIHILATION

In the Osirian eschatology, there was no waiting for judgment, no hell, no torture for the damned. The heart of the condemned was eaten by the great monster Apep or Amemet and thereby his heartsoul ceased to be; his body was then annihilated in the Lake of Fire (The Book of the Dead, LXXI; XVII; and XIX).

THE ELYSIAN FIELDS

Those who emerged triumphant from the judgment were admitted to the Elysian Fields, which are depicted as a land teeming with grain, wherein the blessed shall dwell forever in peace and abundance. The scribe Nu declares: "the gates which are in Sekhem are opened unto me, and fields are awarded unto me, together with those of my flesh and bone" (The Book of the Dead, XCVIII). The Osirian expected to be reunited with his family in the after-life and to rule over his servants as on earth.

Nebseni summarizes the aspirations of every ancient Egyptian: "May I become a Khu in Sekhet-Aaru, may I eat therein, may I reap therein, may I fight therein, may I make love therein, may my words be mighty therein, may I never be in a state of servitude therein, but may I be in authority therein."

When a great personage died, his wives and servants, as well as captured enemy slaves, were executed and buried with him, so that they might serve him eternally. And so the happy Khu, made eternal by union with his Sahu, expected to continue during countless millenniums, sowing and reaping, eating the bread and drinking the ale of Osiris, occupying relatively the same material and economic status as on earth.

EXTENSION OF THE OSIRIAN HOPE

During the early dynasties, those who might hope for happy immortality with Osiris must have been limited to the royal family, certain important officials, and members of the priesthood. But as time went on, democracy increased in religion; and Herodotus describes three methods of embalmings one to suit every purse. Twenty-five hundred years after Cheops and Khafre, a small piece of papyrus, which was to be placed in the coffin and on which were inscribed a few words from The Book of the Dead, promised the same stupendous result as the pharaohs hoped to achieve by the building of the great pyramids. We find, for example, the following rubric: "If this chapter be known by the deceased on earth, or if it be done in writing upon his coffin, he shall come forth by day . . . in peace into Sekhet-Aaru . . . there shall he flourish as he did upon earth. . . for millions of years" (After Ch. LXXII, The Book of the Dead, Papyrus of Nebseni).

IDENTIFICATION WITH OSIRIS

We have noted that every Khu seeking admission to Sekhet-Aaru called himself Osiris (as Christians called after Christ). Obviously all Egyptians who cherished the hope of resurrection and immortality believed themselves already transformed into the divine and immortal essence of their god. The Osiris Nu declares explicitly, "I am Osiris" (The Book of the Dead, CXVII). Being an Osiris, Ani expects a resurrection like that of the god, and therefore addresses himself as follows: "O thou . . . whose limbs cannot move, like unto those of Osiris! Let not thy limbs be without movement; let them not suffer corruption; let them not pass away; let them not decay; and let them be fashioned for me as if I were myself Osiris'' (Ibid., XLV). The same aspirant continues: "The mighty Khu (Osiris) taketh possession of me . . . Behold, I am the god who is lord of the Tuat" (underworld) (Ibid., X). And again: "I am the Great One, son of the Great One.... The head of Osiris was not taken from him, let not the head of Osiris Ani be taken from him. I have knit myself together; I have made myself whole and complete; I have renewed my youth; I am Osiris, the lord of eternity" (Ibid., XLIII).

PUBLIC RITUAL OF OSIRIS

Pagan authors wrote extensively concerning the "gloomy, solemn, and mournful sacrifices" of Osiris (Isis and Osiris, 69). Plutarch tells us that the great mystery-festival, celebrated in two phases, began at Abydos on the 17th of Athyr, which is our 13th of November. This date commemorated the death of the god: and its significance is found in the fact that it was the very day on which the grain was placed in the ground. The death of the grain and the death of the god were one and the same: the cereal was identified with the god who came from heaven; he was the bread by which man lives. The resurrection of the god symbolized the rebirth of the grain.

John 6:33 33 For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. (KJV)

The first phase of the festival consisted of a public drama, depicting the murder and dismemberment of Osiris, the search for and the finding of his body by Isis, his triumphal return as the resurrected god, and the battle in which Horus defeated Set, all presented by skilled actors as literal history; and this was a principal means of recruiting the membership. Julius Firmicus Maternus, a Latin Christian writer of the fourth century, declared: "In the sanctuaries of Osiris, his murder and dismemberment are annually commemorated with . . . great lamentations. His worshipers . . . beat their breasts and gash their shoulders. . . When . . . they pretend that the mutilated remains of the god have been found and rejoined . . . they turn from mourning to rejoicing."

They "say that the grain is the seed of Osiris, that Isis is the earth, and that Typhon is heat" (De Errore Profanorem).

We know that at all the temples of Osiris his Passion was re-enacted at his annual festivals. On a stele at Abydos erected in the XIIth Dynasty by one I-KherNefert, a priest of Osiris during the reign of Usertsen III (Pharaoh Sesostris), about 1875 B. C., we find a description of the principal scenes in the Osiris mystery-drama. I-Kher-Nefert himself played the key role of Horus. In the first scene, Osiris is treacherously slain, and no one knows what has become of his body; thereupon all the onlookers weep, rend their hair, and beat their breasts. Isis and Nephthys recover the remnants, reconstitute the body, and return it to the temple. The next scene, in which Thoth, Horus, and Isis accomplish the revivification, undoubtedly occurs within the sacred precincts, and is therefore not witnessed by the populace. However, in due course the resurrected Osiris emerges at the head of his train; at this glorious consummation, the anguish and sorrow of the people are turned into uncontrollable rejoicing. Horus thereupon places his father in the solar boat so that he may, since he has already been born a second time, proceed as a living god into the eternal regions. This was the great "coming forth by day" of which we read so often in The Book of the Dead. The climax of the play was the great battle in which Horus defeated Set and which is described so vividly by Herodotus (History, II, 63).

ESOTERIC RITUAL OF OSIRIS

Such was the public portion of the Osirian celebration. The esoteric phase consisted of ceremonials performed by the priests within the temples and witnessed only by the initiates. We learn something of these from various sources and are therefore able to reconstruct them. After saying that the festival of Osiris began on the 17th of Athyr, Plutarch continues: "On the nineteenth . . . the priests bring forth the sacred chest containing a small golden coffer, into which they pour some potable water . . . and a great shout arises from the company for joy that Osiris is found (or resurrected). Then they knead some fertile soil with the water . . . and fashion therefrom a crescent-shaped figure, which they clothe and adorn, thus indicating that they regard these gods as the substance of Earth and Water" (Isis and Osiris, 39).

This summarizes the resurrection-ceremonial mentioned in the stele of I-Kher-Nefert. Fortunately, in the Osirian temple at Denderah, an inscription reveals what these secret rituals were. Its first section deals with the making of models of each of the sixteen pieces into which Set hacked the body of Osiris. Each model was made of wheat paste, and sent to the town where that portion of Osiris had been found by Isis.

The second section describes the making of a figure of Osiris at Mendes. Wheat and paste were placed in a trough on the day of Osiris' murder, which was also that on which the grain was planted; and on this mixture water was poured for several days. A few days later, the contents of the trough were kneaded into a mold which was made into a figure of Osiris, taken to the temple, and buried. Other sections describe the process as carried on in other temples.

The fifth section describes how molds were made from the wood of a red tree in the form of the sixteen dismembered portions of Osiris; cakes of divine bread were then made from each mold, placed in a silver chest, and set near the head of the god. These are the mysterious and sacred cakes which are also "the inward parts of Osiris"; and these are the rites to which Plutarch refers when he says: "I pass over the cutting of the wood . . . and the libations that are offered, for the reason that many of their secret rites are involved therein" (Isis and Osiris, 21). This section also describes the Field of Osiris, adjacent to the temple, in which the grains, used in the sacred cakes, were grown. This sacramental food, which to the Osirian was literally the body of his god, could grow only in that holy field.

The sixth section describes the mysteries as practiced in the temple of Isis at Mendes. On the first day of the Festival of Ploughing, the goddess appeared in her shrine, where she was stripped naked. Paste made from the grain was placed in her bed and moistened with water. All this symbolized the great processes by which the human race is generated and food germinated from the earth. Osiris was the seed which fecundated Mother-Isis, who symbolized also the earth itself.

We see therefore that the publicly performed passion-play depicted the earthly career of Osiris; but the secret rites consisted of solemn ceremonies symbolizing the transfiguration of the grain into Osiris and of Osiris into the grain; and all this was climaxed by the eating of the sacramental god, the Eucharist by which the celebrants were transformed, in their persuasion, into replicas of their god-man. In the New Testament, the earliest evidence for the Eucharist rite is found in Paul's letter to the Corinthians, where Paul proclaims his version of the Eucharist tradition, ending with what appears to be the Aramaic formula of the Didache Eucharist:

1.Cor.11:23 " For I received from the Lord what I also handed on to you, that the Lord Jesus on the night when he was betrayed took a loaf of bread, 24 and when he had given thanks, he broke it and said, " This is my body that is for you. Do this in remembrance of me." (1.Cor.11:23-24, Gk. N.T. UBS. 3rd ed.1990)

THEOSIRIAN SACRAMENT...FORERUNNER OF THE CHRISTIAN EUCHARIST

We noted earlier in this article some of the ethical and ceremonial prerequisites for becoming an Osiris. But none of these could avail at all without the miraculous power contained in the divine Eucharist: there was power, there was power in the flesh and the blood of Osiris. He was the grain; and the bread made from it was the sacred food, the barley ale (i.e., wine) brewed from it the divine drink, literally believed to be the body and the blood of the god (transubstantion in the Catholic Church). Since the ancient Nilotics believed that human beings become whatever they eat, this Osirian sacrament was believed able to make them celestial and immortal.

The doctrine of the Eucharist has its ultimate roots in prehistoric cannibalism: it was universally believed among savages that by eating other human beings or gods, their virtues and powers would be absorbed by the eaters. Such cannibalism, common among African tribes until very recently and still practiced among the most primitive, had this primary objective. Melville describes the same sacerdotal rite among the south sea islanders (Cf. Typee, XXXI).

One of the oldest of the Pyramid Texts is that of Unas from the VIth Dynasty, cir. 2500 B. C. This is of great importance because it shows that the original ideology of Egypt had commingled with the Osirian concepts.

Although he is ultimately given high place in heaven by order of Osiris, Unas is represented as being at first an enemy of the gods and his ancestors, whom he hunts, lassoes, kills, cooks, and eats so that their powers and attributes may become his own. It is obvious that at the time this was written, the eating of parents and gods was considered a most laudable ceremonial; and it emphasizes how difficult it must have been for the Osirian priesthood to stamp out the older cannibalism: "The Akeru gods tremble, the Kenemu whirl, when they see Unas a risen Soul, in the form of a god who lives upon his fathers and feeds upon his mothers.... He eats men, he feeds on the gods . . . he cooks them in his fiery cauldrons. He eats their words of power, he swallows their spirits. . . What he finds on his path, he eats eagerly.... He eats the wisdom of every god, his period of life is eternity. . .

Their soul is in his body, their spirits are within him." Having partaken of this dynamic sacrament, Unas becomes an Osiris and is admitted to the company of the gods. A parallel passage is found in the Pyramid Text of Pepi II, who, it is said, "seizeth those who are in the following of Set . . . he breaketh their heads, he cutteth off their haunches, he teareth out their intestines, he diggeth out their hearts, he drinketh copiously of their blood!' (Line, 531 ff.).

Although crude, savage, and grotesque, this was the core of an overwhelming concept. The conviction that it was possible for humanity to achieve immortality by eating the body and drinking the blood of a god or of an immortal god-man who had died that mortals might have abundant and everlasting life, became a dominating obsession in the ancient world. This same idea, as held by the Essenes, is the reason why the Passover is changed at the last supper and made into an "eat my body and drink my blood" dinner! The Pagan roots are evident to anyone who knows history and a little comparative religion.

The cult of Osiris forbade the older cannibalism, but did not proscribe the dismemberment and eating of enemies; and it certainly practiced the bloody sacrifice of captives and the sacramental rending and eating of the sacred bovine, which symbolized Osiris (The Book of the Dead, CLXXXI).

The moral elevation of the Osirian cult lay in its identification of bread with the flesh of its god and of barley ale with his blood. The partaker of this Eucharist could now achieve a mystical transformation and become an Osiris by living on wheat and barley bread during his lifetime, by drinking and eating the sacred ale and cakes during the annual mysteries, and by enjoying the same sacred fare in Sekhet-Aaru once his Khu had joined his Sahu in the next world. By this simple metaphysical transposition, the bloody sacrament became symbolic, but no less effective. For Osiris was, to his believers, literally and with complete reality, the divine seed which came down from heaven and was reborn from the earth that men might have life and have it more abundantly; and all who ate of that bread might live forever, for it was the flesh of the god, which he gave for the life of humanity. Whosoever ate the flesh and drank the blood of Osiris had eternal life; for he would be resurrected beyond the grave. Whosoever ate that flesh and drank that blood dwelt in Osiris and Osiris dwelt in him. Paul calls this same event being "in Christ."

Answer for yourself: Did you notice the exact similarity with the Gospel of John, chapter 6? Did Jesus really say those things or has words been put into his mouth by the Essene-Christian Church to further their sect's doctrines?

This was the divine mystery which was given to the world by Egypt and which spread throughout the Mediterranean area in various cults; this concept originated only once, but it proliferated in all directions and became the dynamic force in every mystery-cult.

It was solely by means of this sacramental food that the corruptible of the deceased could be clothed with incorruption.

1 Cor 15:42 42 So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: (KJV)

This idea appears again and again in infinite variety. The scribe Nebseni implores: "And there in the celestial mansions of heaven which my divine father Tem bath established, let my hands lay hold upon the wheat and the barley which shall be given unto me therein in abundant measure." This was the celestial Eucharist without which the Sahu itself, the spiritual body, could not germinate from the mummy. Nu corroborates this fact by stating: "I am established, and the divine Sekhethetep is before me, I have eaten therein, I have become a spirit therein, I have abundance therein." Again he declares; "I am the divine soul of Ra . . . which is god. . . I am the divine food which is not corrupted." Nu identifies himself with Osiris and with Ra, who is called the divine, that is, the sacramental food. As we know, Horus was also frequently identified with his father; and we read: "Horus is both the divine food and the sacrifice." We read that the bread and the ale of Osiris make the eater immortal, (The Book of the Dead, 40) an idea which is frequently elaborated. The Osirian "shall eat of that wheat and barley, and his limbs shall be nourished therewith, and his body shall become like unto the bodies of the gods" (The Book of the Dead, XCIX).

That the sacramental food which gave immortality was a very ancient concept we learn from the Pyramid Text of Teta, which dates from about, 2600 B. C. and which embodies ideas far more ancient still. We read here that the Osiris Teta "receives" thy bread which decayeth not, and thy beer which perisheth not." In the Text of Pepi I we read: "All the gods give thee their flesh and their blood.... Thou shalt not die." In the Text of Pepi II, the aspirant prays for "thy bread of eternity, and thy beer of everlastingness (Line 390).

THE GOD-MAN....OSIRIS

Such was the great godman Osiris: human, like us, and thus able to take upon himself all our sorrow, but also divine, and therefore able to confer divinity upon us. He brought the divine bread from heaven for mankind; he taught justice and practiced mercy; he died, was buried, and rose from the grave; he gave to all who became members of his mystical body his flesh to eat and his blood to drink so that this divine sacrament might then transfigure them into celestial gods; he went before to prepare mansions for his initiates in Elysium; and he was to be the just and merciful judge before whom men and women must appear beyond the grave.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE OSIRIAN CULT

The Osiris-worship continued with little modification on the island of Philae in the Upper Nile for several centuries into our era and sacrifices of human enemies were performed there regularly as late as the sixth century. The edict of Theodosius that all pagan temples be destroyed and their worshipers forced to accept Christianity about 380 was there ignored. About 550, however, Justinian dispatched to Philae General Narses, who destroyed the great Osirian temples and sanctuaries, threw the priests into prison, and carried away the sacred images to Constantinople.

Thus died the cult of Osiris. But the soteriology [salvation] which was its central feature had already assumed various forms which had long since proliferated far and wide in the ancient world. And as Christians we follow in the footsteps of Osiris in Jesus' name and never know the origins for such religions beliefs.

WHAT YOU CAN EXPECT TO LEARN FROM THE STUDY OF THE ESSENE - CHRISTIAN FAITH

I have, in this website, provided for the interested reader a comprehensive presentation of the historical religious synthesis of the doctrinal and ritualistic background of the Essenes and the culmination of their religious beliefs which today is better know by the term "Christianity." I trace for the student the origins of the Essene's religious beliefs, their origins, organization, and its evolution and development down through the ages. One, once familiar with this information, and step back and look at Christianity and understand it as never before. It is my hopes that in doing such study one can sift the chaff from the wheat; being able to see the deviations from the faith of the Ancients and Patriarchs about God and how these Essenes deviated from the that faith which was "once given to the saints." Only in such a detailed study can one be assured that he is today truly following in true Abrahamic and Mosaic faith which the historical Jesus both taught and modeled. This information coupled with our Egyptian-Christian website will provide the answers to possibly all your questions concerning the Christian faith. This, as stated, is a very comprehensive and slow study and we hope you find the interest and diligence necessary to learn from our studies undertaken over the last ten years or more.

Here, then, is a thoroughly documented and scholarly analysis of origins for Christian religious doctrine and dogma. The trail of such a religious synthesis begins with the Sun-Worship of Egypt and ultimately takes us to the Essene/Qumran cult and their literature. A unique presentation of the information provided has been undertaken to make it more easy for the reader to notice the chronological religious synthesis of religious beliefs of the Essene/Qumran cult that is so important to notice if one is to accurately understand how Christianity not only emerged but also to explain its overnight success among the nations. This is accomplished by choosing to place events and religious practices among the nations, along with religious documents of the Essenes, in a chronological sequence. This method of presentation of the facts and evidence available to us gives convincing evidence concerning the unique religious synthesis of the Essene/Qumran cult along with the dates of composition of their writings, and, on this basis, indicates how the ideology and theology of the Essene/Qumran cult not only evolved from generation to generation through successive phases of development, but also reveals their departure from normative Biblical Judaism at the same time. In this, the historical panorama of the Covenanters, not only in their internal polity, but also in their relationship to Judaic life as a whole, is clearly revealed in sharp perspective.

The study proceeds with cumulative momentum as it delineates these devoted and dedicated people of the Essene/Qumran cult, who began and ended the major phases of their career in the desert. It shows how their doctrines, dogmas, philosophy, and discipline grew by gradual stages, from a fiercely Judaizing program at the beginning into an esoteric cult of celibate-communist apocalyptists at the end. I go on to show the reader how they were able to create in secrecy the elements which, according to accepted Christian history, were proclaimed according to the New Testament, for the first time to an astonished public by John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth. It is for the reader to decide upon the evidence presented how much of the "religious teachings" which one encounters in the New Testament were later attributed to Jesus and inserted into his mouth by the latter writers of the New Testament documents. Other writers, notably Dupont-Sommer, Edmund Wilson, and John M. Allegro have given vivid intimations of this.

The knowledge of Essene/Qumran cult history and doctrinal lore now at our disposal casts hitherto unsuspected light upon the origin of Christianity and the career of its founder, as well as that of a predecessor, the Teacher of Righteousness, celebrated in the Scrolls.

Every student, minister, scholar, and intelligent layman in all fields of serious endeavor should be acquainted with and take this information to heart; especially in light if one is a Christian. Only by undertaking this study and seeing for yourself the religious synthesis of the Essene/Qumran cult in reaction against Biblical Judaism for reasons which will be soon presented, will you come to understand the difference between Divine revelation and religious doctrines of Sun-Worship passed off today as "accepted orthodoxy"....the Essene-Christian faith. Today many Christians are waking up to this fact; even some Christian Bibles are beginning to make mention of this fact. The NIV Bible makes the Essene-Sun-Worship connection. We applaud their honesty and their courage to make this connection and we hope others will do so as both their courage and their scholarship increase.

WHAT TO EXPECT TO LEARN FROM THIS WEB-SITE

This is repeated information from the "cover page of the website." If you failed to read it when beginning your inspection of the website then it is repeated here again for you due to its importance.

There are several things I desire to accomplish for the reader who undertakes a serious study of the materials presented in this web site:

- Few, if any writers, to the best of my knowledge, have endeavored to trace the religious evolution of the Essenes as a religious movement and the influences upon it from the fountainhead of their inherited religious beliefs.....Ancient Egypt. That being said few likewise had traced the religious evolustion of these Essenes from their pristine, pre-Chasidic beginnings as a Zadokite reaction against Hellenization among the Jews, into the frozen, rigid, secret, and celibate communist mystery-cult which had grown in the first century to reject Biblical Judaism almost in toto as we find in the days of Philo and Josephus. Thus the need to reevaluate the summary accounts of Josephus, Philo, and Pliny as their descriptions of the Essenes fail to give the reader the whole picture needed to properly understand the Essene/Qumran movement and their religious beliefs that go much deeper than the simple accounts left to us by these three historians. Few writers have undertaken to systematically lay out before the reader the chronological and systematic evolution of the Essenes over a three hundred year period whereby they are shown correctly in their historical light. We will reveal, in these pages to the reader, how the Essenes, in their rejection of Judaism and the Temple, would absorb religious tenants originally from Zoroastrianism and later from Greek-mystery sources, particularly Pythagoreanism. On the outside the Essenes might have looked Jewish, but on the inside when their writings are examined and correctly understood they can be shown to betray an anti-Jewish theological bias and it becomes evident that they as a group evolved to reject Judaism in toto; and except for certain Buddhist accretions, the early pristine church reproduced the Essene pattern faithfully. Since, however, this form of "Christianity" was unacceptable in the pagan world and since it was spurned by the majority of the Jews, it was Hellenized in the Pauline epistles and the Fourth Gospel, both of which reflect Stoic influence; these eventually became an essential foundation for that reconstruction or restitution of Christianity known as the Protestant Reformation.
- Few Scholars yet have made the connection of Essene religious beliefs with Sun-Worship. The vast majority of scholars who have studied the Essenes have failed to recognize the Essene/Qumran cult's reliance upon astronomy and astrology, along with the religious beliefs of the mystery cults, for the core of Essene religious dogmas and beliefs. The failure to recognize the Essene religious cult's heavy dependence upon Sun-Worship and Egyptian religion has unfortunately given a false validity to the Essene-Christian faith. In the website and pages that follow I plan to correct this grievous error of omission and make available to our reader the hidden truths in this regard; namely, revealing how the core of Essene religious beliefs are nothing more than the synthesis of the major doctrines of Sun-Worship and Astro-Theology which finds is basis in Osiris and the Egyptian religion of antiquity.

- To few scholars fail to pay attention to the Book of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and their importance in the evolution and synthesis of the core religious beliefs of the Essene community. Few writers have properly analyzed The Testaments and especially the interpolations found in them, which the majority of scholars to this day incorrectly consider Christian forgeries, although these supposed and alleged Christian "interpolations," when properly understood in their historical context, exhibit every evidence of true Essene origin and are themselves, when properly understood, reflective of accepted Essene Christological and Messianic theology and a wind-down to the pre-existing Essene Messianic faith. Far too often many authors, when reading or writing of this material, are accustomed to call such "Essene Messianic Prophecy" little more than Christian interpolations or alterations of Essene writings. In this website I will prove to you that this is not the case as all; in fact these "Essene" Christological Beliefs" are to find their origin in Sun-Worship and can be traced down through the paths of prior non-Jewish religious beliefs; ultimately finding their expression as Essene religious tenants which provided the foundation for the vast majority of Christian Messianic dogma to follow. Let us not forget that these "Essenic Christological Beliefs," which would later become the very backbone of Christian dogma, can be proven to have originated in Sun-Worship and this will be proven in the pages that follow. One only need read the Catholic Encyclopedia and their information on the Essenes to begin to see what the scholars have known all along...that the Essenes were involved in religious manifestations of Sun-Worship! The NIV Bible makes the same admission.
- Also, few have ever given adequate consideration to the implications of the Pandera-Yeshu legend in relation to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness. Sadly this blasphemous story is applied to Jesus when, upon examination of facts and evidence existing, will show that the account was originally applied to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness and not Jesus. Only later, in the Jewish reaction to the Jesus Movement, would the story be applied to Jesus to discredit him.
- Few writers and scholars have seriously considered the significance of the Ebionite cult and its evident relationship to Essenism.
- Fewer scholar still have noticed, or examined in detail, the influence of these Essenes on the corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when they were translated into Greek. We will show the reader how important "theological changes and deviations" from the accepted Jewish texts were made by the Essenes of Egypt in the translation of the Jewish Scriptures....called the Septuagint. The reader will come to see, once acquainted with the "Osirian myth," how such personified Sun-Worship was cleverly inserted into the mouths of the Prophets by the Essene sect in Egypt.
- Important for our understanding is that these "changes" in support of Essene religious doctrines will become the foundational texts for all Christian Old Testaments. Moreover, as if that was not enough, all quotes from the Old Testament contained in the New Testament come from this "corrupted " translation of the Jewish Scriptures. This means that the New Testament applies to the life of Jesus religious beliefs and doctrines that find their origin in pagan Sun-Worship!

The startling conclusion is inescapable: pagan religious doctrines were inserted into the Jewish Scriptures by these Essenes when they translated and purposefully corrupted the Hebrew Scriptures and these "sun-myths" would be the source for the Essene's beliefs in their Godman soter/Savior/Angel-Messiah. These doctrines will later be applied to Jesus by the same group in Palestine; thereby making Jesus a "sacrificial Godman" as well. These Scriptural alterations will then be evaluated on an individual textual basis with hundreds of examples whereby the reader can see for himself the alterations of the Jewish Scriptures whereby doctrines of Sun-worship were added to the texts and inserted into the mouths of the Prophets by the translators in Egypt.

We propose to examine all these problems and offer a realistic analysis. Most of the voluminous material found in the Dead Sea caves today is available for inspection; therefore we are today able, with substantial accuracy, to delineate the origin, evolution, discipline, doctrines, practices, rituals, and basic purposes of the Essene/Qumran cult during the successive stages of its development and existence and how such practices and religious beliefs, many of which are nothing more than personified Sun-Worship, would become the basis of the vast majority of Christian dogma.

I hope you understand, especially if you hold to standard Christian orthodoxy and dogma, the implication of such sad fact! Nevertheless, we believe that the reading public, interested students, and especially university, college, and seminary teachers of comparative religion are now ready for a more complete delineation of the Essene cult in its historical setting and progression. We have available to us today a wealth of good materials by which we can learn the truth about the Essenes and the truth about Christian origins. We at Bet Emet Ministries wish to re-create the living image of these fervent ascetics; analyze their driving forces; and explore the processes by which they formulated the ideology and the practice which gave them their extraordinary power.

Without further delay let us begin our study of the origins of the Christian faith and the background and nature of the Dead Sea Scrolls, the people who produced them, and the dynamic forces which gave birth to the accepted faith of western society....called Christianity today.

THE ESSENES: THE EXTERNAL EVIDENCE

THE ACCURATE IDENTIFICATION OF THE ESSENES…HAS IT BEEN DONE BY MOST?

With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, the relationship between Essenism and the Christians of the New Testament has become a subject of consuming interest. The evidence now coming to light confirms what various scholars have long surmised: namely, that it is impossible to evaluate pristine Christianity correctly except through an understanding of the Essenes.

Old prejudices die hard; but since that day in 1947, when a Bedouin goatherd stumbled into a cave in which the Essenes had secreted their manuscripts just before they fled before the Roman armies in 68 or 69 A.D., it is scarcely possible any longer to deny the Essene direct influence upon Christianity. A few cautious scholars have questioned whether the Covenanters who lived at the Qumran Monastery were actually those Essenes described by Pliny, Philo, and Josephus. Other scholars, like Solomon Zeitlin, have argued that the Scrolls are medieval forgeries or were composed by Jewish Christians of the third or fourth century (such is the view of J.L. Teicher). Such arguments, of course, serve merely to accentuate the generic relationship between the Covenanters and the Gospel message of the Christians of the New Testament; otherwise it would be impossible to maintain that documents unquestionably composed in the second or first century before Christ were composed by Christians several centuries later.

LITERARY ACTIVITY OF 170-60 BCE….THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE WRITINGS

Space does not permit us to reproduce the archeological, paleographical, and other evidence which proves that the Dead Sea Scrolls were composed between 170 and 60 B.C. by a Jewish cult which flourished until 69 A D. This material is carefully reviewed by Millar Burrows in his Dead Sea Scrolls. Professor W. F. Libby of the University of Chicago subjected a piece of linen wrapping which covered one of the MSS. to the Carbon-14 Process and found that its date of origin was approximately 33 A.D. Suffice it to say that today no competent scholar doubts that the latest possible date on which any of the Scrolls could have been copied was 68 A.D. This, of course, does not determine the date of composition, which could have occurred at any time during several preceding centuries and which must be determined from internal evidence.

There can be no dispute concerning the authenticity of the Scrolls, which, in addition to several previously unknown and complete documents, now translated and published, include two MSS. of Isaiah and literally thousands of fragments found in various caves. Among these are portions of practically every book of the Old Testament except Ester.

THE LITERATURE OF THE COVENANTEERS

In addition to the Old Testament scriptures, the celibates of Qumran had a sacred literature of their own. Of documents previously known, fragments have been found of the Book of Enoch, The Book of the Jubilees, and The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. In addition, a complete manuscript of The Damascus Document was discovered. We know, therefore, that these writings, long known but never correctly evaluated, must be identified with the Dead Sea Covenanters. Finally, other complete works were also found; these have now been translated and they cast a brilliant light upon the cult: The Manual of Discipline, The Habakkuk Commentary, The War of the Sons of Light with the Sons of Darkness, and The Thanksgiving Psalms.

THE COVENANTEERS AND THE ESSENES ARE THE SAME GROUP

I tend to agree with Mr. A. Dupont-Sommer that the Essenes and the Qumran Covenanters were most certainly one and the same. It is simply incredible that Khirbet-Qumran and its occupants could be anything other than the monastery and the cult described by Pliny, who wrote about 60 A. D.: "Lying on the west of Asphaltites [Dead Sea], and sufficiently distant to escape its noxious exhalations, are the Esseni, a people that live apart from the world, and marvellous beyond all others . . . for they have no women among them; to sexual desire they are strangers; money they have none.... Day after day, however, their numbers are fully recruited by multitudes of strangers that report to them, driven thither to adopt their usage by the tempests of fortune, and wearied with the miseries of life" (Nat. History, Bohn, I, 430-431).

Whether or not Pliny had seen the Qumran monastery, it is certain that his information was accurate: the ascetics who lived there were known to him as Essenes; and, since not the slightest vestige of any other remotely similar group has ever been discovered and since the words of Pliny are reinforced and elaborated not only by Philo and Josephus but also by the Dead Sea Scrolls, we must conclude that they and the Covenanters were iden

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ESSENE COMMUNITY

This unique order, which goes by the name "Essenes," existed for more than two centuries. Only their inner circle knew their esoteric doctrines. The organization consisted almost entirely of male celibates, of whom there were some four thousand. A small percentage of them lived in the Dead Sea Monastery; the remainder, residing in special communal houses scattered throughout Judaea, worked full time at some regular occupation, and were to be found in every walk of life; and so great were the compensations of membership that the Order flourished, even though unaugrnented by the birth of children.

The Essenes adopted the ways of the Pythagoreans. The Essenes were in no wise mendicants, like the Buddhists; nor were they monks, except perhaps the specially selected brethren who lived at Khirbet-Qumran; in fact, there was apparently little external difference between them and other Jews. They did not renounce work; they simply rejected the individualism of the world, its acquisitive ways, the obligations of family and relatives, and the sensual appetites common to humanity.

Let us take note of the statement of Josephus when he said that the Essenes had adopted the Pythagorean way of life (Josephus, Antiq., XV, x, 4). And indeed the parallels between the two were many and striking:

- both were organized into celibate thiasoi, or communal communities;
- both rejected animal sacrifices; both practiced daily baptismal purification and ate common sacramental meals;
- both rejected the use of oaths;
- both were organized on the basis of strict precedence and priority;
- both taught similar doctrines concerning atonement, predestination, and redemption.

Even their eschatology had much in common. The leaders of both were regarded with such veneration that their names must not be uttered; and they were believed to have received revelations directly from God. New members were required to undergo an initiation of several years; novices, having sold all their possessions and placed the money in escrow with the treasurer of the Order, received this back if they were finally rejected, but if accepted it became a part of the communal treasury. The Essenes, however, never adopted the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis: on this one point they remained closer to Zoroastrianism, which had already made deep penetration into Judaic thought. Most scholars characterize Essenism by saying that mature Essenism was seventy per cent Pythagorean, fifteen per cent Zoroastrian, and fifteen per cent Judaistic, which element, however, was pertinent only in relation to its external forms.

To their own satisfaction, the Essenes had delivered the definitive answer to the ethical problem of Job. No longer need the saints be perturbed over the misery of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked, for now they had an eschatology which would right all wrongs in an everlasting existence after death. To achieve the bliss of heaven and escape the eternal torments of hell, God's Elect will love Him and do His will in the present life. To that end, they will combine into communal societies, where all will contribute according to their ability and receive according to their need; by achieving this perfect brotherhood now, the righteous are made fit for the apocalyptic kingdom of God on earth and for a blessed eternity thereafter in heaven.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE ESSENES

THE ZADOKITES AND THE CHASIDIM

During the period preceding the desecration of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, apostacy to Hellenism had become rampant; and, to combat it, a group had arisen known as the Zadokites and later as the Chasidim (Hasidim, Assidaeans). Zadok had been the high priest in the time of David. We must realize that these patriots of 185-160 underwent a complex evolution and division into parties during the ensuing decades. The old name continued as a badge of honor; and therefore we find both the Essenes and the antithetical Sadducees calling themselves the Sons of Zadok as late as 60 B.C. The latter were the nobles, the wealthy, the educated, who composed the dominant class. They rejected the Zoroastrian-Pythagorean eschatology, and were totally unaware of any social injustice.

THE THREE JEWISH PARTIES

During the early Maccabaean campaigns, the original Sons of Zodok, who were simply intensely Judaistic, split into two divisions: the political nationalists, or Sadducees; and the religious enthusiasts, or the Chasidim, who absorbed the Zoroastrian eschatology, remade the Jewish Messiah in the image of the Saoshyant, and engrafted the doctrines of hell, heaven, immortality, resurrection, and the last judgment upon the traditional Judaism. It was a Chasid wrote the last six chapters of Daniel, which became the model for Revelation. The older portions of The Book of Enoch were composed by Chasids, as were other documents ever after held sacred by the Essenes.

While discussing the reign of Jonathan,160-143, who became also high priest in 152, Josephus declares that during this period (about 145) the three great religious sects, which were really political parties, became established among the Jews. He declares that the Sadducees, like the Epicureans, denied the existence of providence and believed in free will; the Pharisees, like the Stoics, believed in determinism; but the Essenes, like the Pythagoreans, taught the doctrine of necessity or fate (Josephus, Antiq., XIII, v, 9). What happened was this: the Sadducees became more conservative economically and politically, but less religious; the Chasidim split into two divisions, the Pharisees and the Essenes. As the last two matured between 145 and l00, their divergence, in spite of their common Zoroastrianism, became wider and deeper. Whereas the Essenes more and more abandoned the temporal, the Pharisees, becoming worldly, sought power, wealth, and popular influence. The latter became the spokesmen for the people, and the former the depository of extreme religious fervor. The Pharisees envisioned a world in which the Jews would rule over a great empire to be established by their human Messiah, the son of David; the Essenes considered themselves the Elect Ones of the Supreme God, chosen by Him to rule over an apocalyptic kingdom of saints to be inaugurated by the supernatural Messiah of Moral Judgment. The Pharisees accepted and developed the Temple worship, while the Essenes, rejecting the ritual of bloodsacrifice, established a severe and all-encompassing discipline based upon faith, sacraments, and holy works. While the Pharisees externalized religion into an elaborately formalized discipline, the Essenes made it a way of life, requiring profound moral regeneration intended to govern every overt act and secret thought. That many of these characteristics already existed by the time of John Hyrcanus in 134 B.C., we can scarcely doubt. Josephus declares that the "Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances . . . which are not written in the laws of Moses and" which "the Sadducees reject," who "are able to persuade none but the rich," while "the Pharisees have the multitude on their side" (Josephus, Antiq., XIII, x, 6). Eventually, the latter elaborated thirty-nine classes of labor forbidden on the Sabbath, and made endless subdivisions under each. Various schools of casuistry arose, which debated the finest points of interpretation. For example, a woman could untie certain knots on the Sabbath, but only if she could do it with one hand. A light night be extinguished to exorcise an evil spirit, but not for the sake of thrift. And so it went.

THE ESSENE EVOLUTION INTO PYTHAGOREANS

Shortly before the year 100 B.C., a revolutionary development took place among the Essenes. A great leader arose among them, who, perhaps, like Zoroaster and Pythagoras traveled abroad and absorbed the religions of Persia, Egypt, and Greece; certain it is that he mastered Pythagoreanism; upon the Zoroastrianized Judaism which already constituted Essene ideology, he engrafted the discipline and the mysteries of the Orphic-Pythagoreans. It is also certain that he claimed a divine power by which to interpret the prophets. It is likely that he composed an additional revelation in the name of Enoch; that he wrote The Manual of Discipline; and that he interpreted various ancient prophecies as descriptions of current catastrophes. He transformed Essenism into a doctrine of social revolt, in which the possession of wealth or property became criminal per se. Under his leadership, the cult abandoned Judaism more than ever before and embraced much broader ideas concerning race and salvation: the Messiah, no longer a mere moral judge nor simply an avenger of the Jews, as in Daniel and Isaiah, became an cosmic godman and an international Saoshyant. In short, under the new dispensation, the Essenes were transformed substantially into Pythagoreans.

THE ESSENES RETRAIN THEIR JEWISH APPEARANCE IN SPITE OF THEIR DOCTRINAL DIVERSITY

The Essenes, however, even while abandoning Judaism in reality, never surrendered the discipline of the Mosaic Law, for which they remained sticklers to the end. Nor did they surrender the Jewish scriptures, especially the prophets, for they saw in these fervent denunciators of wealth and idolatry their own true brethren and forerunners. In order to establish their peculiar doctrine, they composed documents which they attributed to Enoch and the Patriarchs, men whose antiquity did, and whose authority might, exceed that credited to the Torah itself. After adopting the eschatology of Zoroastrianism and the discipline and soteriology of the Pythagoreans, what remained of Judaism was a mere husk, as it were, to support the concepts derived from Persia, India, Greece, and Asia Minor. Thus was formed the great Jewish synthesis which was contemporaneous with Mithraism but which followed Pythagoras by four centuries.

THE GREAT SEPARATION IN JEWISH SOCIETY

We know that John Hyrcanus, 134-104 B.C., the first who assumed the triple crown of ruler, high priest, and prophets, carried out various military expeditions against his neighbors. The Hasmoneans, having achieved independence, immediately sought to establish a savage imperialism upon the Samarians, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and others. Nor were they content with tribute: they gave their neighbors the short shrift of accepting Judaism, being driven from their homes, or suffering death at the point of the sword. About 109 B.C., however, an event occurred which was fraught with fearful consequences for the Jewish nation: Hyrcanus went over to the Sadducees, and embarked upon a career of domestic persecution.

THE MASTER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

It was undoubtedly soon after this that the Essenes reorganized themselves into their thiasoi under their current Master of Justice or Teacher of Righteousness. Thereafter, the fierce struggles between the Pharisees and the Sadducees became a matter of indifference to the Essenes, who withdrew from all such conflicts among the Sons of Darkness and dedicated themselves to meditation concerning the impending apocalyptic catastrophe. Considering this ephemeral existence quite inconsequential, they gave formal allegiance to whatever civil power happened to exercise authority at the moment; but their esoteric religious documents and doctrines became profound secrets, to be shared only by their tried and trusted comrades.

Thus, under the leadership of their Master, the Essenes lived their submerged life for something like forty years preceding Pompey's capture of Jerusalem, which, at a single stroke, put an end to the Hasmonean dynasty and the political independence of the Jews.

Authentic history knows even less concerning the Teacher of Righteousness than it does of Jesus. And is this so strange? The Essenes were sworn to absolute secrecy. Since their doctrines were revolutionary, the publication of these would have brought contemptuous punishment upon them. Even as Pythagoras and his followers were ruthlessly slaughtered, so the Essenes had good reason to fear at all times bloody assault and general destruction. We can only say that the Teacher was venerated by the community, but that his identity was little known beyond its pale.

THE EXECUTION OF THE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

Nevertheless, in spite of their secrecy and their apparently innocuous activity, the Essenes must have incurred suspicion and enmity. They refused to take any oath; they were pacifists; their holy days were different from those of the orthodox; they ignored the Temple worship; they rejected marriage and private property: all this must have been generally known, even though their scriptures were effectively concealed. It is possible that Aristobulus II, the last Hasmonean king, had learned their secrets from spies planted within their ranks. At all events, it is certain that shortly before Pompey rent the veil of the Temple, the Teacher of Righteousness was arrested, tried, condemned to death, and executed. Some have surmised that this was the "Onias, a righteous man . . . and beloved of God," who was stoned to death by "wicked Jews," about 65 (Josephus, Antiq., XIV, ii, 1). However, the evidence is too fragile to establish such a conclusion.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE “TEACHER” INTO THE EXPECTED MESSIAH

Soon after the death and marytrdom of their beloved “Teacher of Righteousness,” the conviction took hold upon his followers that the Teacher had risen from the dead, had ascended to heaven, and would shortly return as the all-powerful Son of Man, surrounded by myriads of angels; and that he would conduct the last judgment, establish the kingdom of heaven upon earth, and send all sinners —that is, all who love material things, indulge in marriage, and reject the communal life—to an eternal flaming hell. The Teacher of Righteousness became thus, in his first appearance, a divine incarnation, who, in his second appearance, was to be a reconstituted Danielic Son of Man who would also be the Messiah of Moral Judgment, actuated by Buddhist-Pythagorean ethical principles. Precisely when his Parousia was expected we cannot now declare with certainty; but we know that the delay was to be brief. Those who had seen his execution expected also to witness his return in glory.

Had the HHasmonean dynasty continued in power after the execution of the Teacher, the Essenes in general would probably have suffered a similar fate. But with the advent of Roman sovereignty in Jerusalem, such destruction could no longer be carried out. The Essenes. therefore, more secretive than ever retired to their monastery and to their various thiasoi throughout the land, to practice their communal living, study their mysterious scriptures, and await their Messiah.

ABSENCE FROM THE MONASTERY

The monastery at Khirbet-Qumran remained unoccupied after the earthquake of 31 until 4 B.C. What was the reason for this? Many scholars believe that a passage in Josephus supplies the key (Josephus, Antiq., XV, x, 4-5). While Herod was very young, the Essene Manahem had prophesied that he would one day be king; and, therefore, "he continued to honour all the Essenes." Because of the constant conspiracies against him, Herod required oaths of allegiance. "The Essenes," however, "were excused from this imposition" (Ibid.). Thus many scholars believe that during the reign of Herod, they enjoyed such favor and immunity that they abandoned their headquarters in the desert.

THE MESSIAH FAILED TO RETURN

By 25 A.D. the Essene Messiah was more than half a century overdue. Their prophecies had failed and Biblically they were not nothing more than "false prophets" worthy of death as prescribed in the Torah. Nevertheless, the air was electric with expectation. The Law was forgotten. At this juncture, John the Baptist, believing himself the incarnate Elijah and the harbinger of the Messiah, appeared suddenly in the wilderness off the shore of Jordan in Judea declaring that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. Things could not, in his opinion, get any worse. God had to be on the verge of interveining. Whether he was an Essene who had left the Order or whether he was simply an individual prophet attempting to establish a cult of his own, we cannot now determine. Like Jesus, he despised and hated Pharisee and Sadducee alike, whom he characterized as "a generation of vipers."

We doubt that the careers of John or of Jesus himself provoked more than a passing ripple within the Essene community. The Essene Messiah, the Teacher of Righteousness, had already completed his earthly career, and, even if his return was inexplicably delayed, there could certainly be no other. And so the Essenes gazed skyward and waited. Their dreams, however, were crushed in the general catastrophe which destroyed the Jewish state in 70 A.D. We know only that the Rornans burned the Khirbet-Qumran monastery and we conclude that the Essenes were scattered to the winds. The destruction as a group is a fitting capstone to their flawed theology as well as their false prophecies. Sadly, many people read the Dead Sea Scrolls looking for soon to be "fulfilled" Christian prophecy. What a waste of time. They were wrong and any who try to re-read their flawed writings wastes their time and millions do so today. Apocalyptic dreams in the pathos of terrible times if a far cry from Divine Revelation.

THE ESSENE/QUMRAN CULT & THEIR GRADUAL REJECTION OF BIBLICAL JUDAISM

Of major importance in our study are the reasons why such "sun-myths" would be accepted by this Essene/Qumran group which began as a fiercely Judaizing program at their beginning. Once one understands the history and the dynamic developments which occurred that pushed this staunchly Jewish fraction away from Judaism then one is better equipped to understand how they would desert from Biblical Judaism over the span of 250 years and adopt a religious philosophy which has more in common with Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, and Pythagoreanism than Judaism. Once one understands the momentous developments that occurred that influenced these "pious ones" during the inter-testamental years then he is better equipped to understand not only the religious evolutions of the Qumran sect but how they could develop into an esoteric cult of celibate-communist apocalypticists at the end which rejected Judaism in toto and adopted not a human Messiah as taught by the Tanakh, but a Cosmic Godman savior as taken from solar myths.

It is to these developments and the chronological presentation of them that we now must turn.

INTER-TESTAMENTAL DEVELOPMENTS THAT PRODUCED THE ESSENE/QUMRAN CULT #1

THE PREMISE OF THESE THREE ARTICLES

As stated previously in preparation of these studies, it is paramount for the reader to understand why a Zadok priesthood, once rejected from their rightful position as high priests following the Maccabeean wars by their own Jewish brothers, would eventually evolve into a Pythagorean-Buddhist-Zoroastrian sect which repudiated in toto Biblical Judaism in the first century.

Many of our readers might say: "How can that be, how could the Qumran cult reject Judaism, they were Jewish"? The answer is simple; their ethnic background is not indicative of their "theological persuasions." Until one is acquainted with the "normative religious theology" of basic Biblical Judaism in the earliest centuries, then it is impossible to differentiate those "theological religious beliefs" which lay outside it. The serious error that most make is in taking for granted the "theological religious belief system" that is contained within the Qumran writings are necessarily "basic normative Judaism." Only in a systematic comparison of the "religious beliefs" of other world religions and comparing them with normative Judaism of the earliest centuries is one capable of discerning those "Qumran religious beliefs" that lay outside of "normative Judaism."

As if that was not enough at the core of importance for the Christian is how Qumran "Messianic Concepts" were changed and altered over 250 plus years whereby they moved completely away from a "human anointed redeemer" to a Cosmic Godman as we find in both the books of Enoch and Daniel. In order to understand these momental changes we must understand the events that precipitated such a radical departure by the Essene/Qumran Sects and their religious beliefs over these 250 plus years. It is to these events that shaped their theology we turn next in these three articles. Once having read the history of the "rejection of the religious purists" then you will come to understand how they literally gave up on a political Davidic redeemer and in desperation set their sights on religious concepts of Divine Cosmic Godmen soters/saviors. At other places on this web-site I detail the "religious evolution" of these Qumran separatists in their individual documents where their theological "creationism" and continual deviation from Jewish religious beliefs can be followed both in a chronological and a religious step-wise procession. This is possibly one of the most important studies for a Christian to undertake as it provides the origin of the Jewish deviation from a human Messiah to a Cosmic Sun-Godman as the Gentile nations had previously embraced due to their Sun-Worship.

It is this "Messianic theological deviation" that Gentile Christianity would eagerly accept and what is responsible for incipient idolatry that exists in Christianity today!

The staggering consequences of this radical departure of these "disillusioned religious purists" hit us squarely in the face today as Christians and followers of Jesus because many of the religious concepts ascribed to Jesus by the "Christian tradition" which cause us to live in false beliefs and idolatry today originated with this small sect of rejected Jews and their loss of hope in their own Scriptures; to combat that they simply "wrote their own...they are the sectarian writings called the Dead Sea Scrolls today."

This apocalytpic theological perspective of the Qumran separatists can now be understood when you step into their shoes and see their lack of hope against all odds as experienced by these persecuted and rejected rightful priests and religious purists.

THE EVENTS THAT PROVIDED THE ULTIMATE SEPARATION OF THE "PIOUS ONES" FROM CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM

The antecedents of the Essene sect can be traced back through a thousand years of Jewish history. Only in the light of that history can the movement really be understood. The ancestors of the Jews were a desert people. Sometime before 1200 B.C. they came pouring into Canaan and, having conquered the country, settled down and learned the way of life of the Canaanites. The details of the story are lost to us, but the central fact of the conquest and the settlement remains.

The invading Hebrews brought with them out of the desert a profound faith in their tribal god Yahweh. At first they doubtless believed in other lesser gods and spirits, as all ancient peoples did, but Yahweh, their particular deity, early became supreme for them. Far back in their tribal history they came to look upon him as their special protector and their leader in battle. At the same time they also began to look upon themselves as his people. He was their God alone and they, correspondingly, were his only people.

Coupled with their faith in their special deity was a faith in the immutability of the moral law. This law, as they conceived it, was simple, direct and elemental. It was the code of corporate life the desert nomads had developed by which to live together. To them this law was no mere set of rules by which to get along with one another; the law was Yahweh's Law, given by him to his people through Moses, their great lawgiver.

The concept of a divine law was not original with the Hebrews. Many hundreds of years before, the Babylonians had engraved in stone a picture of their god handing their great law code to Hammurabi. Other ancient peoples in the Fertile Crescent held the same belief. The difference between the Hebrews and the others was in what they did with it. Among other nations the older idea that law came from deity gradually gave way to a belief that law is only a collection of precepts drawn up by men. Among the Hebrews, however, the belief that their law was God's Law not merely continued strong, but became a central tenet of their religious faith.

Many have thought that this single factor, a belief that their law was ultimately God's Law, explains the extraordinary vitality of the religion of the Hebrews as they emerge in the pages of human history. Credit for making the law central in Israel is frequently accorded to the religious genius of Moses, and none would discount his importance both as a lawgiver and as a leader who helped to center the faith of the people in Yahweh. Others have suggested that Israel's prophets, who, century after century, called the people back from their lax ways to the pure and undefiled worship of Yahweh, should be given the credit for making this belief central in Israel.

The one incontrovertible fact with which we begin is the intransigence of Hebrew religion in the face of the religion of Canaan. As the Children of Israel emerge out of the mists of myth and the haze of legend, we find them already imbued with a passionate devotion to their tribal god Yahweh. In other respects the Hebrew invaders took up the life of the people of Canaan whom they had conquered. They learned from them the arts of civilization and in time they became a society of farmers and artisans. As a result of the close interweaving of the two cultures, the Hebrews eventually absorbed some of the elements in the religion of the Canaanites. They began to worship Baal on the high places, as the Canaanites did.

The kings of Israel and Judah, whose task it was to maintain peace and order among the people, tended to be tolerant of the worship of the gods of Canaan, and tolerant of other lapses from the old tribal religion of Yahweh. If these rulers had been permitted to follow what undoubtedly seemed to them to be a wise and statesmanlike policy, the history of Israel would not have differed from that of half a hundred other nations that rose and perished in the two millenniums before the dawn of the Christian Era. But the kings were not permitted to do so. The special quality in Israel's religion that was hers alone produced a violent reaction to the permissive policies of the secular rulers.

The protest in favor of the ancient faith of Israel, the worship of Yahweh, was voiced by the prophets, a race of men who tower above the ages. The prophets of Israel were completely intolerant of any except the most rigorous adherence to the ancient way. The well-loved story of the contest on Mount Cannel between Elijah and the priests of Baal typifies the conflict that prevailed in that period, and the slaughter of the priests of Baal by the prophet of the Lord is probably as authentic an element as may be found in the Elijah story. The prophets claimed that the statutes of the Lord God permitted no compromise whatever.

Sometimes the prophets went so far as to foment rebellion if they found that a king was neglectful of Yahweh and could not otherwise be induced to mend his ways. It was Elisha who anointed a rebel king in Israel for the purpose of overthrowing the established monarchy. The prophets were not tender in their sentiments; they were fierce in their loyalty to the old religion. They gave no quarter and asked none. Elisha went beyond Elijah in his ferocity to root out the Canaanitic religion from Israel. He wrecked his vengeance on Jezebel and caused to be slain all who had supported the tolerant regime she and Ahab her king had fostered. Amos and Hosea rose in Israel and Isaiah and Micah in Judah continued to demand that the people hold to the ancient way. The kings were denounced for their apostasy, the priests of the Temple for their emphasis upon Temple worship, and the people for their sins.

BECOMING A “CHOSEN PEOPLE” SINCE YOU HAD THE LAWS FROM GOD & NOT FROM MAN

Sometime in the course of the long contest between the prophets of Israel and her kings, a wholly unique idea, that of the chosen people, became prominent. This idea was one of the strongest weapons in the arsenal of the prophets. At least as far back as Amos, the prophets taught that the Jews were Yahweh's elect, living under a special covenant he had made with them. This covenant required the Lord to look upon Israel as his chosen people, and it required the Children of Israel to obey the Law which he had given to them by revelation through Moses.

That concept was either the cause or the result, or both, of the prophetic demand that Israel hold to her ancient faith. Both are cause and both are effect. The two ideas grew up together. Once formulated, however, the idea that Israel was Gods chosen people became controlling. Through the prophets the entire history of Israel came to be viewed in the light of it. Such good fortune as Israel enjoyed was looked upon as the blessing of Yahweh, given as a reward for keeping the covenant. In the same way the sufferings and catastrophes which came to Israel were looked upon as punishment for the failure of the people to keep the covenant.

THE PROPHETIC CYCLE

The prophets turned hindsight into foresight. Their philosophy of history became a threat. Israel had been accustomed to discover past sins in a present catastrophe, but the prophets taught the people to expect future catastrophe as a result of present sin. The prophets, measuring the actions of the people by the ancient Law, found them sinful, condemned them, and then added a warning. Unless the people changed their ways, Yahweh would punish them.

The prophets were vivid and concrete in their descriptions of future catastrophe, and all too frequently the worst of their predictions came true. Thus their philosophy of history established itself in the mind of Israel.

When Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom, was captured and destroyed by Shalmaneser of Assyria, it became clear to all pious Jews that the prophecies of Amos and Hosea had been terribly true. ..The destruction of Israel's capital was Gods punishment of the Northern Kingdom for her sin. Consequently, when not long afterward Assyria again threatened, Hezekiah, king of Judah, became frightened. As a result of the warning of Isaiah that Judah, too, would fall if the people did not follow the Law of Yahweh, the king instituted a great many puritanical reforms designed to restore the pure and unadulterated worship of the Lord God of Israel. And to the astonishment of everyone, Jerusalem did not fall. Miraculously, so it seemed, the city was saved. Again the ability of the prophets to speak on behalf of the Lord seemed to have been demonstrated in a startling manner, and their authority was further increased.

Jeremiah, the most outspoken of all the prophets, demanded once again that Israel return to the ways of her fathers. Josiah, the king, thoroughly alarmed, made the observance of the Law yet more central in the religion of Israel. But Jeremiah could not be satisfied. He called for yet more righteousness, and continued to predict doom for Jerusalem. Even as he had foretold, doom came to the city. It fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 597 and again in 586 B.C. The words of the Lords prophet were vindicated.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF REMNANT THEOLOGY IN ISRAEL

There was a further teaching of the prophets of which we need to take notice. It emerged among the later prophets who were confronted by an exiled people, the unhappy victims of all that the earlier prophets had predicted. God would save a remnant of the people, the prophets now said. On a great day yet to come Israel would be restored, the Temple at Jerusalem rebuilt, and Yahweh would once again be properly worshiped. While the people wept by the rivers of Babylon and asked how they could sing the Lords song in a strange land, the prophets told them how and gave them new hope. God, they said, had not deserted his people. He had only tried them in the fire. Israel, his suffering servant, would be restored to its former glory. One of these prophets was Ezekiel, who had trained as a priest at Jerusalem before its fall. He laid heavy emphasis on liturgical practices and thereby helped to keep the little group of exiles loyal to the religion of their fathers.

In 538, Cyrus of Persia issued an edict by which the Jews were permitted to return to their homeland. The record is obscure, but apparently only a few of the most zealous took advantage of it. They had no great means themselves, and they found the land desolate, and Jerusalem but a heap of debris. They erected a shrine on the site of Solomon's Temple, but attempted nothing more than that.

But again the voice of prophecy was heard, calling upon the people to keep to the ancient way. Haggai, a layman, addressed his words to the governor of Israel and the high priest. “Thus says the Lord,” he cried, “the people say the time has not come to rebuild the house of the Lord. . . . Is it a time for you yourselves to dwell in your paneled houses while this house lies in ruins? . . . Consider how you have fared. Go up to the hills and bring wood and build the house, that I may appear in my glory, says the Lord.” The work was begun at once as a result of his preaching.

Zechariah, a priest, took up the work of exhorting the people, and the newly rebuilt Temple was dedicated about 515 B.C. Still the work of the prophets continued. Still they continued to demand full allegiance to the religion of Yahweh. Worship was now centered in the Temple once more, but the priesthood grew corrupt, and Malachi arose to condemn them. When Nehemiah bad rebuilt the walls of the city, Ezra, a Babylonian scribe, made a new demand that the religion of Israel be purified by dissolving all mixed marriages. The expected reaction arose against this kind of exclusiveness. It is expressed in the books of Jonah and Ruth, both of which are designed to show that Yahweh is a God of all peoples and that his concern reaches beyond the Jews.

So the ancient “Prophetic Cycle” continued between the Prophets continual warning and rebuke of Israel when they sinned. Whenever Israel grew lax in her loyalty to the Lord God Yahweh, a prophet arose in her midst and in the name of the Lord called the people back to the beliefs and the practices of an earlier day. The prophets came from every walk of life, and they preached many and varied doctrines, but a single central theme is found in all of their messages. Israel is the Lords chosen people and a covenant exists between the two. Yahweh will keep his part of the covenant if Israel keeps hers. The task of the prophets was to call upon Israel to keep the covenant, and, when she did not, to denounce priests, kings and people, and to warn them of the wrath that will follow upon their failure. It was out of this vigorous, puritanical, censorious, yet high-minded moral and spiritual stream of thought in Israel that the Essene movement and the Dead Sea Scrolls eventually came.

THE THEOCRACY OF ISRAEL WAS SHORT LIVED

According to Jewish tradition, prophecy died out after 400 B.C. Apparently there was little in the religion of Israel after that time to which even a zealot might take exception. For more than two hundred years Israel lived at peace with herself and her neighbors under the rule of foreign overlords, Persia, Greece and Egypt. Her form of government was a theocracy, all her affairs, both civil and religious, being in the control of the Temple priesthood at Jerusalem. Her rulers were tolerant, and she was free to follow the precepts of her ancient faith as long as she remained subservient and paid the stipulated annual tribute.

When the empire of Alexander the Great broke up following his death in 323 B.C.E., the control of Palestine fell to Egypt. Again Israel became a sort of buffer state between two great rivals, as she had been in the days of the prophets. Now, however, the contending parties were Egypt in the south, ruled by the Ptolemies, and Syria in the north, ruled by the Seleucids. These two nations were political rivals, but culturally they were similar, for after Alexander, most of the civilized world sought to conform to the culture of Hellas. Greek became the international language and Greek ways and modes of thought were everywhere adopted by cultivated people. It was a period of great commercial activity and of great mobility among people, particularly the well-to-do.

During this period, the third century B.C.E., many Jews went abroad to live and trade. A large colony grew up at Alexandria, the capital city of the Ptolemies. There amidst the cosmopolitan life of a great metropolis, they, like the rest of the people, accepted Greek ways and even gave up their native Hebrew language. Many of the Jews were assimilated into the population of the city. Others, however, remained loyal to their own religion, although they adopted Greek ways, spoke and wrote Greek, and even translated their Bible into Greek and altered many of the Hebrew passages from the Masoretic text to conform with Gentile Sun-Worship. This translation, known as the Septuagint, eventually became the Old Testament of the Christians.

Thus Israel increasingly felt the impact upon her ancient faith of the sophisticated Hellenistic culture of the ancient world. As a truly international civilization spread throughout the West, cultivated Jews more and more felt the limitations imposed upon them by their exacting religious culture. Outside Palestine they adapted themselves to it in various ways. In Palestine, and in particular at Jerusalem, however, there was no adaptation and no compromise between the two ways of life. The old conflict which had called forth the wrath of the prophets faced Israel once again. And again Israel had to choose between loyalty to her ancient faith and the demands of a new cosmopolitan culture. It would be the tension between the desire to remain faithful to Yahweh and His Covenant requirements and the liberalism that came with Hellenism that would provide the stage from which the Essene movement would surface.

THE CRISIS OF HELLENISM...ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES...& THE CORRUPTION OF THE PRIESTHOOD IN ISRAEL

The conflict reached a crisis in 175 B.C.E., when Antiochus Epiphanes came to the Syrian throne. Syria had by now wrested control of Palestine from Egypt. Antiochus was by conviction a determined Hellenizer and he believed that the forcing of Greek culture upon the various peoples of his empire would help to consolidate it. With the backing of certain elements in Jerusalem, he marched on the city and took it amid great carnage. He installed as high priest a "son of Aaron" with Hellenistic sympathies who thereupon undertook to enforce the policies of the Syrian monarch upon his own people. Israel knew that their prior captivity had occurred because they had lapsed into idolatry and abandoned the Laws of God and likewise knew that the installment of a Hellenistic high priest was ill tidings of future judgment from God.

Now the Hellenizing of Judea began in earnest. The high priest whose given name was Joshua took the Greek name Jason, began the introduction of Greek customs, built a gymnasium, introduced Greek games, Greek garb, and the Greek language. Many of the younger Jews eager to be rid of the ways of their fathers and to become like other people, were converted. Meanwhile, a deep and growing resentment was engendered among most of the Jews and particularly among those outside of Jerusalem who were unaffected by the broadening tendencies of urban life.

The true attitude of Antiochus Epiphanes became clear when he deposed Jason and put one Menelaus in his place. Menelaus had gone to the Syrian court and offered the king a higher price for the post of high priest than Jason had been willing to pay. Under Menelaus, the Hellenizing process was increased and resentment toward everything Syrian mounted to the point of controlled fury.

At this point war broke out between Egypt and Syria again. This, of course, meant civil war for Palestine once more. The pro-Egyptian Jews, fanatically loyal to the faith of their fathers, fought the pro-Syrian Jews who favored the Hellenizing of Jewish culture. The main body of the Jews were pro-Egyptian and fiercely hated their Syrian rulers. This antagonized Antiochus, who in the course of subduing his rebellious pro-Egyptian subjects, slaughtered unmercifully the people of Jerusalem and entered the Holy of Holies in the Temple, an outrage to the Jewish mind. As a final incredible offense to the Jews, he built an altar to Zeus on top of the Altar of Sacrifice in the Temple and then committed the supreme sacrilege of sacrificing a hog upon it.

The details in regard to the wars that followed need not concern us. The pattern is already familiar in the story of the times of the prophets. The old division persisted between those who favored cosmopolitan tendencies and those who demanded that Israel hold to the ways of her fathers. Again, as before, the internal religious struggle between the Jews themselves was complicated by the ambition of foreign powers to gain control of Palestine and to make her a vassal state. In the days of the ancient prophets, the contenders had been Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia. Now the struggle was between Egypt and Syria and subsequently Rome. Israel again was caught between the hostile armies. When at last the struggle was concluded, Israel had ceased to exist as a nation, the Essene sect had come and gone, and Christianity was already on the way toward the conquest of the Roman Empire.

With Antiochus Epiphanes as ruler of Syria and the master of Israel, with his Greek-minded puppet Menelaus holding the office of high priest, all Jewish practices were outlawed. It is impossible to conceive what that meant to pious Jews unless we keep in mind the long history of devout allegiance to the Law which lay behind them and the intensity of their conviction that Yahweh had made them his chosen people and that they must resolutely follow his precepts as recorded in their sacred books of the Law. Antiochus men also went into the villages around Jerusalem where, accompanied by Jews of the Syrian party, they set up pagan altars. All Judea seethed in resentment and yearned to be free of so intolerable a yoke.

THE RISE OF THE MACCABEES AND THE EMERGENCE OF THE HASIDIM

The Jews could bear no more. Under the leadership of an old priest named Mattathias, who had retired to the country, they again rose in rebellion. Before Syria had the chance to intervene, the rebellion took the form of a civil war of a truly fratricidal nature. The rebels turned upon and slaughtered every apostate Hellenized Jew whom they could lay their hands upon. No one who had cooperated with the Syrian rulers was safe from this reign of terror. When the Syrians attempted to put down the rebellion, the Jews achieved dramatic success against them. When Mattathias died, his eldest son Judas became the leader of the revolt. He struck with such force and fury that he became known as Judas Maccabaeus, that is, "the hammerer," the name by which he is known to history. The wars which he and his brothers carried on are called the Maccabean Wars.

Judas first act was to cleanse the Temple at Jerusalem. He threw down the altar to Zeus and built a new one in it place. Sacrifice in accordance with ancient Jewish custom and practice was instituted once more. The rejoicing in Israel knew no bounds. The Lord had redeemed his people. The Temple and the high altar at Jerusalem had been restored to its former place in the religion of the people. Little Israel had repulsed the great Syrian Empire. A treaty of peace was signed, granting freedom of worship to Israel once more. Thus the rebels had won back the privilege of following the religion of their fathers without the interference of Syrian overlords. They had not actually wanted political independence, nor had they in fact achieved it. They were still subject to Syria as they had previously been subject to Egypt. But now they had the same religious freedom they had enjoyed under the Ptolemies.

Apparently, the most pious of the Jews wanted nothing more than this. It was a matter of no consequence who governed them so long as they were free to worship at the Temple and to follow the Law as they believed they should. There can be no other explanation for the fact that at this point, after religious liberty had been granted to the Jews, the most devout of them, known as the Hasidim, suddenly refused to support Judas, even though they had been his staunch allies in the war with the Syrians and quite possibly had been the instigators of the rebellion in the first instance.

As the lines of cleavage between the Hellenists and their opponents deepened, this group of men had emerged in Israel. The word Hasidim means "the pious." Our sources of information in regard to them are scanty, but it is clear that they were a religious, rather than a political, group. Theologically and probably socially conservative, they tried to live in accordance with the precepts of the ancient Law of their people. Their movement was a reaction to the increasing tendency toward Hellenism that resulted both from the pressures Syria brought to bear on the Jews and also the desire on the part of some of them to adopt the ways of the Greeks. Their course, apparently, was to hold strictly to the ancient piety themselves, rather than try to force the whole populace to do so. In this sense, there was an element of hopelessness in their program. Despairing of keeping all Israel loyal to the ways of their fathers, the Hasidim proposed only that they themselves should remain loyal to Yahweh's ancient covenant.

It is difficult to believe that the Hasidim would have refused continued support of Judas had they been able to see the dire consequences of their withdrawal from the political scene. Undoubtedly, like a great many religious purists, the Hasidim were theoretical rather than practical men. Tender of sentiment, they hated bloodshed, although they had indulged in it themselves when driven to desperation by the abominations of Antiochus Epiphanes. Now that their goal was achieved and the Law had been reinstated, they wanted no more earthly conflict and fratricidal strife. The hasidim, for the reasons enumerated above, withdrew from society "politically" and "religiously" and lived unto themselves. This basically left the Maccabees to the mercy of the Syrians abroad and to the Hellenists at home. They became a "religious" entity unto themselves. Perhaps they were thinking of the theocracy under the Ptolemies. Perhaps they were harking back to the philosophy of Isaiah and Jeremiah who had counseled cooperation with, or neutrality toward, the foreign overlord.

Most probably the Hasidim withdrew their support from Judas, once he had cleansed the Temple and re-established the ancient Mosaic Law in Israel, because they were millennialists. They were thinking of a kingdom not of this world. They were looking for the coming of the Day of Yahweh, the time of divine intervention when Israel would be redeemed of the Lord because the people had kept the covenant. Now was the time for them to put away the sword and by the strictest possible observance of the Law to prepare for the coming of the end of days.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL AND THE HASIDIM'S EXPECTATION OF IMMINENT DIVINE INTERVENTION & THEIR SALVATION

In order to understand the mood and temper of those times in Israel, you only need turn to the Book of Daniel. It is in that climate of opinion that the Maccabean Wars were fought and that the remarkable series of victories over the Syrian Empire were won. The Book of Daniel appeared in December, 165 B.C.E, and had undoubtedly been written just before that time. The book can be dated exactly because the history it contains, though vague at first, gains increasing clarity and accuracy of detail down through December, 165, after which time the details are simply wrong.

The Book of Daniel must have caused a sensation when it first appeared. In part it was narrative, relating the steadfastness of Daniel and his brothers in the face of persecution under Nebuchadnezzar and how the Lord intervened to protect them. The major part of the book, however, tells of a series of dreams of the future which Daniel had. In these passages are to be found veiled references to the time of the persecution of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes. Then it relates that at the "time of the end," when the Jewish people as a whole will be made to suffer in a similar manner, the Lord will again intervene on their behalf. The parallels to the Maccabean period, stated in allegorical fashion, are as dear to those who are familiar with the history of that period as they were to the Jews of the second century B.C.E.

There is probably no better explanation of the phenomenal success of the Jews in the Maccabean Wars than the Book of Daniel and the belief it generated among the Jews that the Lord God would intervene on their behalf if they kept the faith and the Law of God. For this to happened the people needed a high priesthood of such a holy nature that it would lead the people by example. Thus the Book of Daniel induced an apocalyptic mood among the people and made them fight with fanatical ferocity and bravery. Obviously the Hasidim accepted this philosophy, although they believed that fidelity to the Law rather than the use of the sword would bring about the promised salvation of Israel.

THE CONTINUED CORRUPTION OF THE PRIESTHOOD AND THE EXTERMINATION OF THE HASIDIM

Their withdrawal of support came at a dramatic moment. Syria, as a result of her treaty of peace with Judas, was still the nominal ruler of Judea, although Judas was the ruler in fact. An issue arose over the high priesthood. The Syrian king had appointed one Alcimus to the post vacated by Menelaus, the hated high priest "who had the fury of a cruel tyrant and the rage of a wild beast," and who had been exiled and was later executed. Judas and the Maccabees, however, opposed the appointment because Alcimus was a Hellenist and because they were not willing to grant to Syria the right to appoint the high priest, a right they held to belong to Israel alone.

In order to see that Alcimus was duly installed in office, the Syrian monarch sent an army into Judea. Judas wanted to drive the army out of his country as he had so successfully driven out every Syrian army that had entered Palestine since the time he had taken command of the nations affairs thirteen years before. Alcimus, like any political leader, attempted to undermine the position of Judas by assuring the Hasidim that he, Alcimus, would support their purist policies, even though he was by conviction a Hellenist. The Hasidim were satisfied. Dismissing as unwarranted and irrelevant the forebodings of Judas and the Maccabees, they recognized Alcimus as the legitimate high priest. All further resistance on the part of the Maccabees thus became useless, and Alcimus was installed by the Syrians.

Alcimus thereupon executed sixty of the Hasidim. The record is obscure. His motives are not clear to us. Obviously he intended to placate the Syrian monarch who had suffered so much at the bands of the revolting Jews. But what had these men done to provoke their execution by the high priest? Was the charge sedition? Alcimus doubtless made them appear as enemies of the state because of their determined opposition to all Hellenism. He presumably singled out the helpless Hasidim, who now could not and probably would not rebel, rather than the still dangerous Maccabees.

It is risky to make too much out of an event so lost in the shadows of time. But we may assume that the execution of sixty of the Hasidim by a man who had promised to support them was a terrible blow to these religious purists. It was too late now for them to join forces with Judas and the Maccabees whom they had deserted. Sixty of their beloved had been killed by the man they had trusted. Where was the Lord God whom they had expected to intervene and save sixty of his most holy? This marked the end of their movement and we never hear of them afterward.

OUT OF THE ASHES OF THE HASIDIM EMERGE THE QUMRAN SECT

During the period preceding the desecration of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, apostasy to Hellenism had become rampant; and, to combat it, a group had arisen known as the Zadokites and later as the Chasidim (Hasidim, Assidaeans). Zadok had been the high priest in the time of David. We must realize that these patriots of 185-160 underwent a complex evolution and division into parties during the ensuing decades. The old name continued as a badge of honor; and therefore we find both the Essenes/Qumran sect and the antithetical Sadducees calling themselves the Sons of Zadok as late as 60 B.C. The Sadducees were the nobles, the wealthy, the educated, who composed the dominant class. They rejected the Zoroastrian-Pythagorean eschatology of the Qumran sect and were totally unaware of any social injustice. With the disappearance of the Hasidim the story of the Essenes/Qumran sect begins. The Hasidim were not Essenes, and the Essenes were not the Hasidim. Each was a distinct movement. Yet, insofar as we can judge from the scanty evidence that has come down to us, the two were so close in their purpose and their general outlook that we are justified in saying that the Hasidim were progenitors of the Essenes. The Essenes took up the attempt to maintain the ancient piety of Israel that the Hasidim had begun. They carried Hasidist piety to the ultimate extreme of withdrawal from human society in order to preserve it.

THE EMERGENCE OF THREE JEWISH PARTIES

During the early Maccabaean campaigns, the original Sons of Zadok, who were simply intensely Judaistic, split into two divisions:

- The political nationalists, or Sadducees;
- The religious enthusiasts, or the Hasidim

It would be these religious enthusiasts, the Hasidim, who would:

- Absorb the Zoroastrian eschatology
- Remade the Jewish Messiah in the image of the Saoshyant
- Engrafted the doctrines of hell, heaven, immortality, resurrection, and the last judgment upon the traditional Judaism.

It was a Chasid who wrote the last six chapters of Daniel, which became the model for Revelation. The older portions of The Book of Enoch were composed by Chasids, as were other documents ever after held sacred by the Essenes.

While discussing the reign of Jonathan, 160-143 B.C.E., who became also high priest in 152, Josephus declares that during this period (about 145 B.C.E.), the three great religious sects, which were really political parties, became established among the Jews. He declares that the Sadducees, like the Epicureans, denied the existence of providence and believed in free will; the Pharisees, like the Stoics, believed in determinism; but the Essenes, like the Pythagoreans, taught the doctrine of necessity or fate (Josephus, Antiq., XIII, v, 9).

THE HASIDIM SPLIT INTO PHARISEES AND THE QUMRAN SECT/ESSENES

What happened was this: the Sadducees became more conservative economically and politically, but less religious; the Chasidim split into two divisions, the Pharisees and the Qumran sect/Essenes. As the last two matured between 145 and l00 B.C.E., their divergence, in spite of their common Zoroastrianism, became wider and deeper. Whereas the Essenes/Qumran sect more and more abandoned the temporal, the Pharisees, becoming worldly, sought power, wealth, and popular influence. The Pharisees became the spokesmen for the people, and the Essenes the depository of extreme religious fervor.

In no other place do we find such religious disagreement among the Pharisees and the Qumran sect as found in their doctrines concerning the Messiah:

- The Pharisees envisioned a world in which the Jews would rule over a great empire to be established by their human Messiah, the son of David;
- The Essenes considered themselves the Elect Ones of the Supreme God, chosen by Him to rule over an apocalyptic kingdom of saints to be inaugurated by the supernatural Messiah (Angel-Messiah) of Moral Judgment.

The Pharisees accepted and developed the Temple worship, while the Essenes, rejecting the ritual of blood sacrifice, established a severe and all-encompassing discipline based upon faith, sacraments, and holy works. While the Pharisees externalized religion into an elaborately formalized discipline, the Essenes made it a way of life, requiring profound moral regeneration intended to govern every overt act and secret thought. That many of these characteristics already existed by the time of John Hyrcanus in 134 B.C., we can scarcely doubt. Josephus declares that the "Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances . . . which are not written in the laws of Moses and" which "the Sadducees reject," who "are able to persuade none but the rich," while "the Pharisees have the multitude on their side" (Josephus, Antiq., XIII, x, 6). Eventually, the latter elaborated thirty-nine classes of labor forbidden on the Sabbath, and made endless subdivisions under each. Various schools of religious quibbling arose, which debated the finest points of interpretation. For example, a woman could untie certain knots on the Sabbath, but only if she could do it with one hand. A light night be extinguished to exorcise an evil spirit, but not for the sake of thrift. And so it went.

THE REJECTION OF THE TRUE SONS OF ZADOK AND THE CONTINUED CORRUPTION & HELLENIZATION OF THE PRIESTHOOD

We are now in a period about fifty years after Alcimus treacherously slew sixty of the Hasidim. The intervening years had seen bitter fratricidal strife among the Jews and almost constant warfare with Syria and occasionally with Egypt as well. Nevertheless, the Maccabean uprising succeeded, at least to a certain degree, and as a result, Israel became an independent self-governing state.

After the installation of Alcimus as high priest all the fears of Judas Maccabaeus in regard to him proved to be justified. We have seen the bitter disillusionment of the Hasidim whose withdrawal of support from Judas enabled Syria to elevate Alcimus to the office of high priest. Most of the rest of Israel felt equally bitter. While the Syrian kings kept the pact made with Israel at that time, which provided for freedom of worship, Syria never gave up her claim to rule Palestine, and never ceased her effort to reduce the Maccabees to the status of vassals of the Syrian crown.

Consequently, a contest for power between Judas Maccabaeus and Alcimus began almost at once. Soon Alcimus appealed to the Syrian king for help. Another army was sent into Palestine, but Judas met and defeated the Syrian forces in a pitched battle during which he lost his life. Alcimus, now in full control of the civil affairs of Israel, took the opportunity to avenge himself on his enemies, the followers of Judas.

Although he was a “son of Zadok,” a descendant of one of Israel's priestly families, and although on accepting the office of high priest he had agreed to support the policies of the Hasidim, Alcimus now revealed himself as a true Hellenist and he relaxed the observance of the Torah, and went so far as to throw down the walls of the inner court of the Temple at Jerusalem. But he misjudged the temper of the average Jew. While there were Hellenists enough among them to constitute a strong and warlike party, the rank and file of the Children of Israel was outraged. In their veins flowed the blood of generations of men passionately devoted to the following of the Law and they would tolerate no significant change in the old ways. When Alcimus died soon after, his death was generally regarded by the pious as the judgment of God upon him.

In the hills of Judea, meanwhile, Jonathan, another of the Maccabee brothers, had raised a new rebel force from the remnants of the army of Judas. Intermittent strife continued, the war with the Syrians went on, and the land knew no peace. Always Syrian interests were supported by the Hellenists, who were to be found largely among the priestly families of Jerusalem and who sought political power for themselves through Syrian intervention.

Jonathan, the Maccabee, profiting by the experience of his brother Judas, would permit no one to be appointed high priest. The powers and perquisites of the office were so great that his own position as civil ruler would most certainly have been jeopardized. The office of the high priest remained vacant for six years, but, because the religion of Israel required such an official, Jonathan, a non-Zadok, was persuaded to accept the position himself and he appointed himself high priest. Simon, the last of the Maccabee brothers, followed Jonathan as both high priest and ruler of the state. John Hyrcanus, his son, succeeded him in both offices, although not without some difficulty.

What you need to understand is that there were rightful "priest" ready to assume that position but were prevented from doing so by Jonathan, Simeon, and John Hyrcanus. This alienated the true Zadok priests and these disenfranchised priests will become the group of religious zealots known today as the Qumran sect/Essenes.

John Hyrcanus was the first of the so-called Hasmoneans. Like his father, Simon Maccabaeus, and his uncles, Jonathan and Judas, John Hyrcanus was a devout Jew and intensely loyal to the ancient traditions of Israel. Following the practice established by his uncle Jonathan, he took the office of high priest, and like him, he also refrained from assuming the title of king.

SEPARATION AMONG THE JEWS: EMERGENCE OF THE SADDUCEES AND THE PHARISEES

Party alignments at this time continued very strong. On the one hand there were still the pro-Syrian Hellenistic Jews, and on the other, the devout conservative pious Jews, spiritual descendants of the Hasidim, who would permit no deviation from the old way. What comes next is crucial to understand! Both parties, the Hellenistic Jews (Sadducees) and the descendants of the Hasidim (Pharisees and ultra strict Pharisees called later the Qumran sect) boasted many members who were "Sons of Zadok," who, by virtue of their descent from Zadok, high priest under David, could claim the right to the high priesthood. In the middle were the Maccabees, the war party and the patriots, the rulers of the state, who strove to maintain the political independence of the little kingdom and to preserve inviolate the ancient religion of Israel.

By this time the men of the Hellenistic party had come to be known as the "Sadducees," a name derived from "Zadok." Why they chose the name we can only guess. There were quite as many sons of Zadok in the Pharisee and Qumran sect opposing them. Since they Sadducees were the liberalizing party, they probably took a name which suggested the authority and propriety that proper descent conferred upon them.

As stated, one of the opponents of the Hellenizing Sadducees were known as the Pharisees, a name which means the "Separators It was obviously an epithet. Those who draw aside from the main body of men and strive to be holier than the common man, almost invariably elicit jeers for their efforts. Those who would not fight in support of the Maccabees and who would permit no modification in the archaic Jewish ways apparently came to be looked upon as "separators." The Pharisees were thus the party in John Hyrcanus time that strove to hold Israel to the old prophetic ideal as had the Hasidim in the time of Judas Maccabaeus. Louis Finkeistein, the leading authority on the subject, says the Pharisees were the spiritual children of the Hasidim.

By the same token they were also the spiritual children of the prophets. There was, however, one conspicuous difference between the Pharisees and the ancient prophets. The Pharisees, even in the days when the movement was young, were a party which enjoyed considerable political influence in Israel. John Hyrcanus, devout Jew that he was, threw in his lot with the Pharisees (at least for a short time), and they, therefore, had the opportunity in accordance with their own lights of enforcing the Torah. The prophets had usually been lonely figures who in the name of Yahweh denounced the priest, king and people alike. Sometimes they enjoyed royal favor, but more often they did not. During this period, when prophecy was thought long since to have ceased in Israel the circumstances were curiously reversed, for under John Hyrcanus, the Pharisees who espoused the old prophetic ideal enjoyed the approval and the backing of the ruler of the state.

THE REJECTION OF THE PHARISEES BY JOHN HYRCANUS

But John Hyrcanus was to abandon them eventually. Josephus tells us that some time during the course of his rule John Hyrcanus gave a dinner for the Pharisees. When the feasting was over he invited their suggestions and criticisms upon the godliness of his rule. All the Pharisees praised him except a single Pharisee, Eleazar, who refused to join in the commendations and demanded that Hyrcanus give up the office of high priest (remember he was a non-Zadok and the religious zealots and purists required a Zadok high priest in hopes of ensuring no future chastisement from God). "Since thou desirest to know the truth," he said, "if thou wilt be righteous in earnest, lay down the high priesthood and content thyself with the civil government of the people." The record is by no means clear, but Eleazar seems to have felt that it was wrong for a ruler whose hands were stained with the blood of battle to offer sacrifice at the high altar in the Temple. Josephus also indicates that this lone objector voiced some doubts about Hyrcanus true descent from Aaron and Zadok.

The spirit of prophecy was apparently not yet dead in Israel, for the demand of Eleazar was in the true prophetic tradition. The reaction of Hyrcanus was according to tradition also. He switched his loyalty from the Pharisees to the Sadducees, set aside the Pharisaic religious ordinances, and forbade the observance of them. We can readily understand the position of each. Eleazar would not compromise with what he regarded as the religion of Yahweh. John Hyrcanus, on the other hand, found it impossible to please such religious perfectionists as Eleazar. Nor could he give up the office of high priest, thus jeopardizing his rule in Israel. The Maccabees before him had learned that lesson.

Another consideration probably played a part in the abandoning of the Pharisees by Hyrcanus. While the Pharisees enjoyed the support of the multitude, the Sadducees were still strong. Tolerant and cosmopolitan in their outlook, they were a far more congenial group than the zealous Pharisees and their demand for the enforcement of rigid ordinances. Hyrcanus would naturally have considered switching his support to the Sadducees for a long time. Thus when Hyrcanus' dinner for the Pharisees was concluded, these religious zealots (Pharisees/ultra purists from the Hasidim), who had enjoyed political power and public favor, suddenly found themselves without either. They who were the inheritors of the exacting tradition of the Hasidim now saw their old enemies, the Hellenists, back in power.

This turn of events must have been humiliating to the Pharisees. More than that, it must have filled them with dismay. Devout believers in the Law, and accustomed to the use of political power to enforce it, they now found themselves in much the position of the Hasidim who fifty years earlier, after accepting Alcimus as high priest, were turned upon by him. Hyrcanus sudden transfer of support to the Sadducees must have aroused memories in some of the older Pharisees, who may actually have witnessed the debacle under Alcimus.

THE WAY OF WITHDRAWAL...THE REMNANT...THE ONLY ANSWER

When they had been abandoned by Hyrcanus, these "rejected separatists" must have realized that the way chosen by the Hasidim, the way of withdrawal, was now the only alternative open to them. No longer could they hope to bring all Israel to a strict following of the Law through the exercise of civil authority. Both in thought and practice, the Hellenizing process had gone too far. Consequently, in the midst of the easy urbanity of Jerusalem, there was nothing for them to do but to continue to try to follow the Law themselves, leaving others to do as they chose. They alone, if necessary, would keep Israel's ancient covenant with Yahweh. At the same time they may have wondered if Temple worship itself was any longer valid, if there was doubt about the Aaronic descent of the high priest. It was probably during this period, when they tried to separate themselves from the ceremonial uncleanness of the rest of the people, that the inheritors of the old Hasidist philosophy began to be called Pharisees, or "Separators" by their countrymen.

The Pharisees, of course, did not completely succeed in their endeavor. They were surely forced to make some concessions in spite of their best intentions. It is difficult for religious groups to continue ancient religious prescriptions in the complicated society in which they live. As time passes, such rules become more archaic. The difficulty of living in a community that does not observe them increases. Only in a separate community, where all think alike and all desire to submit to the same regulations, can such practice be continued successfully.

We may be confident then that slowly and inevitably the Pharisees were forced to make a choice. At last there came a time when it was clear to these Pharisees and proto-Hasidim that they had either to compromise their ideals and religious beliefs or to withdraw from society. Apparently there was a division on this issue, and out of this division among the Pharisees the Qumran/Essene sect seems to have come into existence.

One needs to understand the Qumran sect/Essenes were more than one ideology; they consisted of rejected Zadoks from the time of the Hasmoneans as well as staunch Pharisee separatists like those rejected by John Hyrcanus.

Those among these "religious separatists" who felt that it was possible to stay in Jerusalem and remain loyal to the Law became the real founders of the sect which still bears their name. Traditionally, the Pharisees were the party in Israel that sought to remain loyal to the ancient Law and yet by interpretation to show how it was possible to do so in an urban and changing society. The same exacting adherence to the ideal, interpreted in accordance with the practical problems of living, continued to characterize the best Pharisaic thought throughout the existence of the group.

Those who eventually withdrew to the desert to join the already existing community of "rejected Zadoks" and who are known to history as the Qumran Sect/Essenes were of the temper that tolerates no deviation from the old way. While the modifiers argued that their modifications were proper interpretations and emendations of the ancient faith, the literalists insisted that any such attempt was a compromise or an out-and-out departure, which could under no circumstances be permitted. It would be men of such temper who made up the group within the Pharisees that eventually became the Qumran Sect/Essenes.

SO WHY MOVE TO THE DESERT?

Josephus records no such division among the Pharisees after John Hyrcanus dinner. If we grant the likelihood of such a division after he switched his support to the Sadducees, we still need to explain why and how that split became so serious that the most extreme members of the Pharisaic party went to live in the desert by themselves. It seems unlikely that when the purists discovered that they could not bring all the Pharisees to their position, they would then have stomped off into the Judean wilderness. Such a decision would have come only after a long time, after they argued among themselves at length as to what course to pursue next. To explain their voluntarily undertaking the rigors of life in the desert, something more is required than the loss of political power and internal disagreement.

Again we find an answer in the history of Israel. While Josephus does not explicitly say that a new wave of Hellenization set in after John Hyrcanus threw his support to the Sadducees, he does record that the Pharisaic ordinances were repealed and that their observance was forbidden. This would mean the persecution of those who would not conform. Furthermore, old wounds heal slowly and the zeal of the Judaizers in rooting out the Hellenizers during the early Maccabean period must have left many a granulating wound among the members of the Hellenistic party that they were glad of the opportunity to avenge. We may certainly assume that enough reprisals followed to have been a source of suffering to many of the Pharisees. Persecution, together with the official repealing of the old regulations, would have made them yet more difficult to follow even by those predisposed to do so.

One must remember the time of these events (135-100 B.C.E.).

It would be under the continued persecution and rejection, along with the death of their Teacher of Righteousness that the religious purists would slowly drift away from Biblical Judaism and that explains that their religious doctrines change as found within their writings.

There was another factor. The expectation of the end of days, so clearly voiced in the Book of Daniel, increasingly dominated the thinking of the most religious of Israel's people at this time. Soon after the Book of Daniel made its appearance, the Book of Enoch appeared. Its purpose was to justify the ways of God to men and in particular to explain why God permitted so many things to happen which, by human standards of divine justice, should never have occurred. To achieve this purpose the author of Enoch, making liberal use of the Book of Daniel, confidently predicted the end of the world. At that time, he said, God will judge the world. The just shall live forever in peace and the wicked shall be destroyed.

This view was a reflection of a much more widely prevailing notion that history was cyclic rather than linear, and that the end of one of history's great cycles was at hand. A sense of impending doom was in the air. The Judgment Day seemed not to be far off. For those who believed in its coming, it was important above all else to be ready.

That this frame of mind was central with the Essenes we know from their own literature. This group of extreme purists went into the desert, among other reasons, to prepare for the coming of the Judgment Day, the Day of Yahweh, which they thought was imminent. If Israel, God's chosen people, would not prepare themselves for that awful time, these men at least, as a self-appointed latter-day remnant of Israel, determined to do so. Alone in the wilderness, they proposed to live according to the strictest possible interpretation of the ancient Law of their people.

They found in the writings of the Prophet Isaiah the suggestion that they go into the Judean desert: "In the wilderness prepared the way of the Lord." They had tried to prepared for the Lord's coming in Jersualem and they had failed. In the Scripture they found an answer. The Hebrew word, translated as "wilderness,: in this passage, means not merely a dry and desolate region, but also the kind of depression in the earth in which the Dead Sea plain lies. We must not conclude that these Qumran sect/Essene "separatists" went into the Judean desert only because of this passage in Isaiah. It probably did not acquire full prophetic meaning for them until after they had actually begun their life there. But the clear import of the words could hardly have escaped them while they were making up their minds. All the above factors must be considered in understanding why the Qumran desert was to be the new home of this apocalytpic cult.

Another factor ties into our story. John Hyrcanus was an able ruler. Israel enjoyed internal peace and prosperity under him. With such favorable conditions a religious movement would be able to develop and reach a point when at last it would be strong enough to establish itself in the desert. Conditions of war would make this development impossible.

It was a significant day for the world when the old uncompromising Pharisee Eleazar openly challenged the right of a political ruler of Israel to occupy the office of high priest. When the monarch refused to yield to his demands and withdrew all political support from the Pharisees, they were left with only such cause for continued existence as the power of their own religious convictions might call forth. From then on until the end of the reign of Alexander Jannaeus the Pharisaic party in Israel was forced to confine itself to religious and moral ambitions. After the manner of the prophets, some if not all of the Pharisees now stood apart from the organized Temple worship at Jerusalem and apart from the government of John Hyrcanus. In the name of the Lord God Yahweh, they henceforth dared to criticize both.

The reader is encouraged to understand that it was the peculiar character of Israels long history and dedication to the Laws of God that made them a "chosen people" that produced the crisis between John Hyrcanus and Eleazar. Had these two men never lived, the issue would surely have crystallized in some other way.

The Qumran Sect/Essene movement had its roots in one of the ancient and one of the high traditions of a great people. Its thought, mood and temper belonged to the greatest days Israel had known, the days of the prophets. The prophetic spirit was rekindled again in Eleazar. It burned again in the hearts of the strictest among the Pharisees, who by all human standards were already strict enough in their loyalty to the old way. They were like the prophets in the intransigence of their demand that Israel, as God's chosen people, remain loyal to their covenant with him. For this reason, when John Hyrcanus dinner was over, currents were set to flowing out of which the Qumran Sect/Essene Sect eventually emerged.

The great antagonist of the Teacher of Righteousness was the Wicked Priest. Our knowledge of him, like that of the Teacher of Righteousness, is very limited, for in the Scroll literature that has so far come to light he is mentioned only in the Habakkuk Commentary and in the Commentary on Psalm 37 in the fragment literature.

The problem in connection with the Wicked Priest is further complicated by the presence in the Scrolls of a number of apparently similar rascals who are variously designated. In the Habakkuk Commentary, for example, we find "The Preacher of the Lie" and "The Man of the Lie." In the Damascus Document we find "One who preached with lies," "The Man of Falsehood" and "The Man of Scoffing." In the Commentary on Nahum in the fragment literature there appears "The Lion of Wrath." In no case is the context clear enough to identify positively the persons referred to by these names as the Wicked Priest.

When all the references are considered, however, it appears that the Essenes had at least two quite different individuals in mind. On the one hand was the Wicked Priest and on the other was the Deceiver, a man who preached lies and falsehood and who scoffed at the Scroll sect. He seems to have led the people into backsliding and into "seeking after smooth things." The more we learn of this individual, the more it appears that he originally had the confidence of the Scroll sect but later became the leader of a group of malcontents. There is probably little chance of our identifying him with any known historical personage for the several references are too vague.

IDENTIFYING THE WICKED PRIEST

When we turn to the Wicked Priest, however, we are on more solid ground. We cannot be sure he was the Lion of Wrath. Some think he was, and others that he was not. We cans however, be confident that there was such a person who lived in Israel at one time and who persecuted the Teacher of Righteousness, although it must be acknowledged that here too a few scholars dissent. They argue that "Teacher of Righteousness" and "Wicked Priest" are to be looked upon as titles that apply to many individuals, in the manner that we use the word king or chairman. The view has little support, however, because among other reasons there are so many such terms. While we can easily think of these as epithets used to describe specific individuals, it seems quite preposterous to think of the Essenes not only designating one series of men as the Teacher of Righteousness, and another series as the Wicked Priest, but yet others as the Lion of Wrath, the Man of the Lie, and the Man of Scoffing.

Who was the Wicked Priest? If we can identify him we shall perhaps be well along the road to identifying the Teacher of Righteousness and to the dating of the origin of the Essene sect. In the unhappy period of Israels history with which we are dealing, a time when brother was almost constantly at war with brother in a bloody fratricidal strife, the identification of the Wicked Priest is not as easy as we might suppose. There are several likely candidates for the dubious honor. Each attempted identification has been shown to be faulty. Opinion, however, seems slowly to be converging on Alexander Jannaeus as the most likely person. The Commentary on Nahum fragment, which speaks of the Lion of Wrath, makes this surmise seem more likely.

ALEXANDER JANNAEUS

Certainly there is no one who fits the role better than Alexander Jannaeus. He was king and high priest in Israel from 104 to 78 B.C. His father was John Hyrcanus, who had come to rule Israel only because he had had the good fortune to escape a plot on the part of his sisters husband to murder him. In the plot Hyrcanus father, Simon Maccabaeus, and both of his brothers were murdered.

When John Hyrcanus died, he bequeathed the government of Israel to his widow, and the high priesthood to his eldest son Aristobulus. This was in the year 105 B.C.E. Alexander Jannaeus, as the second son of Hyrcanus, got nothing. But he soon learned how dangerous it is to be in line for succession to a throne in turbulent times. Aristobulus, upon being installed as high priest, immediately imprisoned his own mother, his younger brother Alexander Jannaeus and all his other brothers. This is yet another illustration of the power which always came into the hands of the man who held the office of high priest. Aristobulus then made himself king as well as high priest. Within a year, however, he "died in agony," so Josephus says. Such was Alexander Jannaeus introduction to the ways of men who desire power, and he learned his lesson at the hands of his own blood brother. How well he took these things to heart we shall presently see.

On the sudden death of Aristobulus, the control of Israels affairs came into the hands of Aristobulus widow, Alexandra, a most resourceful woman. She opened the prison doors, released the brothers of her dead husband and married the eldest of them who was Alexander Jannaeus. This made Alexander both the high priest and king of Israel. He inherited a small shaky domain that extended from the mountains of Lebanon in the north to the desert land south of Palestine and extended from somewhere east of the Mediterranean Sea coast to the region beyond the Jordan in the east. It is difficult to tell now just which of these east Jordan regions he actually ruled, but at best it was nothing more than an assembly of little principalities of subject people.

Alexander Jannaeus devoted the first nine years of his reign to campaigns in the east and south of his little empire, in an attempt to keep it in subjection and to extend its borders as far as possible. His methods were no better than those of any other warrior in those times. They could hardly have been worse. The barbarous cruelty of the victor in those days almost passes belief. But the effect of these campaigns, and the bloody manner with which they were conducted by the king of Israel, who was also high priest, outraged the sensibilities of the pious Jews. The Pharisees, in particular, who had found fault with John Hyrcanus, now looked upon Alexander Jannaeus as an utter desecration of their religion, their Temple, and the Law.

THE LEMON INCIDENT

The extent to which feeling was mounting against him in Israel is made clear through an incident recorded by Josephus. In his role as high priest, Alexander Jannaeus was celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles on one occasion during this period, when he was pelted with lemons by the people. When we consider that he was standing at the high altar, the most sacred place in all Israel except the Holy of Holies; when we remember that in offering sacrifice to Yahweh he was engaged in one of Israels most sacred acts; and when finally we remind ourselves that this happened at one of the most sacred times in the entire Jewish calendar, some notion of the pent-up feelings of the populace may be gathered. Very probably he had just previously been off at war for a long span of time, up to the elbows in the blood of those who opposed him, meanwhile neglecting his priestly duties at the Temple. No devout Jew could endure either of these patent offenses to his religion and his God.

Very possibly Jannaeus returned to Jerusalem at this particular festival for the special purpose of offering sacrifice in his role as High Priest. In any case, the pent-up fury of the people could no longer be restrained. Seeing him there, and led on by the Pharisees, the people showed their disgust and their shame in the harmless but thoroughly insulting fashion of throwing lemons at him. The act was not premeditated; it appears to have been quite spontaneous. The people had not come to the Temple having in advance armed themselves with rotten fruit. They had the lemons with them as part of their votive offerings, and flung them at him in anger rather than giving them up as offerings.

Jannaeus response was characteristic of the man who was the leading contender for the role of "Wicked Priest" in the Dead Sea Scrolls literature. Josephus says Alexander Jannaeus, the high priest, slew six thousand men by way of revenge, and to impress the importance of his dignity and authority on the people. These were not warriors fomenting rebellion that he slaughtered with the aid of his mercenaries. They were his own people, his own blood kin. Furthermore, they were the most pious of his subjects, the most high-minded and the most moral. Those whom he slew were men who opposed bloodshed and who had expressed their outraged feelings not with the sword, but with lemons!

SANCTIFICATION WITHIN JUDAISM DIFFERENT SECTS AND DEGREES EMERGE

We have observed previously that we cannot say exactly when the strictest of the Pharisees divided themselves off from the main body of the group and went out into the desert to live apart from their capital city, separated from the Temple and completely withdrawn from the body politic. We have seen that they may have done so some time after the rift with John Hyrcanus, father of Alexander Jannaeus. But in the story of the lemons, we have still another instance of the fact that, however the details are worked Out, the general outline remains the Same. If the loss of political power under John Hyrcanus did not cause the Pharisee extremists to go out into the desert, certainly the slaughter of six thousand of the most devout among them would have done so. They might have fled to the desert for safety's sake if for nothing else.

If, however, the reader still is doubtful, if he wants to hold closely to the reported facts and does not think sufficient reason for the departure to Qumran has yet been found, there is more tragedy for devout Jews still to come which will surely provide all the motivation for going out into the desert the most exacting person could desire to find. Alexander Jannaeus had even more terrible things in store for those who dared to oppose him. Supposing himself to be more firmly established in his authority than ever before, the warrior priest now began a new war of conquest, this time against one of his Arab neighbors. In the course of it, however, he and his army were ambushed and he barely escaped with his life. In terror, be fled back to Jerusalem.

Now at last the time seemed ripe to be rid of him completely. The Pharisees who loathed him utterly as a man, and who yearned to avenge the death of the six thousand of their number he had slain in cold blood, now rose in arms against him. There followed six more years of bloody fratricidal strife of which Judea had already seen so much. Jannaeus relied upon his mercenaries and such Jewish support as he could get. The rebels fought fanatically and Josephus says that before this particular civil war was over fifty thousand Jews lay dead. One wonders whence came the manpower for the slaughter to which the Jews were so continuously subject during and after the Maccabean period.

What part did the Essenes play in this conflict? Our first answer to this question is that we do not know because we are not told in any of our sources. We cannot even be positive that they existed as a separate party at this time, 94-89 B.C., although the archeological evidence for the building of the Community Center at Qumran at an earlier date seems almost conclusive. We have in the Psalms ample evidence to support this view. They are filled with references that seem to have been written by someone who barely escaped the carnage of this period.

Josephus estimate may be high when he says that fifty thousand Jews died in the course of Jannaeus attempt to regain control of Israel, but again the measure of the man is not gained from the particular number of his own countrymen who died while opposing or defending him. His qualities and the light in which he was held by his contemporaries is to be measured by the wanton manner in which he decimated his own people in the effort to keep himself in power. We may add in his defense, for he needs what defense we can muster for him, that his methods were no more vicious than those of his contemporaries who ruled the other kingdoms of the earth in the first century B.C. Treachery and slaughter marked almost all of them.

Alexander Jannaeus was a true child of his time. It is his ill fortune, however, not to be compared with his contemporaries outside Israel, but with the Maccabees who preceded him Judas, Jonathan and Simon, and John Hyrcanus. Their wars may have been as bloody, but their motivation was religious. Certainly this was true of the Maccabees. Hyrcanus marks the period of transition. Strictly speaking, he was not one of the Maccabees, but a Hasmonean. With Jannaeus and the rest of the Hasmoneans, the law of the Lord was virtually forgotten and conquest took its place.

At the end of six years of civil war, Alexander Jannaeus sued for peace with the Pharisees. They, however, feeling secure in their power, rejected the offer and demanded his death instead. Then, in order to prepare for the inevitable reprisal by Jannaeus, the Pharisees sent a delegation to their old enemy, the king of Syria, asking him to intervene on their behalf.

In this extraordinary measure the Pharisees were doing again what they and the Hasidim before them had done since the early days of the Maccabees. Apparently they were again ready to give over the control of the civil government of their land to a foreign power in exchange for the payment of tribute and the privilege of controlling their own internal affairs of both "church and state" through the high priesthood. It would be interesting to know how many of their countrymen supported the Pharisees in the decision to ask the Syrian king to intervene. What we know of the history of Israel at this time would suggest that nothing like a majority of the people desired any such move to be made.

The king of Syria (now Demetrius III) of course, welcomed an opportunity to have Palestine delivered into his hands. At the head of a great army, he invaded Palestine, sought out Jannaeus and dealt him a crushing defeat near Shechem. He then prepared to move on Jerusalem and so to complete the conquest of the realm. How few Jews had really supported the Pharisees in inviting the intervention of Syria may now be seen. Six thousand Jews deserted the Syrian army and joined the standard of Alexander Jannaeus!

No better illustration could be found of the tangled state of affairs that prevailed in Israel throughout the Maccabean and Hasmonean periods. The number of conflicting loyalties that beset every individual Jew as civil war after civil war raged up and down his unhappy land were almost impossible to resolve. We cannot be far from the truth if we say that one of the reasons why the Essene Community grew strong in this period was that it offered the devout Jew who loved the Lord the opportunity to serve him with singleness of purpose. Once at Qumran, he never had to choose sides again. There was only one side there, the worship of the Lord in the beauty of holiness. Back in Jerusalem, however, no matter what side he chose, the devout Jew found himself at one time fighting for something he abhorred, and at another, fighting against something he loved, and almost always fighting against his own blood brothers.

JEWISH INFIGHTING

The Pharisees had overplayed their hand. The six thousand who deserted to Alexander Jannaeus when the Syrians prepared to march on Jerusalem, were obviously men who valued their national freedom more than the niceties of the Law and Temple worship. On the other hand, the Jews who remained with Demetrius army were those who sought political power for the Pharisees under the rule of Syria, and who thought that in this way they could maintain the purity of Temple worship, and the strict following of the Law of the Lord. There is another curious element here. The part played by the Sadducees in this conflict is not told, but again, from what we know of them both before and after this incident, we can be confident that in the background they were fomenting the desertion to Jannaeus in a last desperate attempt to oust the Pharisees from the power which was sure to be theirs more or less permanently under the rule of Syria. At this turn of events the Syrian king gave up his campaign.

He had trouble enough elsewhere to keep him occupied. If Palestine had now to be conquered with but a handful of Jews to support the campaign, it was not worth the effort. Demetrius consequently withdrew. That left Alexander Jannaeus once more in full control of Israel and the Pharisees completely at his mercy. But mercy was never a quality he had shown and certainly he showed none of it now.

In revenge, as well as to impress his subjects with the awful fate that awaited anyone who dared to oppose him, Alexander Jannaeus rounded up eight hundred men thought to have been the leaders of the revolt against him. These he crucified en masse, in a single night. Then, as if the agony of being left to hang upon a cross until death came at last were not enough, he caused the wives and children of these men to be slaughtered before their very eyes. Meanwhile, as a final affront, as one last ghastly twist of human savagery, he openly enjoyed himself with his concubines in the full sight of all. It was a night such as the world has seldom seen. Need we look further for the Wicked Priest of the Dead Sea Scrolls!

Corroboration for the role played by the Pharisees in this series of events is to be found in the fragment of the Commentary on Nahum. The references in this writing are more precise than almost any to be found in the Scroll literature. It contains many proper names, such as Jerusalem, Demetrius and Antiochus, and it refers to crucifixion "which was never done before in Israel." If "the Lion of Wrath" is Alexander Jannaeus, the Wicked Priest of the Habakkuk Commentary and the fragment Commentary on Psalm 37, the pieces of the puzzle fit so well that it is hard to believe they do not belong together. The Pharisees, who remained in Jerusalem, who fomented the rebellion against Alexander Jannaeus and enjoyed political control during the six years of civil war and who finally called Syria to aid them when Jannaeus threatened again, then would have been the "Seekers after Smooth Things." The Nahum Commentary refers to Demetrius, king of Greece, who sought to enter Jerusalem by the counsel of the "Seekers after Smooth Things."

Thus, in the Scroll literature, the Pharisees who would not go to Qumran apparently are the backsliders and the scoffers, those who look at the fair neck and who are unwilling to give up all for the Law of the Lord. Their leader would then be the Man of the Lie, who sought to deceive the members of the Essene sect and tried to draw them into backsliding by giving up their ascetic life in the desert and returning to Jerusalem to enjoy political power there.

Josephus says that on that dreadful night in which Alexander Jannaeus wreaked vengeance upon his enemies, many Pharisees fled in terror from Jerusalem. Where would they have been more likely to go than to Qumran? Those who fled perhaps felt no little admiration for their stronger spiritual cousins who lived down by the Dead Sea. They wondered if the course pursued by the Qumran colony was not wiser, as well as better, than the one they had followed back in Jerusalem.

It would appear that the Essenes had two enemies:

- (1) Alexander Jannaeus, the Sadducees and the men of the war party and
- (2) the Pharisees with whom they were, however, really quite close.

In a sense the Pharisees were the more dangerous because of their spiritual kinship and because of the constant practical political appeal that the Pharisees were able to make.

Nevertheless the Essenes at Qumran could hardly have failed to welcome refugees so close to themselves in thought, men who had witnessed such terrible things and had hardly escaped with their own lives. Whether the order was already so strictly organized that the newcomers were forced to endure the two-year probationary period required by the Manual of Discipline, we can only guess. Probably not, for the group would not long have been in existence as a separate unit at that time. We do not know whether the Community Center was full at this time. Possibly it was as a result of this new influx of members that the caves around Qumran first began to be occupied. And possibly it was in an attempt to intergrate the large number of new members that the stern rules of admission were devised. We can assume too that when Alexander Jannaeus wrath was spent and life had become settled in Jerusalem, some of these new cave dwellers in the Judean desert looked longingly toward their former homes.

Some stayed, of course, but others returned to their old haunts and their old ways when it was safe to do so.

THE ROLE OF THE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

We can only guess the role that the Teacher of Righteousness played in these tragic and awesome scenes if indeed he played any. That he came into conflict with the Wicked Priest is clear. Undoubtedly, he denounced him first at Jerusalem and later at Qumran. Perhaps he did so openly in the city. He may have incited the lemon-throwing incident, which would be consistent with the character we know he possessed. Here we must leave the matter. The Teacher of Righteousness no doubt paid with his life. We cannot think that he suffered less for openly demanding that Israels high priest-king live up in some measure to the requirements of his office. But how or when or under what particular circumstances, we do not know. We know why, and we also know the lasting effect of these events on the Qumran community. Indignation toward the Wicked Priest burns in the heart of the Habakkuk commentator even as his love, reverence and pity for the Teacher of Righteousness shines through the same passages.

Events such as we have been reviewing enable us to explain the curses and the hatred we find in the Dead Sea Scrolls. They do not seem to have a place in the hearts of the men who composed the documents we possess. They descend from the shattering experiences through which the founders of the sect passed. The same explanation may be given for the emphasis on the two natures in man, and for the strange preoccupation of one of their authors in a kind of schematic war between the children of light and the children of darkness. How else could those men have explained the presence of two such children of Israel as Alexander Jannaeus and the Teacher of Righteousness? In fact, how might they be explained better by anyone?

INTER-TESTAMENTAL DEVELOPMENTS THAT PRODUCED THE ESSENE/QUMRAN CULT #3

Alexander Jannaeus lived for ten years following the night in 88 B.C. when he displayed his vengeance toward the Pharisees and other pietists in Jerusalem. During those years he was almost constantly waging war. At first he was involved in a conflict with the king of Syria and Aretas of Arabia. The remainder of his reign was given to an attempt to subdue the region just east of the Jordan. He took in succession Dion, Heshbon, Pella, Gerasa and Gamala. Returning to Jerusalem, he received a conquerors welcome. He was engaged in the siege of Ragaba, another Trans-Jordanian town, when he was killed in 78 B.C.

110-80 B.C.E.; THE FOUNDING OF THE QUMRAN DESERT COLONY

If the evidence of the archeologists is correct in indicating that the year 110 B.C., or thereabouts, was the date of the founding of the Qumran colony, thirty years separated the origin of the Essene movement and the end of the reign of Alexander Jannaeus. These years were pivotal in their history. We have no details of these thirty years, except for the scraps of information about the Teacher of Righteousness, the Wicked Priest and the Man of the Lie found in the Scroll literature. We have, however, a great body of indirect information.

As the persecution of the Pharisees increased under Alexander Jannaeus, Qumran would have become even more precious to them. Already many "pious ones," rejected Zadoks, and ultra-strict Pharisees had left Jerusalem in order to follow the Law of the Lord in the manner they thought was right. They also desired to get away from the jibes of their enemies, among whom the Pharisees were certainly included. All this they had already achieved. During the reign of Jannaeus, however, they would have begun to look anew upon their community at Qumran as a haven of refuge from far greater suffering than they themselves endured. As the most devout of all the sons of Israel, they could hardly have expected to fare better than the Pharisees, who seem to have borne the full brunt of Jannaeus fury. How precious Qumran must have seemed as they heard of the events taking place in Jerusalem in this period!

One scholar has guessed that Alexander Jannaeus actually came to Qumran, but it is a surmise only, for the evidence in support of it is very slender. Nevertheless, the increasing sense of insecurity that the Essenes felt during his reign, their anxiety that he might at any time descend upon them, would have been very real. But a few miles up the Jordan from their desert home he was engaged in subjugating the towns east of the Jordan. When might he not turn upon them?

JANNAEUS' DEATH ALLOWS PHARISEE DOMINANCE ONCE AGAIN

Then came the death of Alexander Jannaeus. His widow Alexandra succeeded him. Completely reversing her husbands policies, she opened the prison doors and freed all of Jannaeus political enemies. She appointed her eldest son as high priest, ousted the Sadducees from political control and threw her lot with the Pharisees.

Almost overnight the complexion of Jerusalem was completely changed.

Alexandra's support of the Pharisees may have been a matter of conviction or policy, or perhaps something of both. Josephus says Jannaeus advised it on his deathbed. In any case, Alexandra brought the Pharisees back into favor and authority. Her brother, Simon Ben Shetach, a member of the group and apparently her confidant, may well be the key to her action. The fact that Alexandras brother was a Pharisee shows the tangled personal relationships of the Hasmonean period when the conflicts between the Pharisees and the Sadducees constantly crossed family, party and sectarian lines. It is difficult for us to appreciate how closely the interests of one group were interwoven with the other.

Alexandra showed her sympathy for the Pharisees by increasing the authority of the Jerusalem Council which doubtless had been more Saducaic than Pharisaic. She created a new group of scholars in the Law, the scribes, of whom Israel was to hear much thereafter. The refugees who had fled in terror from the barbarity by which Jannaeus maintained himself in power now streamed back to their capital city. The Pharisees afterward were to look upon the reign of Alexandra as one of the noblest periods in Israel's history.

Alexandra reigned for nine years from 78 to 69 B.C. Not since the early days of John Hyrcanus, two generations before, had the Law been so widely respected and so thoroughly enforced, nor had the devout and pious among the Jews been so joyful. They were free to follow the covenant of the Lord and they were free to impose it upon the whole nation. They began, for the first time since the reign of John Hyrcanus, to dream of a free Israel living as the elect of God in accordance with his Law.

The Essenes at this juncture must have faced the question of whether they should remain loyal to the order and continue on in the desert or return to Jerusalem to help lead all Israel back to the covenant. Surely this represented a real crisis in their internal development. They would not only have had to think through the basic premises of their separate existence, but they would also have had to resolve the whole matter of withdrawal from, or intervention in, the political affairs of men.

When the old Torah was rigidly enforced, the Sadducees, the members of the ancient nobility and the warriors who had fought with Alexander Jannaeus, became increasingly uncomfortable, resentful and restless. Furthermore, piety and vindictiveness probably were not separated. The Pharisees enforced their Judaizing principles with a severity that was perhaps not quite all piety, although they could account for their measure by appealing to the requirements of the Mosaic Law. Their zeal served to quicken the old war party's yearning for power. It began to make plans and when Queen Alexandra died, it was ready.

JANNAEUS' SONS...HYRCANUS II & ARISTOBULUS II FIGHT FOR AUTHORITY

Alexander Jannaeus and Alexandra had two sons, Hyrcanus II, whom his mother had made high priest, and Aristobulus II, who, thirsting for power and eager to be king, became a willing tool of the Sadducees and the old war party of Alexander Jannaeus. The opposing forces, led by the two brothers, met in battle “near Jericho” in 68 B.C., and Hyrcanus II was decisively defeated.

What was the effect of this succession of events on the Essenes at Qumran? Their sympathies would certainly have been with the Pharisees and Hyrcanus II. Some of them may actually have fought with him against Aristobulus II, although Josephus says that the Essenes were pacifists, an observation which may refer to a later period when they seem to have become convinced that all fighting was useless.

Thus the struggle for power between Alexandras two sons necessitated a decision among the Essenes. When the Sadducaic nobility prepared to overthrow the Pharisaic government, the Essenes would have had to determine whether to support the Pharisees who were their kindred spirits, or whether by refusing to help to offer indirectly comfort to their old enemies. When the battle was fought “near Jericho” the Essenes may have taken an active part. In any case, they could not have been unaffected by it.

Hyrcanus II was defeated, but he was not routed. He continued the struggle for the kingship as best he could. Consequently, the civil war dragged on, a senseless internal struggle for power which was characterized by religious fanaticism. Always present was the question of the degree to which Law was to be followed. A foreign power, seeing the Jews at war with one another, now intervened. In the hope of appropriating control of Palestine for himself, Antipater the Idumean threw his weight with Hyrcanus II, perhaps at the latters urging, with the result that Aristobulus II was routed.

ROME IS ASKED TO TAKE SIDES IN THE POWER STRUGGLE

At this juncture, however, Rome stepped into the affairs of Israel and the little, though bloody, contests for power within the nation were thereafter completely inundated in her sudden rise to power. A Roman general, representing Pompey, now moved forward. Both Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II sent delegations to curry his favor and win his support. Aristobulus plea was apparently the more effective, for Rome gave her support to him. With so impressive an ally as Rome behind him, Aristobulus now fell upon his brother Hyrcanus and dealt him a crushing defeat. This made him master of all Judea and put the Sadducees in power again.

Pompey now appeared at Damascus. Aristobulus and Hyrcanus and also a third group of Jews, we are told, made their pleas for his support. [Qumran sect]. Aristobulus and Hyrcanus wanted the crown and the high priesthood, but the third group asked that these offices be given to neither of the two contenders. The two offices should be divided, they said. It was their belief that it would be better for Israel and for Rome if Pompey were to appoint a high priest [according to the Torah...Aaronic/Zadok] for the Temple and to retain the reins of government himself.

What this third group wanted is obvious in the light of the previous hundred and fifty years of Jewish history. This Qumranic third group wanted an end of priest-kings, whose hands, stained with the blood of their own people, offered sacrifices at the high altar. They hoped for an end of internecine strife and fratricidal warfare which had decimated Israel for more than a century. They longed for a restoration of the high priesthood under it proper lineage; under a Roman governor. This, they believed, would bring peace to their unhappy land and enable Israel once more to follow the Law of the Lord. They wanted, in short, a restoration of the condition which had prevailed under the Ptolemies and Antiochus the Great nearly two hundred years before. Then the Children of Israel, under the rule of a foreign power, lived at peace with one another and kept the covenant of the Lord.

THE IDENTITY OF THE THIRD GROUP...WAS IT THE QUMRAN/ESSENE SECT?

Whence came this delegation to Pompey and who were the men that formed it? Although we do not know for certain:

- It was not Sadducees, for the Sadducees favored Aristobulus II.
- It was not Pharisees, for the Pharisees favored Hyrcanus II.

We are no less certain that the point of view they adopted and the arguments they advanced are entirely consistent with the position of the Essenes on such matters. All indications, based on what we know of the third group and their petitions to Pompey, identify the third group as men who supported the Qumran/Essene theological agenda.

Whatever we conclude as to this particular detail, we know that by the time Pompey entered Damascus and the high priesthood had changed hands between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus three times, the Essenes were insisting again that Israel must cease to look for her redemption through political power. The Qumran/Essene sect now hoped for a true and worthy high priest at the Temple in Jerusalem and an Israel dwelling under the Mosaic Law beneath the civil arm of Rome.

THE REJECTION OF THE DAVIDIC MESSIAH BY THE QUMRAN CULT

They may once more have been drawn into the internecine wars of the Jews, but because of the continual political disputes between Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II, the Essene/Qumran cult never again looked for a Jewish king on the throne of David. Now they began to think more and more of the coming of the Lords anointed, the Messiah, and for the redemption of Israel through those who kept his covenant.

This means they rejected the concept of a Davidic Messiah [political] and pinned the whole of their redemptive hopes upon a Divine Messiah, the Messiah of Daniel, the Messiah of Enoch, a Cosmic-Godman, an Angel-Messiah.

None of the Jewish delegations that came to Pompey at Damascus was successful. Having heard all three, he took the case under advisement. This meant that things remained as they were for the moment, with Aristobulus in the office of high priest and nominally "king" while the old priestly Sadducean party continued to enjoy a supremacy at Jerusalem which they had not had since the time of Alexander Jannaeus. Aristobulus, however, foolishly concluding that he did not need the backing of Rome to keep himself in power, decided to resist. The result was inevitable. Pompey marched on Jerusalem. Hyrcanus and the Pharisees opened the gates of the city to him. Thereupon Aristobulus and his followers retreated to the Temple where they withstood the siege successfully for a time. In the end, of course, Pompey breached the walls, and according to Josephus twelve thousand Jews were massacred before the city was subdued. It was on this occasion that Pompey entered the Holy of Holies in the Temple, a prerogative of the high priest alone and his but once a year. Pompey was amazed to find it empty. His brashness may have satisfied his curiosity, but in Jewish eyes it was a desecration which both of the contending parties at Jerusalem joined in denouncing.

Pompey installed Hyrcanus II as high priest, and sent Aristobulus off to Rome as one of the exhibits in his triumphal procession, after the manner of victorious Roman generals in those days. Now the Pharisees were back in power again after an interval of only six years. The "peace party" in Jerusalem, made up of Pharisees and perhaps Essenes too, had succeeded better than they had wanted to do. They had desired political and religious power over the Jewish people under the strong arm of Rome in order that the old Mosaic Law might be held in proper honor. Few of them could have desired what they had helped to bring about, namely, the end of Jewish national independence. Yet after Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 B.C.E. the Jews were never politically independent again.

RELIGIOUS AUTONOMY...BUT AT A HIGH PRICE

There was peace among the Jews for a period of six years following Pompey's conquest. We may suppose that this, like the situation during the reign of Alexandra, was a difficult time at the Essene Community Center. With the Pharisees in power, the Law would be strictly enforced. Again, as under Alexandra, life in the desert would no longer have seemed necessary. Now again it was possible to follow the Law in all its literalness even while living in Jerusalem. Consequently, unless there are important factors at play here which we do not grasp, we are led to conclude that the first decade after Pompey took Jerusalem was another period in which serious problems were faced by the Essenes at Qumran.

The Sadducees and the old warrior nobles, however, still yearned both for the power they themselves once had had and for political independence for their nation. So doubtless did some of those who had formerly supported Hyrcanus II. In the years from 57 to 52 BC., the Jews rebelled no less than four times. On each occasion it was the old war party that led the revolt. The first rebellion was initiated by a son of Aristobulus II. Rome easily put it down but as a result Hyrcanus was deprived of what little political power had been left to him in his role of ethnarch in spite of the fact that Hyrcanus wanted no part of the uprising. Now Hyrcanus was high priest only, Palestine in effect became a part of Syria, and its government was given to the Roman governor of Syria. The remaining three revolts were also easily put down by Rome. Thereafter Palestine enjoyed another decade or more of peace. Meanwhile, the Pharisees continued in power and the old Mosaic Law held the central place in Jewish culture and religion.

Then began the great period of civil war in Rome, which involved ultimately the whole Mediterranean world. Julius Caesar crossed the Rubicon in 49 B.C.E. and for twenty years thereafter Roman fought Roman for control of the empire. Life in Palestine was for the most part unaffected by these titanic events. Caesar confirmed Hyrcanus II as hereditary high priest, granted him Roman citizenship and restored him to the office of ethnarch of Judea.

The old party divisions, loyalties and hatreds in Israel, meanwhile, continued on as intense as before. Now it was Antigonus, son of Aristobulus II, around whom the old aristocrats, the Sadducees, the war party and the nationalists rallied. Meanwhile Herod ruled Palestine while Caesar, Cassius and Mark Antony in succession represented the final authority of Rome. Finally in 41 B.C.E. Rome's leaders had become so involved with each other in the struggle for power that Anigonus and his party decided the time had come to strike. With the backing of Parthia, Rome's great rival in the east, they seized Hyrcanus II and drove out Herod. Once again the old priestly war party was back in control at Jerusalem with Antigonus installed as high priest, and claiming the title of king as well. Apparently Antigonus rebellion was at least in part a nationalist uprising, because he was able to enlist the support of religiously fanatical Jews in Galilee.

THE EMERGENCE OF HEROD

Now Herod having secured the title "King of the Jews" from Rome, returned and took up the struggle with Antigonus. He defeated the forces of Antigonus in Galilee after a strenuous campaign among the hills and caves of that region. The next year, backed by two Roman legions, Herod pushed on into Judea. In the attempt to subdue it, he too fought a battle "near Jericho." Again the coincidence is arresting. This was the year 38 B.C., about the time we know the Qumran Community Center to have been abandoned. The next year, the spring of 37 B.C.E., Herod laid siege to Jerusalem. The old priestly war party were the defenders once more. It is incredible that this should have happened yet again. As before, the defenders fought with fanaticism. There was new carnage; the streets again ran red with the blood of the Jewish people. Both the Romans and Herods forces simply cut the Jewish people down like ripened grain. Again it was the Pharisees who opened the gates of the city to the besiegers.

Herod fully realized the sacredness of the Temple to the Jews of all parties, and he was able to prevent any desecration of it. In order to avoid further trouble from the Aristobulus line he executed Antigonus. He also executed forty-five members of the old Jewish nobility who bad been supporters of Antigonus and who with him had fomented rebellion. It was the end of the political power of the Sadduccees.

Herod was a proselyte and in consequence could not occupy the office of high priest. He could not install the aged Hyrcanus II in the office, for Antigonus had cut off his ears, which under Jewish Law made him ineligible. In place of Hyrcanus, Herod appointed a Jew from Babylon as the new high priest; while retaining most of the civil power himself. This left the Pharisees still in the ascendancy, although their power was now entirely confined to religious and cultural matters.

PUTTING IT ALL TOGETHER...POLITICALLY

Trying to look upon the political scene from the relatively detached position of the Essenes, we see the Pharisees in control of the affairs of Israel almost throughout this entire period. There was a stretch of six years following the death of Alexandra when the Sadducees were in control. There was another stretch of four years from 41 to 37 B.C.E. during which the old war party again raised the standard of revolt. Apart from these two brief periods, however, both of which ended with a siege of Jerusalem by Rome and the slaughter of thousands of Jews, the Pharisees were in control the entire time.

We have assumed that differences among the Pharisees resulted in the first exodus to Qumran. These differences were minor as compared with the differences between the Pharisees and Sadducees. In the struggles between these two latter groups, the sympathies of the Essenes must always have been with the Pharisees, even if they did not actively enter into the contests for power in which these antagonists were almost constantly locked. As a result, throughout this period the Essenes were always faced with the problem of involvement versus withdrawal. They had had no problem on this score down to the death of Alexander Jannaeus. With Pharisees in power and the old Torah re-established in Jerusalem, however, they were confronted by a very real issue, particularly when the political power of the Pharisees was in jeopardy. As had been the case with the Hasidim, a hundred years before, these "pious ones" were forced constantly to decide whether to maintain their position of withdrawal or whether actively to support the policies in Jerusalem in which they deeply believed.

Again and again the Essenes must have had to decide. We are left with no clue as to what decision they reached unless the story of the third delegation that came to Pompey at Damascus is an Essene story. We can, however, be certain of their emotional if not of their political involvement. Believing as they did in Israel as the Lords chosen people, believing in his covenant with his people, and the requirement that they keep their part of it by following the Law, they must always have rejoiced to see Pharisees in power in Jerusalem, even as they had concluded in the reign of Alexander Jannaeus that the covenant was broken forever and that only they, the remnant in the desert, could ever redeem it.

PUTTING IT ALL TOGETHER...RELIGIOUSLY

Boy, that was a lot to read but so necessary if we are to understand the dynamics that underlay the Essene/Qumran Sect gradual theological shifts over two hundred-fifty years leading up to the first century. We have taken great paints to detail the political scene in Judea during these important years in which we find maturation and continual theological change within the Qumran sect. One must understand right up front that chronological theological change ran parallel with political difficulties and estrangement suffered by these rejected Hasidim, Zadok priests and ultra-strict Pharisees. Beginning with the rejection of the rightful priests, the Zadoks by John Hyrcanus I and their continual rejection by their own countrymen in the series of Hasmonean King-Priests that would follow, one can understand how such a closely knit group of men would eventually begin to doubt not only the Temple and the current fraudulent priests, but the religion that spawned them. Such were the turbulent political and religious times in which these Qumran sectarians lived. As we saw this groups of religious separatists would eventually lose all hope with the schism of Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II and no longer would they have faith in a Davidic Messiah and would look elsewhere for their "Redeemer." Fertile ground for a non-Jewish "Redeemer" was plentiful as personified Sun-Worship found its way into Qumran doctrines and dogmas as filtered through Egyptian religion, Dionysus, Zoroastrianism, Pythagoras, and Buddhism. Understand again that these religious beliefs did not surface over night but slowly grew in parallel with constant and continual rejection of the Qumran sect's rightful claim to the priesthood and the rejection of strict obedience to the Laws of God by the "powers that be" in Jerusalem. Having lost hope in a "Political and human Messiah from the stem of Jesse" they looked to a Divine Redeemer Messiah or a Cosmic Godman as found in Enoch and Daniel's Son of Man. Again let me stress such "foreign Jewish concepts" originated with Sun-Worship and had been so since the beginning of time as primitive man, lacking Divine revelation, worshipped the Sun.

If you have not read the Qumran literature to see this "theological evolution" you need to for once you know what you are looking for the evidence jumps off the page at you. The proof, as they say, is in the pudding. Provided for you on this web-site are the documents you need to read to see this "theological evolution" for yourself.

The root of this whole problem that led to the Qumran rejection of Judaism as they knew it was two-fold:

There was the contest for the high priesthood; the legitimate and God ordained high priest and the imposter high priest which involved the Qumran sect's standing in with whomever Rome happened to designate as governor of Syria. So goes the priest so goes the nation and with a corrupt non-Zadok priest they could only expect future judgment from God. They would finally get it and along with that their extermination. Their residue would exist within the banner of Christianity.

The hope that the daily dedication to lives lived in committed to obedience to the Laws of God which was their hope for "salvation" and a guarantee of no future judgment from God. Such lives lived in obedience to the God's Laws would ensure the "salvation of Israel" as seen in the imminent appearance of the Kingdom of Heaven with her Messiah King and the quick judgment of the enemies of Israel. Their hopes would not be realized and their eschatological religious documents and predictions have been totally discredited today; sadly for us, they remain hidden in the pages of the New Testament as the hopes and dreams of the first centuries apocalyptics were "written" and these bequeated to us on the pages of the Bible. Again, such eschatological hopes and predictions have been totally discredited.

There is a simple answer for the failure of Essene Messianic theology when one views the whole picture: the Essene/Qumran Sect, in their rejection as the persecuted rightful Priesthood, along with other religious purists which would join them over the years, would evolve theologically into a religious cult which would have, in the first century, more religious tenants in common with Sun-Worship, "solar-myths," and with Godman redeemers than pre-exilic Judaism. We call it Christianity today!

Don't you think it is about time to break loose of all of the residue of Essene religious though and find the truths about Jesus of Nazareth and begin your worship of God in Spirit and in Truth?

THE MESSIAH AND THE EGYPTIAN CONNECTION

The oppression of the Jews by the foreigner aroused in them thoughts of a "deliverer, savior, Messiah". It always did and it always will.

As you read this article as well as others in this website I want you to keep in mind that these "theological tenants" concerning this "deliverer, savior, Messiah" originated in Egypt! Such "theology" begins with Osiris many thousands of years ago; even thousands of years before there was ever an Essene or the thought of them. But be not mistaken if you read this website from beginning to end you will see how thoroughly the Osiris and Egyptian Religious Belief system not only shaped the later Essene-Christian Faith but influenced every nation of the world down through history. If you begin with Osiris and read the development of the Osiris pattern as it chronologically developed in each successive world empire there is no way that anyone can fail to see the Osiris Myth develop and evolve throughout recorded time. This same religious belief system and its unique synthesis find expression again with the Essenes of Egypt as well. Since the Osiris Myth began in Egypt it should be no surprise that in Egypt we find its later expression with the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt as well. This religious belief system of the Essenes can be analyzed and truth seen within it as well as deviation from the earliest truths held about God by the earliest Egyptians who both saw and understood God and His message to them through observations of the Cosmos. After having studied Egyptology now for over 5 years it saddens me that the purest and earliest concepts of the Almighty God as understood and taught by the earliest Egyptians in their simplest form could be so thoroughly altered and changed down through time where allegory and myth, which taught these Divine Truths, could be changed into "LITERALISMS" which not only hide but destroy these truths and render those who inherit these "religious beliefs in their altered states" idolators. Once you come to understand the Egyptian Religion correctly and the Osiris Myth as it was originally intended then these observations become very plain to you. Be not mistaken, the concept of the Messiah has undergone much redaction and alteration down through history and today only the Jews, the historical children of the Egyptians, have it correctly. I will show you in this website how the Essenes tragically altered the concept of the Messiah and altered the Hebrew Scriptures in order to promote their "Angel-Messiah" and godman instead of the human Messiah that the Hebrew Scriptures teach.

Though the Christian idea of the Messiah, or in Greek phraseology, the Christ, is one of a divine redeemer, it is quite different from the older, Jewish conception of a Messiah, a warrior who would free them from their enemies and institute the kingdom of God on earth in which the Jews would be the elite.

The Messiah is perfectly described in the Book of Daniel written about 200 years before Jesus when the Jewish state was oppressed by the Greeks. Even then Jews were seeking a Saviour.

... and, behold, one like unto the son of man came with the clouds of Heaven, and came even to the ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed... Daniel 7:13-14

THE NON-CANONICAL PSALMS OF SOLOMON

In the non-canonical Psalms of Solomon, written not by Solomon, the king, but by unknown authors between 70 and 40 B.C.E. - only about 70 years before Jesus, we get a detailed description (edited here for brevity). The Messiah of the house of David shall gather the nation together and evict the foreigners from Jerusalem.

O God, raise up unto them their king, the Son of David that he may reign over Israel thy servant. And gird him with strength that he may shatter unrighteous rulers, and that he may purge Jerusalem from nations that trample her down to destruction. He shall destroy the godless nations with the word of his mouth. At his rebuke the nations shall flee before him. All nations shall be in fear before him.

Wisely, righteously he shall thrust out sinners from the inheritance. He shall destroy the pride of the sinner as a potter's vessel. With a rod of iron he shall break in pieces all their substance and he shall reprove the sinners for the thoughts of their hearts. And he shall purge Jerusalem making it holy as of old.

And he shall gather together a holy people whom he shall lead in righteousness. And he shall divide them according to their tribes upon the land, and neither visitor nor stranger shall remain with them any more.

And he shall judge the tribes of his people which has been sanctified by the Lord. And he shall not suffer unrighteousness to lodge any more in their midst, nor shall there dwell with them any man that knoweth wickedness, for he shall know them that they are all sons of God.

And he shall be a righteous king, taught of God, over them, and there shall be no unrighteousness in his days in their midst, for all shall be holy and their king the anointed of the Lord. The Lord himself is king, the hope of him that is mighty is through his hope in God.

He will bless the people of the Lord with wisdom and gladness, and he himself will be pure from sin, so that he may rule a great people and relying on his God throughout his days he will not stumble; for God will make him mighty by means of his holy spirit, and wise by means of the spirit of understanding, with strength and righteousness.

His hope will be in the Lord: who then can prevail over him? He will be mighty in his works and strong in the fear of God; he will be shepherding the flock of the Lord faithfully and righteously and will suffer none among them to stumble in their pasture.

He will lead them all aright, and there will be no pride among them that any among them should be oppressed.

He shall judge peoples and nations in the wisdom of his righteousness. And he shall have the heathen nations to serve under his yoke.

You will note that a pacifist preaching goodwill to all men was not the Jews' best idea of a leader suitable to free them from the yoke of their oppressors. The chief heathen nation was, by the time of Jesus in the first century AD, the Romans. The political position of the Jews under the Romans seemed hopeless. What you must understand is that this sense of "hopelessness" affected the Jews' concepts of their expected Messiah. Consequently popular Jewish hopes were of this imminent redeemer, this warrior king, born in the image of and of the line of King David (himself a historical Pharoah..Tutmosis III), a supernatural being sent by God who would overthrow the foreigners, impose Jewish authority over the world and institute a kingdom of God on earth which he would rule assisted by the Jews as the elite. The Messiah had become a fervent belief.

Answer for yourself: But where do the Jews, in particular the Essenes, in their sense of hopelessness, look to get this concept of a "Supernatural Messiah"? You might be very surprised when you find out.

WHAT DOES EGYPT HAVE TO DO WITH THE MESSIAH?

Answer for yourself: Are you aware that Isaiah's first prophecy of "the Messiah" was made to Egypt and not to Israel?

Isa 19:20-21 20 And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the LORD of hosts in the land of Egypt: for they shall cry unto the LORD because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them. 21 And the LORD shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the LORD in that day, and shall do sacrifice and oblation; yea, they shall vow a vow unto the LORD, and perform it. (KJV)

That should take your breath away! I don't want to let the cat out of the bag just yet but you will be amazed at what you learn from this website as you follow not the "scarlet thread" but the "thread of Messianic theology" as it emanates first in Egypt and finds is fulfillment in Essene theology in Alexandria, Egypt. What we will share with the reader later in futher studies is how the Jewish promises of a "Messiah" are connected with this first prophecy of a "Savior/Messiah" given to Egyptians.

Truly it has been said: "There is nothing new under the Sun" and if you take the time to study the website you will see that Egypt and Sun-Worship has played the pivotal role in the creation of Messianic theology which was later adopted by the Jews.

Answer for yourself: Why would the Jews adopt religious concepts from the Egyptians and how could they possibly think that they applied to themselves, since they were Jews and not Egyptians?

Answer for yourself: Have I got your attention yet? There is an answer to this but I don't want to get the cart before the horse so to speak.

There is so much I want to tell you now, so much I want to teach, so much I want to correct, but all of this takes time and comes one truth at a time. I encourage you to not be in a hurry for this website is full of information that explains and corrects today's fallacies connected with the Christian faith. Since 2.5 billion people today in the world consider themselves Christians it is way past time that they be given the truth concerning their faith. As an ordained Pastor who stumbled onto these "facts" I present them to you for your inspection and it will be up to you to disprove what I say. I tell all who read our sites to not believe me on anything I write; only to let this information point you in the direction for your study to verify what I say to be true. I will say this once: You can believe me on one thing; the research and study has been done to such an impeccable level that it cannot be proven wrong! This is not meant to be a braggadocios comment, only to let the uninformed reader know that I have done my homework with such a proficiency that it will take the test of critical scrutiny. In fact I welcome such examination by others for such an endeavor will mean they have themselves paid the price to acquire such knowledge.

As a quick note this website is devoted to exposing the origin for these "Supernatural" beliefs which some of the Jews, the Essenes, would attach to the then current hopes and ideas of a Messiah. It is these same ideas which were inhered by mainline Christianity, both ancient and modern.

These visions of God giving dominion of a kingdom to his Messiah, an everlasting kingdom which encompassed all peoples and nations, ignited the torch of Jewish nationalism for several centuries. Leaders of varying degrees of credibility were to step forward from the death of Herod to the defeat of Bar Kosiba claiming to be the Messiah of God.

Both the Hebrew word, Messiah, and the Greek word, Christos, mean one who is anointed, or rather it is always given as meaning one who is anointed. Actually Messiah is made up of the Egyptian root "MS", as in Moses, meaning a child or, if the child is male, a son, and the Hebrew word, "iah" which is God.

Thus Messiah means literally "Son of God".

The Christian gospel writer Matthew identified Jesus Christ with Moses, whose name is also of course "a son".

Answer for yourself: If Moses is the Egyptian word for a son who was he a son of?

Answer for yourself: Was Moses also a Messiah?

He was! Moses was adopted by Pharaoh's daughter who found him in the bulrushes. And a Pharaoh was a god; understood as God's representative among men.

Moses's brother, the priest Aaron, died and was buried at a place called Moseroth, Moserah or Mosera, the site of the Israelite camp near Mount Hor. Curiously Mosera can be read as Egyptian for Son of Ra or Son of God, Ra being the Egyptian word for god. The father of Moses and Aaron, according to the Old Testament, was Amram interpreted as the Hebrew for exalted people when it is plainly a corruption of the Egyptian Amun-Ra. Amun-Ra was the high God - Amun meaning the Hidden One - of the Egyptians. From the time of the pyramid builder, Cephren in the IVth dynasty all Pharaohs were considered to have been Ra's son, in other words all Pharaohs were Sons of God or Messiahs. Mosera is the purely Egyptian word from which the compound word Messiah was constructed. It is the same word, with roots in a different order, as Rameses, the name of several pharaohs - Sons of God. One of the inscriptions of Rameses the Great records Amun-Ra addressing the Pharaoh with words familiar to a modern Christian:

I am thy father. I have begotten thee like a god.

The Pharaoh replies:

I am thy son. Thou hast given me the power of a god.

Thus both Moses and his brother were considered Sons of God, both were literally Messiahs. Moses and Aaron combine the roles of king, priest and prophet. Later David (Tuthmosis III) was identified as the Great King and Moses took the single role of the prophet, but it is plain that, in leading the Israelites out of Egypt, his role was that of king as well as prophet.

Jochebed, Amram's wife was also his Aunt. This ties in with the practice of the Pharaohs whose title came through the female line. Thus they usually married their sisters to become king but could marry their mother's sister - their maternal aunt - or even their mother - to succeed to the throne. Plainly the "Israelites" led away from Egypt by Moses, a Messiah, were thoroughly Egyptianised and ruled by a Pharoah-like king, if not an actual dissident Pharoah. Many scholars today see Moses of the Bible as Pharoah Akhenaton of the XVIII Dynasty that led a monotheistic revolt in Egypt that culiminated in his exile and Exodus. It seems therefore that the word Messiah, a Son of God, came into the Jewish religion from Egypt.

From the time of exile in Babylonia the word messiah took on the meaning of a God-sent saviour or deliverer. The Jewish concept was not of a divine Messiah: as the extract from the Psalms of Solomon makes clear, the Jewish Messiah was entirely human, though possessing God-given supernatural powers. Judaism had become, due to the Egyptian influence of Pharaoh Akhenaton (the true identity of Moses) strictly monotheistic - it had only one god and it was a heresy for Jews to think otherwise - even their Messiah could not be regarded as divine. A Jew proclaiming a Messiah a god at the time of Jesus would have been stoned for blasphemy. But it was no blasphemy to claim to be a Messiah, a man. Under the Romans most Jews felt they had suffered enough and were expecting a man of power backed by the supernatural might of God to lead the people to freedom. The idea of a saviour Messiah spurred Jewish nationalism. From 4 BC to 135 AD several Messiahs were proclaimed as the Jews yearned for an end to the trials and indignities of Roman rule. Each led an unsuccessful revolt and died.

Failure of the expected Messiahs' appearance fertilized the growth of another concept, the suffering servant. The despised and rejected servant of God in Isaiah would suffer to redeem the world in a spiritual rather than physical sense. The suffering servant was a personification of the sufferings of the Jewish people rather than a model for their Messiah (Isa. 40-66 reveals the nation, not one person as the "suffering servant." But the Messiah had to be demonstrably of the highest morals as the moral judge of mankind. Possibly some Jews thought that suffering ensured great virtue and gave supernatural power. A suffering Messiah could have been part of God's plan to save the people. Many Jews like the Essenes expected the Messiah to suffer as the Jewish nation had. There is evidence of this in the Dead Sea Scrolls (since the death of their Teacher of Righteousness).

The contradiction of Daniel which pictured a glorious Messiah was resolved by the Essene's concept of the Messiah's glorious second coming when the world would end and the faithful would be saved (reincarnation of their slain Teacher of Righteousness). From this Essene beliefs of their "cosmic godman/Angel Messiah) came the Christian idea of Christos meaning a divine redeemer, an incarnate God who deliberately suffers, dies and is resurrected to atone for the inherent sins of mankind. Certainly the importance of the suffering Messiah concept largely emerged out of the events of the intertestamental years rather than before - many scholars believe it only reached prominence as a justification of Christianity. But this "suffering" idea was originally understood as a "people;" but it was the Essenes who would focus upon only one man...their Teacher of Righteouss who was slain.

Most ordinary Jews, though, were fed up with suffering. They had incessantly been humiliated by foreign rulers with only the Maccabees providing any hope. Submission had got them nowhere. Gentle Jesus could not have fitted their preferred image - a warrior, a king David, a superman on the lines described in Daniel.

Answer for yourself: So what have we seen here?

Egypt plays a very large part in the creation of the Messianic idea. This Egyptian Messianic idea comes straight from Ra the Egyptian Sun-God which is personified in Osiris, the first Godman. Being a Godman this Osiris embodies both Divine and human concepts in one person. Osiris is the first of the Supernatural Saviors who gives his life for mankind. Osiris will serve as the pattern for all other Godmen as well as the concept of the Supernatural Messiah. Within this website is the detailing of how this Egyptian Solar Myth of Osiris will be assimilated by almost all Gentile nations as well as certain sects of the Jews. It will be the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, who will adopt and promote this Godman Redeemer both in Egypt, Palestine, and Qumran. It will be these Essenes of Egypt who will purposefully mistranslate the Jewish Scriptures known today as the LXX or the Septuagint in order to write within them their astro theology and their cosmic godman thesis. This Essene adulteration of the Jewish Scriptures provides the substrate for credibility for their solar theology and their Supernatural Messiah. Unknowing and unsuspecting Gentiles as well as Jews will be taken in by this adulteration of the Jewish Scriptures. Sadly this Essene purposefully mistranslation and misapplication of Jewish Scriptures will become the Old Testament of the Christian Church instead of the Jewish-Hebrew Masoretic Text. As if that is not enough, these falsifications of the Jewish Scriptures, which promote a Solar Sun-godman Messiah will be quoted extensively in the New Testament as they are applied by these same Essene/Nazarene/Zealots to Jesus. In other words, concepts originating with Sun-Worship and Osiris are applied to Jesus and those who know no better read them as if they are "inspired, infallible, and inerrant." Thus the truths about Jesus are obscured if not destroyed in this New Testament depiction of the man from Galilee. This explains why along with the human Messiah of Judaism we find on the apocalytpic fringe of Judaism the belief in a Supernatural Godman Messiah. Both of these concepts find their way into the New Testament due to the heavy influence of the Essenes which were also be know as the Nazarenes and Zealots. This explains why we find two different characterizations of Jesus in the New Testament; one from Essene influence of a Supernatural Messiah in the Gospel attributed to John and one more closely resembling a human Messiah as views in the Synoptic Gospels.

Answer for yourself: Which is the true depiction of Jesus?

What is important for us is that when one's worship is directed to anyone other that the One invisible God and Creator one falls into the hideous sin of idolatry. Depending on how one views this Jesus of the New Testament one find himself in idolatry or not. This being the case, I think it very important to understand how the many religious ideas that emanate from Egypt and Sun-Worship found their way into the Essene-Christian faith which is called today Christianity. Once when one sees how the apocalytpic Essenes were the latest in a long line of Egyptian Sun-Worshippers disguised within a sect of Judaism will one come to see how tragic their influence on the creation of religious concepts which were later attached to Jesus. When Jesus is viewed as a God instead of a man one falls not only into false worship but idolatry.

My gift to the Christian reader is two-fold:

- The detailed presentation of the many facts and information specifying how these Egyptian religious ideas were later filtered though many nations culminating with the Essenes and the Qumran sect
- The examination and presentation how these Essene/Qumran religious solar beliefs were to become the the foundation for their Supernatural Messiah which not only laid the foundation for the vast majority of the religious dogmas and doctrines of Christianity, but which did and yet today captures the imagination of millions which leads them into a false worship of God and idolatry.

The truly sad fact and conclusion which is inescapable when one views all that this extensive website contains and presents to the interested student is that the Creator has waited and yet waits for His worship to be in Spirit and in Truth...something that cannot happen if one falls prey to the Essene-Christian Faith of today.

THE JEWISH SECTS OF JUDAISM...AND WHAT YOU HAVE NOT NOTICED BEFORE NOW

Hardly surprisingly in the chaos of the times, the Jews could not agree among themselves what they should do to help god in his aspirations for them. Pious Jews were set on obeying God's commandments to the letter but this led to sectarianism - the commandments were not always clear; interpretation was needed and with it came disagreement. Encouraged by the occupying forces Jews had split into several sects each believing its approach was the right one. The Christian gospels introduce us to some of them; but not all of them!

Particularly prominent in the gospels are the Pharisees who are depicted as the arch enemies of the Son of God. But other sects, the Sadducees, the Herodians, and the Zealots are mentioned with decreasing levels of interest. Indeed the Zealots are effectively not mentioned because they are introduced only as an appellation of one of the disciples, Simon the Zealot. Amazingly the Essenes, the keepers of the Dead Sea Scrolls, are not mentioned at all in the New Testament though they must have been an important influence on the lives of people living in small towns and villages such as those preferred by Jesus and his disciples. The Nazarenes were of course the sect considered to have been founded by Jesus, the hero of the gospel stories. As a sect they are mentioned once only in Acts.

In fact we have excellent descriptions of these sects from sources other than the Bible, particularly Josephus, the Jewish historian, who lived in these turbulent times. Josephus tells us the three main -philosophies- of the Jews are the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes. Though essentially these were religious groups, equally important to understanding them is their political dimension - their attitude to the invader. Religion and politics could not be separated for Jews at that time.

- The Sadducees were wealthy families, mainly of priests, who were blatant collaborators, fearful of their position if there should be any unrest. The Boethusians of the Rabbinical literature were the family and descendants of one Boethus, the Egyptian, who had assumed the role of High Priest under Herod the Great. They might have been the Herodians of the gospels of Mark and Matthew, Herod having rebuilt the Jerusalem Temple, the source of their influence.
- The Pharisees were not active collaborators in general but on several previous occasions they had invited foreign powers into Israel to quell civil war and they were unwilling to risk reprisals against Israel by organizing against Rome. However the Pharisees were not monolithic and the pragmatists were opposed by more nationalistic factions.
- The Dead Sea Essenes were opposed to the invader and spent time preparing themselves for an apocalyptic bust-up but believed god would only support them if they were absolutely ritually pure, hence this became their main interest. Village Essenes had a similar apocalyptic outlook but lived more practical lives in the community at large. It is inconceivable that these latter communities did not have some impact on the events of the gospels. Here is another mystery - why are they not mentioned by the gospel writers?

Josephus in Antiquities adds a fourth sect of Jewish philosophy, but does not give it a name, merely saying it was founded by Judas the Galilaean and that it accepts Pharisaic notions but adding that they accept God only as their Lord. Scholars generally regard these men as Zealots, firebrands incensed by the invader and ready to join in armed struggle against them. The Sicarii were a branch of the Zealots whose aim was political assassination.

THE PHARISEES

Rabbinical literature depicts the Pharisees as just, humane and adaptable. "Well it would, wouldn't it?" you might say. After all, the Jewish religion that survived the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple in 70 AD was the religion of the Pharisees. It metamorphosed into Rabbinical Judaism. But the tradition of the rabbis is confirmed by Josephus.

The Pharisees arose in the period of about 160 BC when the Jews were rebelling against the Seleucid Greeks. They opposed the imposed priesthood for political as well as religious reasons. They wanted to get rid of foreign oppressors and their agents and to return the priesthood to its simple function of being ritual officials in the Temple rather than political quislings. When the Jews did succeed in throwing off the foreigners it was to set up the Hasmonaean dynasty which combined the roles of High Priests and monarchs. Naturally the Pharisees-opposition continued. Thus the Pharisees opposed the oppressors, the sacrilegious and collaborationist Sadducees. But they were pragmatic. If they believed hostility was futile they would not advocate it.

The Pharisees accepted the Torah as inspired by God but, unlike the Sadducees, were not fundamentalists. They believed that the body of oral interpretation, carefully recorded by the scribes, was more immediate, pertinent and alive. They point out that the Torah itself says: "The Torah is not in Heaven". It is therefore not perfect and needs interpretation by men. This oral tradition was immensely flexible. The age of the Prophets had long gone so no one could claim to know God's will - it could be expressed through anyone. No one could be certain that their own interpretation was what God intended and so all views and interpretations were respected by all: humanity and understanding were built into the system. Perhaps this was just as well because the Pharisees were far from a homogeneous body. They certainly divided into a Left Wing and a Right Wing, and perhaps there were finer subdivisions. The famous disputes between the Rabbis Hillel and Shammai in the century before the crucifixion testify to this.

In matters of law where a clear cut decision was needed, a vote was taken and dissenting rabbis were obliged to hold to the view of the majority until the matter was raised again. A change of vote did not perturb the assembly because changes of circumstances were recognized as part of life - decisions would change as the circumstances did. Dissenting views as well as majority decisions were recorded for future reference thus becoming akin to precedent so that when changes occurred a new generation of scholars could refer back to the dissenting views of their predecessors. Decisions were not divine but human and were therefore fallible - rejected views might turn out to be more correct. This was how God wanted it: the work required in considering, reasoning and interpreting was necessary to the seeking of truth: According to the effort is the reward.

The conclusion is that Pharisees had no need to quarrel when they disagreed, nor to persecute dissenters. Disciplinary action only came when someone refused to abide by the majority decision, and even then on matters of the Law not on matters of theology.

Punishment was simply a period of ostracism. Different views on the Messiah could be and were voiced perfectly acceptably including the one that there could be no Messiah because he had already been manifest as the virtuous king, Hezekiah. The Pharisees did regard as heretical refusal to accept oral law.

Pharisee sages came from all levels of society including the poorest, unlike the hereditary priesthood. They were not paid but, like Jesus the carpenter of the Bible, had to develop a practical skill with which to earn a living. They were admired for their fairness as judges of the Law, their knowledge and their originality of expression in preaching. Though they practised Temple worship, the centre of their lives was the synagogue.

The sages and later, the rabbis, thought of themselves as heirs to the prophets, who also came from the people rather than from dynasties, and especially Moses, though they claimed no prophetic abilities themselves. Prophecy had ceased with the biblical prophets and would start again only with the age of the Messiah. Theirs was an interpretive and analytical role not a sacerdotal one - that was the priests- role. The Pharisees regarded the priests only as functionaries with no authority to speak on the Law or religion. The sages were progressive whilst the Sadducees were conservative.

THE SADDUCEES

The Sadducees on the other hand followed the priests. The Sadducees were families of vast wealth and power and their hangers on. They allied with the topmost priesthood and the ruling power to retain their wealth: they were collaborators. The Romans appointed the High Priest as did Herod before them. Failing to understand the diffuse nature of Judaism, Romans thought that control of the Temple would control the people. But the separation of the sacerdotal and the teaching functions in Judaism is one reason why it has been able to survive - destruction of the ceremonial centre never affected the religion as a whole.

Sadducees were fundamentalists needing no interpretation of the Bible and therefore no scholars: atonement through Temple ritual was sufficient. Yet their tradition stemmed only from the time of the successors of Alexander the Great. The priesthood was properly the function of the caste descended from Aaron, Moses' brother, but under Alexander's successors, the Ptolemies, the priestly line was broken. The High Priests were established as agents of foreign rule - and so they remained under the Romans. Many Jews were distressed by the situation but continued to tolerate it believing it to be god's will. Others such as the Essenes, to judge by the Dead Sea Scrolls, were training a pure priesthood in waiting ready to replace the unclean upstarts they considered ran the Temple. In the meantime the Chief Priests and their Sadducaean supporters serviced the Temple financed by supposedly voluntary tithes that were often extorted.

The two sects disagreed over the resurrection of the dead, the Sadducees denied it and the Pharisees accepted it. In the Christian New Testament the Son of God takes the view of the Pharisees but the Essenes too believed in resurrection.

THE ESSENES/QUMRAN CULT

Answer for yourself: Why are the gospels silent about the Essenes and the Zealots, though they introduce us to the Pharisees, the Sadducees and the Herodians?

Answer for yourself: Could it be that the people at the centre of the story were Essenes?

Neither Paul nor any of the other writers of epistles in the New Testament mentions the Essenes - they might as well have not existed. But we know they did. Three writers from the first century AD describe the Essenes - Pliny, Josephus and Philo. We now also have the evidence of the excavations at Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls - but a clear understanding of the Essenes still eludes us.

Pliny is describing the region around the Dead Sea and says that on the western shore, where they had been for thousands of centuries, live the Essenes, a solitary people who renounce women and money. They maintain their numbers by accepting those driven by the vicissitudes of fortune and weariness of life. "Below" them are the ashes of Engedi and "beyond" is the fortress of Masada. If the words "below" and "beyond" imply direction towards the south then the Essenes lived at the most northerly of the three sites mentioned. Indeed there is a ruin in just that position that could have been the Essene's centre: it is at Qumran. If Pliny indicated relative altitude when he wrote "below", the Essene community was in the hills behind Engedi from the Dead Sea but there is no sign of any such community there.

Pliny's "thousands of centuries" is an exaggeration but one which might suggest an association between this community and a much older one. Josephus, who gives us the most complete account of the Essenes, puts the rise of the community in the previous century, during the first century BC. Josephus suggests he was initiated into the order so one assumes he knows what he is talking about. He writes that the Essenes, all Jews by birth, were a closely knit brotherhood which had something in common with the Pythagoreans. We will in the following website investigate this declaration of Josephus for its stagering consequences to the Christian faith of today. There were about 4000 of them.

They regarded pleasure as evil and disciplined themselves in continence and self control. They did not marry but propagated the sect by adopting other people's children. Not that they were against marriage in principle - they realized it was necessary for the continuation of mankind - but they felt that women were wanton and unfaithful. Josephus goes on to say that there is another order of Essenes, the village Essenes, who differ in accepting marriage though maintaining strict rules about intercourse. The Essenes were Zadokites, naming themselves after Zadok the priest, suggesting they were a dissident priestly order. Objecting to the debasement of the Temple and the venality of the Sadducees, they had left them to adopt a largely frugal and monastic life uncorrupted by the scandal of collaboration. Their purpose was to keep themselves ritually pure because they were expecting the apocalypse when God would endow a Messiah to purge and judge the world.

THE ZEALOTS

The Zealots, first mentioned by Josephus as the fighters against the Romans in the Jewish rebellion of 66-73 AD, apparently based themselves on the example of Phinehas whose zeal for the Law turned God's wrath from the Israelites in Numbers 25:10-13. A copycat incident led to the outlawing of the Maccabees in the second century BC. Scholars assume Zealotry essentially stems from then. Judas of Galilee and a Pharisee, Sadduc, according to Josephus, combined to resist the numbering of the people by the Romans when they conducted their census of 6 AD. Since the Essenes called themselves "the Sons of Zadok", this association of Galilaean and Zadok in the founding of the Zealots should be noted. (Sadduc and Zadok seem to be the same word varyingly rendered in our alphabet.) Their "zeal for the Law of Moses" and veneration of the Torah led them to hate foreigners, whence their leading role in the war against the Romans. They were of major significance in Palestine during the whole of the period of the gospels so the single reference to them (Simon, the Zealot) looks suspicious.

The failure of the gospels to mention either the Zealots or the Essenes while mentioning the other Jewish parties suggests that Essenes and Zealots have deliberately been left out of the story.

Answer for yourself: Is it because the Nazarenes were a branch of the Essenes or the Zealots?

Hyppolytus, writing about 230 AD, confirms that the Zealots were indeed a branch of the Essenes.

Answer for yourself: Are the gospels narrating, in a distorted or coded way, a sequence of Zealot incidents, since the Zealot leader was none other than Jesus?

Now you can see why study is the only recourse to uncovering "the truth" about Jesus!

INTRODUCTION: ORIGINS OF THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH

The religious faith of the western world, Christianity, consists substantially of a synthesis of beliefs and doctrines which had their origin in many lands and among various peoples and which were combined and proclaimed in what we may call the New Testament, specifically those documents known as the Gospels along with the Pauline Epistles. Ironically there is little "new" in the New Testament as most of it's religious doctrines, which are passed off as unique and Divine revelations, can be found in countless non-Jewish nations since the beginning of recorded history! Needless to say this is not common knowledge and few practicing and devout Christians are aware of the inherent "hidden" paganism they practice. The creeds, disciplines, and dogmas on which almost all the churches of Europe and the Americas and many of those in Asia are based purport to derive their authority from this New Testament document; and all these multifarious denominations and non-denominations proclaim that theirs is the religion established by Jesus, whom they revere as the Christ.

Since being an ordained Pastor, for more than fifteen years I have been fascinated by the thought that the principal concepts of the Christian faith, which have played so crucial a role in occidental life, might be traced to their ultimate sources. Having acquired the skills to do the necessary studies, and beginning some twelve to fifteen years ago, time for such an elaborate project became possible: scores of modern and ancient books and hundreds of articles in encyclopedias were first read by way of orientation; but, since profound knowledge is to be had only by a minute study of the sources, this soon became an industry. More than fifteen years were consumed in the intensive study of ancient Egyptian, Persian, Brahmana, Gaina, Buddhist, Judaistic, Essene, and Christian literature. Needless to say my library has swelled and my bank account dwindled. The fruit of such investigation in search for Divine truth is made available to the interested reader through the efforts of Bet Emet Ministries today.

THE INVITATION TO STUDY...AND WHAT AWAITS YOU

What you will discover if take up our invitation to study the "true" origins of the Christian faith with us, along with the important role that the Essenes/Qumran sect played within such a religious development, is that important religious elements from various ancient cultures converged in the Essene/Qumran cult, first, in the Pythagorean thiasot and then in the Essene Order, whence the Christian Gospel emerged, which, in turn, proceeded to penetrate the emotions and to achieve dominion over the Graeco-Roman world. Today, by latest counts, there are 2.5 billion Christians in the world today of various creeds and denominations and less than 1% of them are aware of the truthful origins of their faith.

THE EVOLUTION AND RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS OF THE ESSENE CULT...AND THE LAUNCHING OF CHRISTIANITY

Clearly the Dead Sea Scrolls and the schism that caused the Dead Sea sect to arise can only be understood in the context of Jewish history and the sectarianism of the Second Temple period in Judea. Across twenty centuries, the Scrolls speak to us of the pluralism that existed in ancient Judaism, each group competing to be the "True Israel" of G-d, and each claiming a monopoly on the true interpretation of the Torah. The Scrolls provide us with a window into an ancient Jewish time and give us a glimpse of an ancient Jewish sect who resided in the desert on the shores of the Dead Sea. Reflected in the Scrolls are their religious traditions and beliefs, their legal tenets, their worship, and their approach to G-d and the rest of humanity.

The most prevalent opinion given by scholars has identified the Qumran sect with the Essenes, of whom Josephus and Philo wrote. While it may be legitimate to attempt to prove Essene authorship as many scholars have done, it is however, illegitimate to use this theory as a universally accepted position on which all Qumran texts are interpreted. Scholarly ethics and integrity, and scientific investigation demand that each text from the caves, along with the Greek writings concerning the Essenes by Philo and Josephus, be subjected to their own separate critical review before conclusions are made.

It must be remembered that Josephus, the primary source of information about the Essenes, wrote primarily for Greek and Roman audiences, and that he wrote approximately two hundred years after the founding of the sect. At this late date, it would be impossible for him to have first hand knowledge. Also, he himself "admits to having included more than one group of sectarians under the heading 'Essenes'." "It seems from the generalizations he made in his 'Fourth Philosophy', that he may have described several groups as one." Because it is known that many Jewish sects existed during the Second Temple period, there is not enough clear evidence to conclude that the Essenes of whom Philo and Josephus described were also one and the same as the Dead Sea sect.

Before presenting the Sadducean position on the origins of the Dead Sea sect, it is appropriate and important to begin with an academic introduction of Dr. Schiffman with an explanation of his qualifications that would support and give credibility to his ability to analyze and render a scholarly evaluation with respect to the Sadducees of ancient Judaism and the origins of the Dead Sea sect and their writings.

The Dead Sea Scrolls have been Dr. Schiffman's life's work. In particular, he has focused on the unique Halakhah peculiar to the Dead Sea sect. He began his study of the legal material with his doctoral dissertation in 1974, which dealt with "The Halakhah at Qumran." A year later, in 1975, his dissertation was published in a volume by the same name, that dealt with the "conceptual framework behind the legal material in the Qumran corpus, how the sect derived its law, and how its members perceived this process. In order to test these conclusions, the Sabbath Code of the Zadokite Fragments was studied in detail." Since that time, he has gone on to study the many other aspects of Jewish legal material found at Qumran, including the nature of the sect, its structure, and its self-definition.

Dr. Schiffman is Professor of Hebrew and Judaic Studies at New York University in the Department of Hebrew and Judaic Studies and also in the Department of Near Eastern Languages and Literature. He specializes in the Judaism of late antiquity, the Dead Sea Scrolls, and the history of Jewish Law and Talmudic Literature.

In 1991, he was appointed to the team publishing and researching the Dead Sea Scrolls. Dr. Schiffman has the respect of his contemporaries in Dead Sea Scrolls research as evidenced by the comments of Herschel Shanks and Emanuel Tov on the cover of his recent book, Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls. Clearly, Dr. Schiffman is extremely knowledgeable and qualified to render an evaluation regarding the Sadducean authorship of the Dead Sea Scrolls documents.

Dr. Schiffman's position concerning the origins of the Dead Sea sect and the Scrolls is basically that:

> "The earliest members must have been Sadducees unwilling to accept the status quo establishment in the aftermath of the Maccabean revolt. The Maccabees, by replacing the Zadokite high priesthood with their own, reduced the Zadokites to a subsidiary position for as long as Hasmonaean rule lasted. Even after leaving Jerusalem, the Dead Sea sect continued to refer to its leaders as the 'Sons of Zadok'. These were indeed Sadducees who protested the imposition of Pharisaic views in the Temple under the Hasmonaean priests."

As previously mentioned, the most frequently encountered challenge to this hypothesis, comes from the writings of Josephus. From Josephus and from what we know of the teachings of the ancient Sadducees from Rabbinic writings, there appears to be a contradiction in some of the beliefs of the sect in its heyday. Dr. Schiffman answers this challenge with the following:

> "Sadducean priests were not uniform in their degree of Hellenization nor in all their beliefs. Josephus' descriptions concern only the somewhat Hellenized Sadducees of the Roman period. Moreover, I am not claiming that the Dead Sea sect as we know it is Sadducean, only that its origins and the roots of its halakhic tradition lie in the Sadducean Zadokite priesthood."

The Essenes/Qumran cult, lately the object of so much attention, play a central role in our drama and in the study of the origins of Christian doctrine. They were an extraordinary group of Jewish communist-celibates who, in their formative stage about 170 B.C.E., absorbed the metaphysics and the eschatology of the Zoroastrians, and then, some sixty-five years later, by becoming Pythagoreans, incorporated into their system much of the discipline and soteriology [doctrine of salvation] of the mystery-cults of Greece and Asia Minor. Upon all this, they engrafted a Christology which combined a Persian with a Messianic Judaic concept, which, in a period of crisis, they personalized in their martyred Teacher of Righteousness, whom they expected to return upon the clouds about 35-30 B.C.E., accompanied by myriads of angels to conduct the Last Judgment. The accounts of the Essenes left to us by Josephus, as well as Pliny and Philo, omit such crucial information concerning the religious tenants of this desert communist-celibates. It is our firm conclusion, based on all the evidence evaluated that can be possibly amassed today, that Jesus was an Jewish Essene who, convinced that he was himself the incarnate Christ destined to redeem and judge mankind, left the Qumran Order for the purpose of creating a mass-movement to prepare the people for the end of days. Let us say up front that simply said an Essene is a super-strict Pharisee with modifications to many prior Pharisee held religious beliefs.

The certainty finally emerges that Christianity was a highly composite doctrine which combined many of the age-old religious concepts first developed by Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Persians, Buddhists, and Greeks, as well as by Jews, Phrygians, Syrians, and other inhabitants of Asia Minor. Christianity was congenitally related to all of these; and when any of them accepted Christianity, they were simply recovering what was, at least in part, originally their own. This fact alone explains the rapid acceptance and spread of Christianity with a Jewish Rabbi at its center throughout an Anti-Semitic world.

This will be proven beyond any doubt if you continue to study the materials presented in the website.

MATURE ESSENISM & THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH....AS FOUND IN THE NEW TESTAMENT...A SYNOPSIS OF IT'S BELIEFS

- That the human race is divided into two groups which are forever separated, the Elect and the unrighteous, the Children of Light and the Children of Darkness....Dualism;
- That the former may be redeemed for everlasting glory in heaven, but only through divine intervention;
- That a G-d-man must appear as a human being on earth, and, in fact, had appeared, to bring salvation to humanity;
- That all of the Elect who accept him and become his disciples will be redeemed;
- That all others are doomed to suffer eternally in hell fire;
- That the Children of Light are made manifest through their celibacy, saintly brotherhood, and communal poverty and equalitarianism;
- That the god-man is the soter/savior, i.e., the divine sacrifice who gives his life for many and whose flesh and blood are consumed by his communicants so that they too may become divine and immortal;
- That in his first manifestation the savior proclaims his revelation;
- That after his death, he returns to the Father for a period while his followers preach his gospel;
- That before the end of the then existing generation he would certainly return in a grand Parousia to judge all mankind and establish the kingdom of heaven

This was the Essene-Christian faith, which is also the religion of the occident and the Western world today.

Instead of being a Divine and unique revelation from G-d, such tenants as described above can and will be shown by this writer to be nothing more than a synthesis of major doctrines contained in the religions of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Persians, Buddhists, Greeks, Phrygians, Syrians, and other inhabitants of Asia Minor.

THE FOUR MAJOR DOCTRINES OF THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH:

- Soteriology
- Eschatology
- Ethics
- The Messianic concept

I have chosen to begin the website tracing the origins of the 4 above doctrines through the prior religions of the world which provided the ultimate soil for the Essene faith. We begin by considering the sources from which the Essenes took their soteriology [salvation], that is to say, their doctrine concerning the incarnate G-dman who dies for humanity and whose body and blood must be consumed sacramentally so that the Elect may become divine and immortal. This doctrine explains the broad appeal of Christianity in the early centuries as a world religion [the nations only accepted what they already had as religious beliefs; only now applied them to a new "G-dman" named Jesus] and also explains how a religion with a Jewish Rabbi at its center could be so overwhelmingly accepted by nations who were anti-Semitic. The trail leads us first to the Egypt and the Nile, where civilization and organized religion began in the dim reaches of the prehistoric past. Our objective is to understand the forces which have created our ideologies and theologies within Christianity. It is to Egypt and Osiris, the original G-dman to which we must turn next to continue our studies and receive the answers we seek.

EXPLAINING THE BROAD APPEAL OF THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH TO AN ANTI-SEMITIC WORLD

The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures over a period of centuries. Had this not been so, it would simply have been a restrictive creed and would, like many others, soon have vanished from the stage of history. This "religious synthesis" will be found to contain a combinations of religious ideas and beliefs in four major areas or comprising four major "doctrines:

- Soteriology (doctrine of salvation)
- Eschatology
- Ethics
- Messianic Concept

This needs further elaboration.

THE BASIC ELEMENTS OF THE GOSPEL

The central elements in the Synoptic Gospels are:

- The divine, atoning, and sacrificial savior, who gives his own life to redeem that of his communicants and who, by rising from the grave, is empowered to confer divinity and immortality upon them also
- An ethical system which makes everyone economically and politically equal in a social order where want and injustice are forever abolished, and in which the family, based on sex and procreation, is replaced by the larger family of the celibate saints
- An eschatological doctrine, according to which the redeemed will enjoy everlasting happiness in communion with each other in a kingdom of righteousness, from which all others will be banished into everlasting torture
- The promise of an imminent Parousia when the "anointed" savior will reappear in power to conduct the Last Judgment and institute the everlasting celibate-communal kingdom of heaven on earth, which will then belong to the saints in perpetuity. As an additional inducement, the redeemed were to be healed of all their physical and other maladies for time and eternity. Interestingly enough, modern New Thought, while practically ignoring all other elements of the Gospel, has created what amounts to a religion out of this one facet of its elaborate synthesis.

These "cardinal" beliefs should be familiar to every Christian.

Answer for yourself: Are you aware that these "same four religious doctrines", taught as Divine revelations in Christianity, can and are located in many Gentile nations and religions that not only pre-date Christianity by thousands of years, but who inherited them through various forms of Sun-Worship? How can that be?

The immediate source of these above religious concepts was the Essene society; but their ultimate origins must be traced to the mystery-cults and the major religions of the pre-Christian world.

That is what we will do in just a moment, but first some background information into a topic which is foreign to most but which is necessary to ensure our study is successful. The topic is called "Astro-Theology."

WINTER/SUMMER SOLSTICES...SPRING/FALL EQUINOXES ...AND THEIR INFLUENCE UPON PAGAN GODMEN/SAVIORS

I would have you think as you read the following information, if such wide-spread celebrations among the non-Jewish nations of the world could account for the rise, popularity, and broad appeal of Christianity to the nations, since it can be shown that the Christian "Godman" and his "life-events" correlate exactly with the solstices and equinoxes as had all prior Solar/Sun-Godmen and "Angel-Messiahs" before him. Once familiar with the "pattern" of these "Solar-Saviors" and "Cosmic Godmen" the answer to the above question will be obvious. Let us now familiarize ourselves with the following information.

These above basic elements of the Gospel and related "religious beliefs" [Soteriology, Messianic ideas, Eschatology, Ethics] had been for millennia held as sacred among the non-Jewish nations of the world. These "religious beliefs" were derived by the Gentile nations in the form of "personified solar/sun-myths" which were also related to various agricultural phenomena as seen related to the harvest seasons, which again find themselves dependent upon the cyclical pattern of the Sun and the Cosmos. It all began with the stars in the Heavens. Let me explain.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE

Recall the prophecy of Jeremiah 10:2..." and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them."

Before Man learned to measure time in twelve month cycles time was measured by seasons. They celebrated the seasons with feasts and festivals to make the gods happy. But then Man began to gear the beginning of seasons and cycles to fixed astronomical phenomenon--that is, to the position and movement of the sun, moon, and starts. The heathen did worship the entire solar system.

The Winter Solstice is when the earth is tilted so that the North pole is farthest from the sun. In the Northern Hemisphere, this marks the shortest day of the year, the first day of Winter, usually around December 21st. In the Norther Hemisphere the earth lies in the dead of winter and nature seems "dead." Solstice's and Equinox's were actually celebrated long before Christmas ever was, and some Christmas traditions were borrowed from Winter Solstice. The Winter Solstice is the time when the Sun once more begins its tropical journey north. This, the longest night of the year, happens on the eve of the 22nd of December. This major calendrical event is the focus of religious and social festivities in all cultures, not just the Christian celebration of Christmas. The birth of the Sun has been celebrated since time immemorial on or around the solstice, which is why the birth of Jesus is celebrated at this time.

December 25 is the winter solstice. It is the time when the sun after having been at the lowest point in the heavens, beings to rise over the world with renewed vigor and power. The winter solstice was the time of heathen festivities in worship of the sun.

The day of December 25 acquired a new significance under the rule of Emperor Aurelian. He proclaimed this day as "Dies Natalis Invicti Solis," or the Birthday of the Unconquered Sun. This was because of a strange Eastern religion, Mithraism, whose god Mithras was identified with the Unconquered Sun. During the Saturnalia work of every kind ceased. Schools were closed.

Saturn, in whose honor this feast was held, was the oldest and most benign deity in ancient Italy and was fabled to have reigned during the Golden Age. This was conceived by the Romans as an era in which plenty abounded and nothing had appeared to corrupt and mar the peace and happiness of mankind. But since that time the world had gone from bad to worse. The lust of gold and the lust of blood had brought disastrous evils. The dream of an Age of Gold was widespread in the pre-Christian world. The Greeks taught men to think of it as followed by the Silver, Bronze, and Iron Ages. These ages marked the steady declension and degeneration of mankind. But they looked for the eventual return of a Gold Era. This spirit of Gentile expectancy was that of a millennial, and King Saturn would reign.

As the Saturnalia returned each year it brought with it thoughts of the peaceful reign of Saturn long, long ago, when all men were happy and all men were good.

THE EQUINOXES

The vernal equinox is the point where the sun crosses the celestial equator, about March 20, making day and night of equal length everywhere. The vernal equinox was the time of pagan spring festivals.

The Equinox's are when the earth is not tilted and day and night are the same length. This happens twice a year: around March 21st for the Vernal (Spring) Equinox, and around September 21st for the Autumnal Equinox. They mark the first days of spring and fall, respectively. Primitive man rejoiced at the Vernal Equinox as again the earth emerged from her winter's nap and the deadness of nature was "reborn" and man could see the slow emerging of greenery once again. For him this meant "life and salvation;" no longer was his life threatened by the deadly cold and the lack of vegetation for food. Sadly, at the Autumnal Equinox, man was again beginning to be threatened by what he saw and felt; temperatures were again receding and the greenery and food supply as found in nature was beginning to wain. His life was beginning to be threatened once again. Death was approaching once again. For such primitive peoples they reasoned that the Sun was dying. The death of the old year and the rebirth of the new has been celebrated since time immemorial on or around the spring equinox, which is why the death and rebirth of Jesus is celebrated at this time. The Autumn, or Fall Equinox is the time when the Sun reaches the opposite balancing point in its path through the zodiac. It is the time of ripening and harvest. Ancient agricultural societies celebrated the harvest with festivals of one kind or another, usually marking them with sacrifices to ward off the evil spirits and spirits of the dying year. The word equinox means "equal night": the duration of the day being equal to that of the night, an event which occurs but twice a year, the one marking the astrological beginning of spring and the other the ending of summer.

SUMMER SOLSTICE

Solstice [Fr. from L. solstitium; sol, the sun, and sto, to stand;] The time of year when the sun is at its greatest distance from the celestial equator. - Funk and Wagnalls Dictionary. The summer solstice occurs on June 21st. It is a time distinctive on an astrological level and also a time of year celebrated by ancient civilizations with their unique traditions to mark the summer season.

Nearly every religion of the world shows traces of astrological influence. The old Testament of the Jews, its writings by Egyptian culture, is a mass of astrological and astronomical allegories. Nearly all the mythology of Greece and Rome may be traced in star groups. The ancient systems of measuring the year were based upon the equinoxes and solstices.

The Summer Solstice is when the earth is tilted so that the North pole is nearest to the sun. In the Northern Hemisphere, this marks the longest day of the year, the first day of summer, usually around June 21st. It was at this time that man rejoiced for he experienced life and life abundantly as nature was in full bloom and his life supported plentifully by nature; both his physical conditions and food supply. The Summer Solstice is the time when the Sun turns in its tracks and begins its tropical journey south, towards the equator. This, the shortest night of the year, happens on the eve of the 22nd of June. This major calendrical event is the focus of religious and social festivities in all cultures; Christian society marks the event with St John the Baptist's Day, a Christianizing of the festival of Mithras, the Sun God.

Midsummer is the central point of the magical year: traditional hilltop bonfires are lit to revive the power of the Sun; flaming disks are thrown into the air; blazing wheels are rolled downhill; leaping and dancing around and through the fire are ritual encouragements for maximizing the harvest. Magical powers are heightened and the little people are about. It is the ideal time for gathering magical herbs: pluck them before dawn, before breakfast, while the dew still wets the petals. Fern and fern-seed is gathered on Mid-Summer's eve, to harness the power of the Sun. Golden solar flowers such as St John's wort, mugwort and mistletoe, the golden bough, are worn as garlands.

As for the history of the summer solstice, for centuries people in Europe celebrated springtime by lighting fires. These might have been fires kindled at hillsides to drive away witches and to help the sun with its task of warming the earth. On May Day the Celts, who had lived in Scotland and Ireland since ancient times, would make a fire out of gorse to burn out the witches. This was part of the Celtic fire festival called Beltane. Beltane means "Bright Fire." When the Celts decided to celebrate the solstice they simply extended their fire rituals to Midsummer Eve. In Sweden a Midsummer Tree was set up and decorated. The villagers danced around it, lit fires and jumped over them. On Midsummer Day it was also the custom for women and girls to bathe in a river. Long ago this bathing was considered magic for bringing the life-giving rain. In a river the water is always moving, always renewed.

The sun, as supreme among the celestial bodies visible to the astronomers of antiquity, was assigned to the highest of the gods and became symbolic of the supreme authority of the Creator Himself.

The Natchez Indians in the southern part of the U.S. worshipped the sun and believed their ruler was descended from him. Every summer they held a first fruits ceremony. No one was allowed to touch the ripe ears of corn in his own field until the ceremony was finished. The Hopi Indians of Arizona would have masked men wearing bright paint and feathers who danced their special rituals. They represented the dancing spirits of rain and fertility called Kachinas. The Kachinas were messengers between man and the gods. At Midsummer the Kachinas leave the Hopi villages to return to their homes in the mountains. While they are there, for half the year, they are believed to visit the dead underground and hold ceremonies for them. The Catholic Church chose Midsummer for celebrating the birth of Saint John the Baptist and called it Saint John's Day. John was the forerunner of Jesus and baptized Him in the river Jordan. Jesus had once called him, "A burning and shining light." The Church told people that Midsummer fires should represent St. John instead of the sun, however the rites and their meaning for the people changed very little until recent times.

TIME FOR COMMENTARY

Now I know this sounds so innocent but behind these "agricultural" and "cosmic" events lies a whole theology that has permeated almost every religion in the world. It is from these events that man would reason the "life and death" of his Gods. Hidden within these natural and stellar events lies a whole theology of dying and rising Gods which can be found in various degrees in almost all world religions; Christianity is indebted heavily to such agricultural and cosmic theology for its many doctrines and dogmas attached to Jesus in the New Testament. It is to these events in the Solstices and Equinoxes we must understand fully before we can tackle the "Jesus stories" and the "Christ Myths" in the New Testament and determine without a doubt their origin.

CHRISTIANITY AND PAGANISM....THE SATURNALIA

Let us try to visualize the Roman Empire before Christianity became its official religion. The city was wholly given over to idolatry. The first day of the Saturnalia began on December 17 and continued through the Kalends of January, beginning on January 1. The Kalends of January ushered in the new year. together they converted the closing and opening of the year into one continuous and uproarious carnival. The approach of the feast was hailed by Romans in the Empire with wild joy, and began when a pontiff standing in front of Saturn's temple exclaimed, "Ho Saturnalia! Ho Saturnalia!" Sandwiched in between the Saturnalia and the Kalends of January was December 25, the day, as the Romans calculated, when the sun was at its lowest ebb, ready to increase again and impart its strength to the growing things of the earth. The Roman Saturnalia was boisterous. But whatever the behavior of some Romans, others were simply merry. They ate big dinners, visited their friends, etc. The halls of the Romans were decked with boughs of laurel and of green trees, with lighted candles and with lamps--for the hovering spirits of darkness were afraid of light. Bonfires were lit in high places to strengthen the reviving sun in his course. Candles and green wreaths were given as presents, the streets were crowded with noisy processions of men and women carrying lighted tapers, and public places were decked with flowers and shrubs. The practice of giving and receiving presents was almost as common then as it is now at Christmas. Our present day "Christmas spirit" is actually the spirit of this old Roman festival.

During the Kalends of January, which lasted for three days, Roman houses were adorned with lights and greenery, and presents were given to friends and children and to the poor.

We can see how that the exchanging of gifts was an important feature of this Roman festival from the writings of Libanius, an ancient Sophist. He might be writing about Christmas in the modern world from the way it reads: The festival of the Kalends is celebrated everywhere as far as the limits of the Roman Empire extend.. The impulse to spend seizes everyone... People are not only generous towards themselves, but also towards their fellow-men. A stream of presents pours itself out on all sides... The Kalends festival banishes all that is connected with toil, and allows men to give themselves up to undisturbed enjoyment. From the minds of young people it removes two kinds of dread: the dread of the schoolmaster and the dread of the stern pedagogue... Another great quality of the festival is that it teaches men not to hold too fast to their money, but to part with it and let it pass into other hands.

Now I have described the ancient Babylonian festival, the "Zagmuk," where Christmas had its beginning and the Roman "Saturnalia," which was the merging of the Zagmuk and "Sacaea." The Greek festival in honor of Kronos was the ancient Babylonian and Persian "Sacaea." As you can see this "stellar" phenomena has influenced many nations to their very core.

Emperor Aurelian had proclaimed Mithraism as the official state religion of the Roman Empire, but "Christianity" becomes the new religion under Constantine, and the Catholic Church becomes faced with the struggle to convert the pagans.

We need answer two important questions:

- Why did the idea of celebrating the birth of Christ arise and how?
- Why was the date of December 25 chosen for this celebration?

The earliest "Christians" were not interested in Jesus' birthday, but by the fourth century they had become very much interested. While interested in the Man Christ Jesus, their thought and affection did not as yet include the Child Jesus. But they came to focus their eyes upon Jesus the infant and Mary His mother. Many people were coming to the notion that his birthday should be observed. This idea came about as the "Church" began to regard Mary, the mother of Jesus, in a new light. She had long been revered along with the saints and Apostles, but only along with them. But now in this same fourth century she emerges as the QUEEN OF HEAVEN. There never would have been a Christmas except the worship of Mary had emerged. They now put her in Heaven, not merely as an intercessor, but a Queen.

CHRISTMAS AND PAGANISM...THE WINTER SOLSTICE

Answer for yourself: Why did the catholic church choose December 25 for the birth date of Christ?

It was chosen in order to compete with the pagan winter solstice festivals. It was not chosen because it is the correct historical date for the birth of Jesus.

Answer for yourself: When was Jesus born? No one knows. There seems to have been too many calendar errors for anyone to be exact. The traditional date of the year 1 A.D. for his birth stands greatly in need of correction. Before the mode of reckoning time "by the year of our Lord," or A.D., which was introduced by Dionysus Exiguus, a Roman, time was computed from the founding of the city of Rome, usually designated by A.U.C. Dionysus made his New Era to begin on the first day of January in the 753rd year from the building of Rome; because in that year he supposed Christ to have been born. St. Matthew says Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the King. According to the best authorities this monarch died a short time before the Jewish Passover 750 U.U.C. Someplace the birth of Jesus between the years 748 and 747 A.U.C., this is, 5 and 6 B.C. Others go as far back as 8 B.C. But the Season in which he was born definitely was not winter. The Gospels tell us that at this time Caesar Augustus had decreed that all the world should be taxed. We may be assured that Rome would not order a census to be taken at the worst possible period for travel; but Luke's account that the shepherds were abiding in the field keeping watch over their flocks by night lets us know that Jesus was born in summer or early fall. Since December is cold and rainy in Judea, it is likely the shepherds would have sought shelter for their flocks at night. So December 25 is no more the correct historical date for the birth of Jesus Christ than any other date. December 25th was sacred, not only to the pagan Romans, but to the religion from Persia, Mithraism, whose followers worshipped the sun and celebrated its return to strength on that day. Mithras had attained such popularity and favor in the eyes of the emperors that Aurelian proclaimed the cult of Sol Invictus the Roman Empire's official state religion. December 25 fell between the week long feast of the Saturnalia and the Kalends of January, and it coincided more or less closely with all those mid-winter festivals at which the primitive peoples of Europe and Asia had celebrated, from time immemorial, the sun's rebirth at the Winter Solstice. To the pagans, the Saturnalia were fun. To the "Christians" the Saturnalia were an abomination in homage to a disreputable god who had no existence anyway. The "Christians" were now dedicated to the slow task of converting the pagan Romans. There were many immigrants into the ranks of the Church by this time, but the Church Fathers discovered that they were facing an invasion of pagan customs. Christianity and Paganism began contending, and for a while Mithraism was Christianity's greatest contender.

Answer for yourself: But how did the catholic church convert the pagans with their December 25th sun-worship festival?

It became the policy of the church to "transform" pagan festivals wherever possible instead of trying to abolish them and give the ancient practices a "Christian" significance. It definitely was a clever trick. The Church, in choosing December 25th to celebrate the birthday of Christ, would persuade the followers of Mithras to forsake him and turn to Christ as a the true "light of the World." The Catholic Church chose this date to celebrate the rising of the sun of Righteousness that she should thus strive to draw away to His worship the adorers of the god whose symbol and representative was the earthly sun!. The Church Fathers sought to point the pagan festival in worship of the sun toward the "Christian" Sun of Righteousness, and if these could be done then the festival in its turn must of necessity grow worthy of him it celebrated. The Church finally succeeded in taking the merriment, the greenery, the lights, and the gifts from saturn and given them to the babe of Bethlehem. By choosing December 25th, the indications are, that the Catholic Church grasped the opportunity to turn the people away from a purely pagan observance of the winter solstice to a day of adoration of Christ the Lord. She simply made the old heathen festival of the sun analogous to the birth of the "sun of Righteousness" The birth of Christ as the "Light of the World" was linked to the rebirth of the sun. The Church by making the pagan festival also the Feast of the Nativity, "sanctified" it, and thus as Christianity gained ground slowly but surely changed its ancient worship of the material sun into that of the true Light of the World. That the new festival should not be lacking in splendor and appeal the days between December 25 and January 6 (the days between the Saturnalia and the Kalends of January) were caught up into one "holy" season, with the birth of the divine Child at the beginning and the coming of the Magi (the three Wise Men) at the end. The days between Christmas and Epiphany became known as the Twelve Nights of Christmas. The word, "Christmas," came into use through the medieval custom of celebrating MASS at midnight on Christmas Eve, the only time in the year when this was permitted. BECAUSE OF THE OPPOSITION TO THE TRACES OF PAGANISM SURVIVING IN THE CHRISTMAS CUSTOMS, THE CHURCH CREATED SPECIAL MASSES TO BE PERFORMED AT MIDNIGHT, DAYBREAK, AND MORNING. Hence, the word, Christmas.

When the feast of the nativity first arose there were no bells, no greenery, and no "good cheer"" The Fathers tried strenuously to keep Christmas strictly a churchly celebration as a Worship of the Madonna and child. But they could not abolish the pagan customs of the winter solstice. Christmas was caught up with and carried away in pagan merrymaking. The Mithraism passed away leaving few marks on the nativity celebration, being the successful rival. But the same thing cannot be said of certain other festivals which closed and opened the year among Romans and Germanics, the Saturnalia and the Yule. For many a day the church fought bitterly the superstitions and excesses bound up with the Kalends and Yule. But burning denunciations and threats of excommunication failed to wean the barbarians from their heathen modes of rejoicing. Those customs which could not be uprooted and destroyed were given a "Christian" name and interpretation, and as such survive in many instances to the present day. So what the Church couldn't extricate, it sought to "consecrate" and "purify." These heathen contributions to the celebration of the nativity are what make Christmas what it is. When the season calls to mind crackling fires on the hearth, lighted candles, rooms adorned with evergreens, fruits and nuts, feast and frolic-- these are the genuine pagan elements which the catholic church could not uproot. When once drawn within the circle they were loath to leave.

Now we can answer our question poised at the beginning of this article.

Answer for yourself: Now, is there any doubt why Christianity, as molded around prior "Cosmic religious doctrines" connected with the Solstices and the Equinoxes, succeeded as a "new" faith in an Anti-Semitic world which already were familiar with "similar" Cosmic events and Astro-theology in their own current faiths of that time? Simply said, in the selling of "Christianity" to the Gentile world the "recruits" had to give up nothing and receive basically nothing new at all; their same "religious beliefs" were only applied to another Godman in their already existing pantheon...Jesus of Nazareth.

But our quest is much more defined than this for in order to trace the theological evolution that culminates in the Essene/Qumran community we must familiarize ourselves with the development of these "religious myths" in more detail as we compare nation with nation to detect the subtle differences in this "religious synthesis and evolution." It is to the study of the mystery-cults and the Essene/Qumran religious synthesis that we turn momentarily as we will trace the "basic elements of the Gospel" as outlined above through not only succeeding nations, but world religions as well. One must begin with Egypt and Osiris if one wants to find the "tap root" concerning the origin of the Essene-Christian Faith along with the earliest accounts of Solar Godmen. We turn there momentarily.

WHAT YOU WERE NEVER TOLD ABOUT THE DEAD SEA SCROLLS & THE ESSENE/QUMRAN CULT

If you are like most Christians you know very little about the Dead Sea Scrolls and their impact upon the Christian faith. I have read many authors who have written on the Dead Sea Scrolls and for the most part they say the same things. One reads book after book and we encounter basic history retold through the eyes of Josephus, Pliny, and Philo. What I found surprising as I read book after book trying to consume as much knowledge possible concerning the proto-Christian sect of Qumran was that many of their "religious beliefs" were not to be found in the Tanakh. That fact should surprise you, but if you are like most people who read books out of their "field of expertise" you have the tendency to overlook such "trivia" as you read for the over all picture of the Qumran sect. Seldom does one embark on such a tedious examination of the Essene/Qumran sect as I and others have taken and the startling results of our discovery will amaze and astonish most when they realize the stark implications that such findings bring to the origin of the Christian faith and religion. But first let us revisit the Qumran sect as we examine some general information for the readers who might find such information new.

Shortly after the second World War ancient scrolls were found in caves at Qumran near the Dead Sea. Even in the dry climate of the Judaean wilderness the scrolls had mainly crumbled to powder. But, amazingly, several were found complete and there were thousands of fragments, mainly small, some of which could be pieced together. Complete scrolls - the Manual of Discipline, the Damascus Document, the Rule of the Congregation, the Habakkuk Commentary, the War Scroll, the Temple Scroll - have been translated but scholars' comparative work has been hindered by restrictions on access to the fragments. The scandal of such restrictions on scholarship has forced more openness and now two US scholars, Eisenman and Wise, have published translations of 50 Qumran fragmentary texts not previously open to public scrutiny. With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls we have, according to Eisenman and Wise, "nothing less than a picture of the movement from which Christianity sprang in Palestine".

Ruins near the caves of the scrolls, and in just the place described by Pliny as the home of the Essenes, apparently were the headquarters of the community that had hidden the scrolls. Excavations seemed to confirm that the ruins had housed a monastic religious order similar to that of the Essenes described by Pliny, Philo and Josephus. The Damascus Document however refers to marriage and children-showing that Essenes in general were not celibate monks - and to other affiliated communities in Palestine, showing that the Qumran Community was not the only Essene settlement.

The Damascus Document, copies of which had amazingly already been found in 1897 in a Cairo synagogue, was plainly important to the sect because portions of as many as nine copies were found in the caves. In part it tells the story of a group of Jews who with their "Teacher of Righteousness" went to a place in the wilderness - which they seemed to call Damascus - to uphold the Law. They became barjonim: outsiders. They had entered into a New Covenant with God. "Damascus" seems to be Qumran, the name of Qumran at that time being otherwise unknown to us. With this knowledge Paul's trip to Damascus in the New Testament takes on a new meaning and several problems can be explained. The New Covenanters called it Damascus after a staging post of the Jews on the way to and from exile under the Babylonians.

When the First Temple was destroyed in 586 BC and the Jews were deported to Babylon, many saw it as a divine punishment for laxity in observing the Mosaic Law. Thenceforth they resolved to follow the Law to the letter. When Cyrus the Persian allowed the Jews to return to Palestine many preferred to stay behind. They had been taken as captives because of their skills, had set themselves up as scribes and artisans and were doing quite well in their new environment. Babylonia ever after had a high Jewish population.

The Damascus Document tells us of those who had returned from exile in "the land of Damascus" having gone "out of the land of Judah" and with whom:

God established his Covenant with Israel forever, revealing to them the hidden things in which all Israel had strayed where "all Israel" means the whole nation whereas "Israel" means the select few who are pure enough and observant enough - the sectarians themselves. Here the reference to the Land of Damascus cannot be to Qumran because the Damascus Document clearly says it was "out of the land of Judah" whereas Qumran is only a few miles from Jerusalem. The Damascus Document explicitly quotes, apparently by way of explanation, Amos 5:26-27 which describes the place of exile as beyond Damascus. Babylon is, of course, beyond Damascus. But Babylon had been destroyed 300 years earlier by the Persian King, Xerxes, and the Jews must have migrated to neighboring cities including Damascus. Perhaps some had been heading back to Israel but had found Damascus comfortable. It seems quite likely, that having settled at Qumran the former exiles nick-named it Damascus after their place of origin. The exilic origin of the group is supported by many rules which pertain to life among the gentiles, a situation that scarcely applied in Judaea despite it being under foreign rule, but obviously would apply to Jews living in a foreign country.

This interpretation is confirmed from an unusual source. The Damascus Document implies that not all the New Covenanters in the land of Damascus returned when the Jewish free state was set up. What happened to them? We have noted that there was after the original banishment into captivity always a large Jewish population in Mesopotamia, many Jews choosing to stay put. Among them evidently were some of the New Covenanters.

Around 800 AD a Mesopotamian Jewish reformer, Man ben David, called for a return to the basics of Judaism and a rejection of the Talmud. He wanted, like the Essenes, a literal interpretation of the Mosaic Law, and he founded a Sect called the Karaites. Scholars had noticed the astonishing similarities of the Karaites and the Essenes, separated as they were by almost a millennium. However, the discovery of the Cairo Damascus Document in 1897 seemed to them the source of Karaite beliefs. Evidently the Cairo Damascus Document was a holy book of the mediaeval Karaites who were strong in Egypt around 1000 AD when that version was transcribed. The Karaites opposed Rabbinic Judaism and proved to be very successful in the near and Middle East in mediaeval times. Now only a few thousand remain. The New Covenanters must have maintained their identity for over a thousand years in Mesopotamia before emerging as the Karaites.

The New Covenant evidently was founded by Jews in exile. The New Covenanters had returned expecting the purity of the Temple to be restored by the Maccabees. When it was not they decided to withdraw into the wilderness, to set up a pure people ready for the Judgement of God.

WHAT MOST AUTHORS ON THE ESSENE/QUMRAN CULT MISS....THE INFLUENCE OF THE EXILE

The Persian religion, founded by Zoroaster (or Zarathrustra) and whose priests came to be called the Magi, has had an influence on the world which today is unrecognized. The Neo-Pythagoreans owed much to Magian belief. Indeed Pythagoras himself was said to have learnt from the Magi of Babylon. The apocryphal Book of Tobit seems to contain a lot of Magian teaching. There seem to be links between the Jewish philosopher, Philo of Alexandria, and Zoroastrianism. The Neo-Platonist leader, Appolonius, came from Tyana, a Cappadocian city where Persian influence was strong. Gnosticism was also indebted to Persian religion. Plainly the Dead Sea Scrolls of the Qumran Community had an astonishing flavour of Persian religion, and so does Christianity. The appearance of the Wise Men of the East, considered to be Magi, in the gospel of Matthew offering gifts to the infant god seems to be a symbolic assertion that this new Christian god was superior to those of the Persian religion. It certainly implies that the writer was aware of a link, and a need to demonstrate to others who might notice it that is was not a debt.

Zoroaster was a real person but when he lived is unsure, not because there is doubt that he did but, because the evidence of the date is contradictory. It could have been any time between 1400 and 700 BC. Thus Zoroaster either preceded or was a contemporary of the prophets of Israel, Buddha, Confucius and Lao Tse. Probably about 1000 BC is the best guess because the Gathas of Zoroaster have certain things in common with the Vedas of India which are dated about then.

Before anyone other than the Pharaoh Akhenaton, Zoroaster introduced monotheism. The various tribes of Persia worshipped a pantheon of lesser gods and spirits, called Ahuras, but Zoroaster declared Ormuzd or Ahura Mazda, the Lord of Light, to be the single true God above all others. Ormuzd is the same as Varuna of the Vedas. Like Varuna, he has a surrounding court of ministering spirits. Ormuzd was "Lord", "The Wise Lord", "The First and the Last", "The Father of the Good Thought". He created Right. He promised eternal life to good people: in eternity shall the souls of the righteous be joyful.

To follow goodness or evil was one's personal choice. In the later development of the religion, Ahriman, the Devil, becomes identified with the Evil Spirit, but in the Gathas of Zoroaster the Evil Spirit is actually one of the two aspects of Ormuzd himself, the other being the Holy Spirit. When Ahriman became identified with the Evil Spirit, Ormuzd became a purely Holy Spirit. But man had free will to refuse evil in both stages of the religion.

Bliss shall flee from them that despise Righteousness. In such wise do you destroy for yourselves the spiritual life.

Either Zoroaster was a High Priest or "Zoroaster" later became a title meaning High Priest for he is sometimes referred to as the best or highest "Zoroaster" suggesting a hierarchy of priests or possibly a group of them at community level led by a "pontifex maximus". Later the priestly caste were called the Magi (like the Brahmins of India) whose leader was considered a direct successor to Zoroaster. They introduced new elements into the Persian religion and revived some old ones.

Zoroaster, like Christians, wanted to convert everyone: he sent missionaries as far as Hindustan. It has been said that Zoroaster taught nothing about God which a Christian would not endorse and much that a Christian should add. He was threatened with death by a king as a baby, started his ministry at 30, underwent a period of temptation, healed and taught. He championed the oppressed, lived an ascetic life and finally he was murdered. He described Heaven as a green place, a beautiful meadow or a Royal Park - in Persian, paradise.

Alexander's conquests (330 BC) led to the destruction of many Zoroastrian texts. According to Diodorus, the historian, the Persian archives were held at Persepolis yet Alexander burnt the city and murdered many of Persia's leading scholars. In the second century BC a king called Valkash collected the remaining scattered manuscripts and the oral tradition and tried to reconstruct the holy works. Fortunately Zoroaster's Gathas, being particularly sacred, seem to have survived essentially unaltered.

At the time of the Jewish exile in Babylonia, much Zoroastrian thought had the chance to enter Judaism and surely did. Scholars once took this for granted. Thus, in Jeremiah, Rab-Mag was the chief of the Magi. 2 Chronicles, Ezra and Deutero-Isaiah show how close Persian and Jewish thought was. Darius Hystaspes, the Persian King of about 550 BC, worshipped Ormuzd. He was probably a Zoroastrian, as was his father Cyrus. Jewish history is dated from the reign of Persian kings and the Persian king Cyrus is seen as a Deliverer. He rebuilt the Jerusalem Temple as we know from inscriptions as well as the Old Testament and was much admired by the prophet, Isaiah. Herodotus confirms that he was a noble king.

Zoroastrianism was the source of Jewish monotheism, brought from exile on the return. It has been said that the concept of Ormuzd is closer to that of the Jewish God than that of any other eastern religion. Yet prior to exile the Jewish god was a tribal god - one of many Semitic tribal gods. After the return from exile, when the sages wrote down the holy books, they introduced ideas from Zoroastrianism. Their tribal god became a universal God but one which still flavored his Chosen People. Ahuras became Angels and Demons.

Ancient Judaism knew of no Last Judgement. Before the exile the Jewish concept of death was Sheol, a dark and dismal place with no memory of God. After it the concepts of Heaven and Hell had emerged and the Jews had a doctrine of resurrection and Judgement for all. The "dry bones" of Ezekiel seems to be based on the Persian custom of leaving the dead to be picked by birds in towers, so that they do not defile the earth, after which they could be resurrected. The Persians, like the post-exilic Jews, believed the soul remained with the body for three days - a dead person was not really dead until the fourth day when the soul had departed. This explains why Jesus was to rise on the third day. It also shows that the raising of Lazarus was an afterthought. The greatness of the miracle of raising Lazarus in the fourth gospel is that he had been dead for four days. His soul had departed and he was beyond recall. One would have thought that Jesus would have saved this exceptional miracle for himself.

Zoroastrian parallels with the Qumran documents are huge. The Damascus Document condemns those who enter the New Covenant but then leave to join the Liar. The Habakkuk Commentary enlarges on the theme of the Liar, telling of trouble within the community when the Liar secedes from the order and comes into conflict with the Teacher of Righteousness. In 2 Corinthians 11:31, Paul is insistent that he "does not lie" apparently answering an unpleasant criticism of him. The choice of language in these instances stems from Zoroaster. For Zoroaster the enemy was within, the Druj or the Lie.

Let none of you listen to the Liar's words; and the "Followers of the Lie":

...at the last the Worst Existence shall be the followers of the Lie, but the Best thought to him that follows Right. Of these twain Spirits, he that followed the Lie chose the worst things; the Holiest Spirit chose Right...

Zoroaster had a doctrine of free will and individual responsibility for all actions, writing:

Whoso worketh ill for the Liar by word or thought or hands, or converts his dependents to the Good, such men meet the will of Ormuzd to his satisfaction.

Herodotus, writing about the Persians of his day, recorded:

They teach boys, from five years to twenty, three things only - to ride, to shoot and to be truthful...Most disgraceful of all is lying.

The Qumran Community was an apocalyptic sect. They were expecting the end of the world. The apocalyptic movement arose with the death of classical Jewish prophecy when the Israelites were carried off to Babylon which soon became absorbed into the empire of the Persians. The Enoch Literature is Persian of about the fourth century BC. Apocalypticism seems to owe a great deal to Persia and the influence of Persian religion on Judaism stems partly from the apocalyptic writers. The Qumran library proves that Apocalypticism was a considerable movement in Judaism not merely a fringe interest. Christian theologians used to believe that the anticipation of God's kingdom to come was uniquely Jesus's message. Now we see it was hundreds of years old, had come out of Persia with the exiles and had been perpetuated by the Essenes.

The Jewish messianic ideal of a Deliverer also came from Persia. In Persian religion Ahriman and his angels rose out of the Abyss to attack the Good spirit and the Angels of Light. Neither good nor evil was victorious but eventually Ahriman will be defeated by a Deliverer sent by god, the Saoshyant. The Saoshyant, of the line of Zoroaster or perhaps the prophet himself reincarnated (many Essenes would see in Jesus following his crucifixion that he was their reincarnated Teacher of Righteousness) heralds the beginning of a new age. There follows a "Day of the Lord" and trial by ordeal for mankind when the earth will be flooded with molten metal which bums up the wicked but allows the righteous to bathe in it as in warm milk. The earth would be levelled into a great plain just as it is in Isaiah 40. Finally Ahriman will be cast back into the Abyss and mankind will ascend to the realm of light to dwell with Ormuzd. There will be no repentance or pardon - in life, evil deeds can only be cancelled out by good deeds, and judgement is on this balance.

Such a dualistic doctrine was unknown to the ancient Hebrews. But the Qumran documents speak of Good and Evil; Light and Dark, the Way of Darkness and the Way of Light, the Spirit of Darkness and the Spirit of Light, The Children of Darkness and the Children of Light, Truth is Light, Falsehood is Darkness. The Teacher of Righteousness is opposed by Belial, the Demon of Evil. The Way of Good leads to salvation, the Way of Evil leads to torment. Of the four gospels, John reflects this terminology most accurately showing its Essene links. In 2 Corinthians 11:12-15, Paul criticizes the Archapostles as disguising themselves as "Servants of Righteousness" and uses the sentence "Satan disguises himself as an Angel of Light" both betraying Qumran influence and apparently deliberately used against the upholders of the Community tradition.

What I have just revealed to you is not found in just any "old book on the Dead Sea Scrolls." But there exists many authors who look beyond the superficial when it comes to evaluating the writings of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Too many authors, Christians included, who write on the Scrolls, follow the rather simplistic accounts of Josephus, Pliny, and Philo, and completely overlook the substrate of religious ideas from which the Essenes drew much of their theology because of their rejection by their own countrymen, the Maccabees, from becoming the righful Priests once the Temple was cleansed following the victory of the Maccabee war. For our studies it is important to note where Essene-Christian religious beliefs originated, for either such "religious ideas and dogmas" are of G-d or they are not. It is time for you to become acquainted with such information and the truths behind the origin of the Christian religion. When these Essene/Qumran religious beliefs can be seen to have been "borrowed" from Gentile paganism and cannot be found in the Pre-Exilic Israel one must question the origin of such beliefs in Post-Exilic Judaism as to their origin and validity for their faith today.

THE ZADOKITE PRIESTHOOD AND ITS IMPORTANCE IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF ESSENE/QUMRAN THEOLOGY

The Macedonian Greek, Alexander the Great, conquered Palestine in the fourth century B.C.E. After his death his empire was immediately split among his generals and Palestine became part of Egypt under the dynasty of the Ptolemies. In 200 BC however it became part of the Seleucid kingdom centered on Syria and Mesopotamia. All of these former Alexandrian territories were Greek in culture and the process of Greek cultural imperialism was called Hellenization. During his reign the Seleucid king, Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-163 BC), pressed ahead with an aggressive policy of Hellenization in Israel until 165 BC. The Jews had had enough - they revolted.

The Zadokite line of Jewish priests had been founded by Solomon and had continued unbroken since. But the Greeks opposed an inherited priesthood: they wanted anyone to have a chance of being a priest. In 172 BC Antiochus IV Epiphanes murdered Onias III, the High Priest, breaking the line of traditional Zadokite priests in Jerusalem. He put the office up to the highest bidder.

At first the Zadokites retained the office by submitting the highest bid but later Jesus, the Zadokite High Priest, lost his bid to a non-Zadokite and civil war broke out. The Jews had little chance and many were massacred. The victorious Greeks desecrated the Temple, dedicating it to Jupiter and sacrificing swine. Jerusalem became a Greek city. Baby boys went uncircumcised, priests exercised naked in the gymnasium and the king's officers went around forcing Jews to make pagan sacrifices. But at one village the local priest, Mattathias Maccabaeus, refused. Another Jew stepped forward to offer the sacrifice. The story is continued in the apocryphal book of 1 Maccabee (2:24-28):

When Mattathias saw it he burned with zeal, and his heart was stirred. He gave vent to righteous anger; he ran and killed him upon the alter. At the same time he killed the king's officer, as Phinehas did against Zimri the son of Salu. Then Mattathias cried out in the city with a loud voice, saying: ?Let every one who is zealous for the Law and supports the Covenant come out with me!? And he and his sons fled to the hills and left all that they had in the city.

Eventually the Maccabaean rebellion succeeded. Judas Maccabaeus, son of Mattathias, proved a brilliant general and defeated the Greeks setting up the Jewish dynasty of the Hasmonaeans. Judas (165 -160) was followed by his brother Jonathan (160 - 143) and another brother Simon (143 - 134). The victory of the Maccabees is still celebrated by Jews at Hanukkah.

These victories of the Maccabees induced more Jews to return from Mesopotamia including many who were zealous for the Law and were impressed by Mattathias' stand. In Palestine they were doomed to disappointment. Hellenization had not ceased. The Hasmonaeans did not return to strict tradition. Judas was keen to secure Rome as an ally against the Seleucids and signed a treaty with the Roman senate. To effect this he made Hellenized Jews his diplomats.

THE CAUSES FOR THE ADOPTION OF ANTI-JEWISH THEOLOGY BY THE ZADOKITE PRIESTS

Now here come the real problem that would, in the long run, cause the Zadokites to reject not only the Temple and the sacrificial system, but many of the tenants of Biblical Judaism and gravitate toward Zoroastrianism, Pythagoreanism, Buddhism, Egyptian religion, Solar Worship, etc. Nor did the Hasmonaeans reinstate the Zadokites: Jonathan Maccabee claimed the High Priestly office for himself. It was possibly at this point that the sect which was to become the Community of Qumran was first founded largely by zealous returners from Babylon disappointed by the turn of events. Josephus first mentions the Essenes in his description of the reign of Jonathan Maccabaeus implying that they were founded then. However many Jews at this stage still supported Jonathan. He remained in conflict with the Seleucids throughout his reign and would have been given the benefit of the doubt while he was engaged in throwing off the foreigner.

Such regard would not have been shown to his brother, Simon Maccabaeus, whose son in law killed him and his eldest and youngest sons while they were drunk on a visit to Jericho. Another son, John Hyrcanus, escaped. Meanwhile the Seleucid king, Antiochus VII Sidetes, took the chance to reassert Greek authority. One Qumran document apparently alludes to Joshua 6:26 where a "Cursed One" loses his eldest and youngest sons. In the Habakkuk Peshar we read that this priest "...walked in the ways of drunkenness ...but the cup of God's wrath will swallow him up...". Other Qumran Testimonia seem to identify this priest with Simon Maccabee. Why then did the Qumran Community hate this man so much?

Under Simon in 140 BC an assembly of Priests and Elders (Pharisees) decreed that Simon was High Priest "until a faithful prophet should arise" (1 Macc 14:30-39). The decree recognized its own illegality by making it sound only temporary through the quoted phrase about the prophet, but it removed the Zadokites permanently from office in practice because the age of prophecy had ended. Opposition was to be severely punished. An American Jewish scholar, Lawrence Schiffman, believes that the Sadducees were the Zadokites who lost control of the Temple when the Maccabees refused to return the High Priesthood to them. Later some compromised accepting back their priestly positions but under a non-Zadokite High Priest. Others refused to compromise and joined the sectarians founded earlier by a Zadokite New Covenanter, the Teacher of Righteousness, who had retreated with his followers into the wilderness to lead ritually pure lives, observing the Law strictly and following the solar calendar. The Pharisees supported the Maccabees throughout.

Another episode might also be important in the setting up of the Essene camp at Qumran-Damascus. Some scroll fragments mention three or possibly four historical people in a list of priestly courses - Aemilius, Shelamzion, Hyrcanus II and possibly Aristobulus II though only the beginning of the name can be read. The manuscript seems hostile to Scaurus and the gentiles, to Antipas, Hyrcanus and the Arabs and to Shelamzion. One deduces it favored Aristobulus. Aemilius Scaurus was a general Pompey left as governor of Syria, which included Palestine, when he returned to Rome after his conquest of Palestine in 63 BC. Scaurus was a close associate of Herod's father Antipas, one of the first Roman administrators of Jerusalem, a thoroughly Hellenized Idumaean married to an Arab princess. Scaurus helped Antipas in a campaign against the Arab King of Petra - Arabia to the Apostle, Paul. Antipas had assisted Hyrcanus, the eldest son of Shelamzion (Salome Alexandra (67 B.C.E.), wife of Alexander Jannaeus), who, the fragment tells us, "rebelled" against someone unknown, opposed Aristobulus and through his machinations and his Roman influence succeeded in securing the throne for Herod, his son, who executed Hyrcanus in 30 BC. Presumably the unknown person that Hyrcanus rebelled against was the person that he opposed, Aristobulus.

Hyrcanus was a collaborator willing to yield to the outside powers rather than take risks by opposing them. The Pharisees who supported him sided with Pompey and Scaurus. Hyrcanus and his mother Shelamzion were happy to allow the invaders to appoint the High Priests if it meant less trouble. Aristobulus on the other hand was a nationalist and gained the support of the ordinary people. The split between them allowed the Roman intervention and the eventual crowning of Herod through the cunning of his father, Antipas. The Romans attacked Aristobulus's men who, through zeal to resist foreign rule, held out against the Romans in the Temple.

Onias, called the Just by Josephus, otherwise Honi the Circle Drawer or Honi the Rainmaker, refused to condemn the followers of Aristobulus. But he did condemn the Pharisees who supported Aristobulus's brother, Hyrcanus, who welcomed the Romans and the dynasty of Herod they imposed. The defenders of the Temple astonished their attackers by continuing to carry out their Temple duties even as they were being cut down, such was their dedication. Aristobulus finished up in chains in Pompey's triumph in Rome and was eventually poisoned by Sadducees who supported Pompey in 49 BC. The following generation saw the two sons of Aristobulus, Alexander and Antigonus, defeated and beheaded by Mark Antony who put the priests in power under the patronage of the Herodians.

Robert Eisenman identifies Aristobulus as a Sadducaean nationalist and Hyrcanus II as a Pharisaic collaborationist and believes the split in the Sadducees which led to the setting up of a priesthood in exile based on Qumran occurred at this point and not in the earlier period of Simon Maccabaeus. There are others like Martin Larson who disagree. The pro-intervention Sadducees became the Herodian Boethusians of the Talmud, the Sadducees of the New Testament; the anti-interventionist, zealous Sadducees became the Qumran Essenes.

Whatever their origins, the Essenes of Qumran scorned the illegal priests of Jerusalem. Josephus says they rejected the Temple as unclean and "offered their sacrifices by themselves". The Communities of the Essenes were the True Israel and the priesthood they maintained at Qumran the true Zadokite priesthood. Following Isaiah they had gone into the wilderness to "prepare the way of the Lord in the wilderness". God's Covenant with Israel in the desert brought down by Moses had been replaced by the New Covenant with God's Elect in the desert. The military preparations the Children of Israel made to enter the promised land were now being made by God's Elect to enter the kingdom of God. God's soldiers had to be pure, whence the celibate regime, baptism and exemplary life-style. Josephus says the Essenes were pacifists but many Qumran sectarian documents are warlike in their phraseology and content. Josephus himself mentions a John the Essene who was a general in the Jewish war.

What few scholars or authors include in their many books on the Essene/Qumran cult is the chronology of the the Qumran cult's evolving rejection of many Jewish religious beliefs over the space of 100 years of their persecution and the adoption of neo-pagan Gentile religious beliefs because of the continued rejection of these rightful Zadokite Priests. Having lost all faith in the repentance of the Hasmonaeans and their rightful reinstatement to the Priesthood, let alone the influence of Rome once they appeared on the scene, one can easily see how they would believe that all hope was lost for the righting of these wrongs and Divine intervention was the only Power sufficient to best their foes. Therefore, these Qumran sectarians saw imminent judgment by the Almighty on their doorstep as their only hope. This pessimistic outlook over many years fostered these "Essenes" gravitation to apocalytpic ideas and theology and where better place to find them than the Persian faith from which their ancestors, having been captives there before, carried with them in their return to Judea. But Persia would not be the only source for their "new religious belief system" as we plan to show in this website.

As we progress in our study through the website we will take each individual theology of Persian and the other nations and show how they become incorporated one way or the other in Essene religious beliefs and theology between the years 170 to 60 B.C.E. Let us not forget that it is this "theology" of the Essenes which will later become the backbone for Christian theology; both then and now.

Let us continue as we study deeper into the Essene/Qumran cult.

THE NEW COVENANT...THE EXCLUSIVE INHERITANCE OF THE ESSENES

Jews were the Chosen People with whom God had made his Covenant. If a male Jew had been circumcised at eight days old then he was one of the Chosen. The sect of the Scrolls however was exclusive. They believed in a New Covenant between God and the remnant of Israel that was righteous.

But what has escapes the notice of many writers and most contemporary Christians who confess that they are under the "New Covenant" is that The New Covenant was exclusive of all but those individuals who having reached the age of twenty who undertook the solenm vows of the sect of the Essenes!

Dare say most Christians have not taken such vows!

Nowhere are these, who saw in themselves that they were the last remnant of Israel, called Essenes but the curators of the scrolls knew themselves by many names:

- They were the Keepers of the Covenant
- The Joiners for War
- The Holy Ones
- The Saints
- New Covenanters
- The Perfect of the Way
- The Sons of Zadok
- The Sons of Light
- The Poor Men
- The Righteous
- The Doers of the Law

The last appelation should be humorous to most Chrisitains who think they are under this "New Covenant" especially in light that they pride themselves that they are "not under the Law but under grace" (Selah)! It is amazing the terms we use to describe ourselves, like "New Covenant," when our religious belief systems betray our real identity!

From the scrolls we know the sect of Essenes was organised into two branches: celibate monks at Qumran and lay members in all the villages and towns of Palestine. Many of the scrolls are holy orders for the various classes of Essene initiates. Geza Vermes, an Emeritus Professor of Jewish Studies, assures us that there are no precedents in ancient Jewish literature for the lists of rules given in the Qumran documents like the Manual of Discipline but such literature was common in Christian communities of the early centuries as exemplified by the Didache. This cannot be coincidence and shows that Christianity stemmed from one particular type of Judaism, the Essenes, and not Judaism in general.

THE RULES OF THE NEW COVENANT OF THE ESSENES

From the Manual of Discipline we discover the rules the members of the Monastic Community were required to live by, according to their New Covenant, and they agree remarkably with Josephus. Monastic Essenes were to:

- be admitted to the Community only after a lengthy procedure;
- obey the Laws of Moses - indeed vow to be "Zealous for the Law"..."until there shall come the prophet and the Messiahs of Aaron and Israel" (apparently suggesting that three people were expected, the prophet, the Priestly Messiah and the Kingly Messiah, but it seems the two Messiahs at least were the same person);
- love G-d and each other, and hate the wicked (but leave it to G-d to punish them);
- hold their property in common under the control of a "custodian of property";
- bathe daily in holy water;
- eat each day a sacred meal and pray together;
- be ruled by a Community Council which shall "preserve the faith in the land with steadfastness and meekness and shall atone for sin by the practice of justice and by suffering the sorrows of affliction";
- maintain total self-control - members were fined if they showed anger;
- organize themselves in a strict hierarchy of members and speak only in order, keeping silent when others are speaking and respecting the wishes of the majority;
- follow meticulously the appointed times which is to say the official schedules and solar calendar;
- separate from the ung-dly;
- follow liturgy precisely.

The complicated procedure for admission was as follows

- Appear before the full congregation to be examined by the Master of the whole sect for suitability; on acceptance swear to follow the Community's interpretation of the Law of Moses - any transgression to be punished by expulsion; enter a long period of instruction by the Master in the rules of the community;
- appear for a second time before the congregation for acceptance as a novice; on acceptance spend a year as a novice regarded by members still as impure and not worthy of the sacred meal;
- appear for the third time before the congregation; on acceptance leave all possessions with the bursar who would keep them distinct from the possessions of the Community; complete a second year as a novice still unable to partake of the drink of the congregation;
- submit yet again for examination and if accepted enter fully the congregation allowing all possessions to be taken into the Community and partaking fully of the sacred meal.

The Priests blessed the Perfect who were admitted to the New Covenant with the prayer:

May G-d bless you with all good and preserve you from all evil. May G-d lighten your heart with life-giving wisdom and grant you eternal knowledge. May G-d raise his merciful face towards you for everlasting bliss.

All priestly blessings of the Most High were to be concluded with calls of Amen, Aramaic for "Truly" or "Verily" as it is often translated in the gospels.

The curses of Satan and backsliders by the Levites which followed were similarly concluded with cries of Amen, Amen.

Such was the admission procedure for the monastic body.

For a village Essene matters were less rigid but many requirements were the same as those for the monastic order. Both branches:

- considered themselves the true Israel;
- followed the Zadokite priesthood - every group of ten or more had to include a priest;
- partook of a common meal;
- arranged themselves in a strict hierarchy;
- insisted on a correct interpretation and strict adherence to the Laws of Moses;
- swore to uphold the New Covenant;
- followed a solar calendar precisely so as not to deviate from his appointed times, including holding an annual congregation.

Particular rules for village Essenes were given in the Damascus Document and the Rule of the Congregation, or the Messianic Rule as Vermes has renamed it.

- Members had to cleave to the laws of Moses but commerce with the impure and the imperfect was allowed;
- Temple sacrifice was permitted and demanded absolute ritual purity;
- full maturity was reached according to the Rule of the Congregation only at the age of 30;
- the Guardian of the "camp" or village community was its head, its teacher and its father figure - he had absolute power over members' contacts with the impure, permitting commercial transactions but not casual relationships;
- observance of the Sabbath was strict, the rule expressly forbidding the picking and eating of fruits from the fields;
- members were not allowed to bear witness in the courts of the gentiles - the Romans. The punishment was death but since the Community had no powers of capital punishment it is plain that expulsion was meant. Expulsion was eternal death, but for a strict Essene was often physical death too.

Village Essenes, unlike the monastic variety, owned their own property. Instead of holding goods in common they donated two days' wages a month into a common fund to provide for orphans, the old and needy and widows. The Community whether in the monastery or the camps was bonded by a common meal. Only the perfect were allowed to partake of it and in particular to partake of the "new wine" which is to say the unfermented grape juice of the congregation.

The Essene organization was arranged to reflect Israel as a whole being split into twelve tribes whence the distinction between Israel and "All Israel". Hierarchy was strictly enforced. Priests preceded Levites who preceded Israel who preceded Proselytes - the four ranks of membership spoken of by Josephus - and within each rank everyone had his place which was reassessed annually. The Manual of Discipline and the Damascus Document describe the hierarchy of the organization as being in thousands, hundreds, fifties and tens. Indeed the War Scroll refers to groupings of myriads. Of course they could not have been so numerous that there ever were divisions of myriads or even thousands because Josephus tells us there were only 4000 all together. Scholars inform us that there could never have been more than 200 Essenes in permanent occupation at Qumran. One concludes that they were providing for bigger numbers than they ever achieved but numbers they expected to achieve. The Commentary on Nahum explains that the ranks of the sectaries would be expanded by the conversion of the "simple of Ephraim", Jews who had been led astray by the smooth things of the Pharisees, prior to the battle with the Sons of Darkness. And the Rule of the Congregation is written specifically for all the congregation of Israel that will join the Community in the end days.

Each year all the camps - the village communities - assembled probably at Qumran for the "Feast of the Renewal of the Covenant", the principle Holy Day of the year, to renew the Covenant and to allow initiates to be regraded. It occurred on what we call Pentecost the chief of the agricultural festivals which were held every 50 days (whence Pentecontads from the Greek for fiftieth). The Pentecost of the Essenes was the Feast of the New Wheat, the Jewish Feast of Weeks, held about the beginning of June. Unfortunately the parts of the Damascus Document describing this have been lost or exist only in fragments. The leader of the monastic Community, the Master, was evidently the leader of the organization at large because he presided over this annual gathering.

At this festival, initiates were questioned on all matters to assess their progress. First they assembled in their ranks, the Priests, then the Levites and after them "all the people one after another in their thousands, hundreds, fifties and tens, that every Israelite may know his place in the Community of G-d..." Priests and Levites respectively relate G-d's kindness to Israel and Israel's failings before G-d. Acknowledgment of guilt is followed by public repentance for their sins. The confessions having been heard the Priests call upon G-d to bless the congregation, to "preserve them from evil" and to grant them wisdom and knowledge. Lastly Belial - the name the Community preferred for the Devil - is cursed and apostates of the sect equally cursed, the congregation calling out Amen to each blessing and curse.

The Damascus Document refers to three particular sins which concerned the Community, the "Three snares of Belial". They were wealth, polluting the Temple, and "fornication" which included certain types of improper marriage such as taking more than one wife or marring a niece. Another complete scroll, the Temple Scroll, echoes the Damascus Document in forbidding a king of Israel from marrying his niece. Since the only dynasty for which this was common practice was that of the Herodians, the scroll seems to refer to them. If so these scrolls must date from the time of Herod, in other words in the period of the gospels. It also negates the good terms Josephus said were shared by the Community and the Herodians. (The Temple Scroll also establishes that the Community was interested in the affairs of the Temple at Jerusalem.)

Though fornication is one of the three snares of Belial, the early characters of the Old Testament were unselfcritical fornicators. King David had many wives.

How was this to be justified? The Qumran Community did so by arguing that the Law had not yet been revealed to them or had not yet been fully revealed. They could not live according to standards that G-d had not yet provided. Paul, showing familiarity with Essene reasoning, uses a similar argument in Galatians 3 and Romans 4 to back up his rejection of the Law. Abraham could not have been restricted by a Law which did not exist yet he remained good because of his faith. Thus, Paul cunningly and evidently deliberately uses the Essenes' own argument to maintain that faith is superior to the Law.

The three snares of Belial help us to understand Jesus's outlook. Jesus also identified wealth with sin so that it was easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of G-d. He rages at the pollution of the Temple and refuses to allow divorce. Acts 15 and 2 1:25 depict James, the leader of the Jerusalem Church, as objecting to people indulging in "Blood", "fornication" and "food or things sacrificed to idols" - the latter expressing concern at the pollution of the Temple by offerings from abroad. Later we will explore the connection between James and the Essenes but for now having seen the above requirements for the New Covenant as taught by the Essenes the New Testament parallels come to mind lending credence as to the connection between the Essenes and the New Testament early community of the followers of Jesus.

THE FINAL BATTLE AND JUDGMENT AS TAUGHT BY THE ESSENES

As we progress with our studies on this website we shall see that the Essenes drew heavily from Zoroastrianism for many of their apocalyptic religious doctrines. All Essenes like Zoroaster believed that all men walk in two spirits appointed by G-d, the spirits of truth and falsehood. The cosmic balance between the spirits is equal until the fmal age and G-d has set an everlasting hatred between them. But: G-d has ordained an end for falsehood, and at the time of the visitation he will destroy it forever. Then truth, which has wallowed in the ways of wickedness during the dominion of falsehood until the appointed time of judgement, shall arise in the world forever.

With the visitation the kingdom of G-d would dawn when mankind will be purged of falsehood, individual humans being judged on the balance of the spirits within them. A cosmic battle would be fought between the forces of Light and Good and the forces of Darkness and Evil; between Truth and Lies; between G-d and Belial. Good men would be saved and the wicked condemned. The Essenes were G-d's New Covenant ready to join battle against the forces of Evil at any moment. They were in a perpetual state of readiness. They were spiritually and ritually pure through repentance and baptism. They practised the messianic meal every evening. They had the Holy Spirit with them. G-d's prophets had written down the signs of the End Time and they, the possessors of the Holy Spirit, had the power to understand these writings. Thus they scoured the Scriptures for these signs, indications that the wicked would be destroyed and they. G-d's Elect upon earth would be chosen to rule, They wrote pesharim or commentaries explaining scripture in terms of the events of the End Time ? their own time because the signs were there.

Armageddon had begun, the devout were being oppressed by The Lie. The End Time was nigh. G-d would soon intervene on their behalf.

Answer for yourself: There was just one problem with the Essene theology and their writings; do you know what it was?

THEY WERE WRONG! MOST ALL THEOLOGIES BUILT UPON ESSENE THEOLOGY ARE WRONG....THIS IS A STRONG WARNING FOR CHRISTIANITY!

Right now you need to understand, especially if you have not never studied the Dead Sea Scrolls, that the Essene theology is simply wrong as borne out by their tragic history. They did not win, they were not vindicated by G-d, their Angel-Messiah G-dman did not come and destory their enemies and did not restore them to the High Priesthood. They simply were wrong. What is even more tragic is the fact that today Christianity gets most of its theology and theological prophecy from these Essenes and their writings and their ideas, which when viewed through the lens of theological and Biblical history is seen for what it really was....a faith pinned upon hopes that dissolved by the repeated victories of the Romans against the Jewish nation. This Essene theology is totally discredited by its failure to be fulfilled as their writings not only inform us of what their beliefs were, but stand today as their greatest critic due to the abject absolute failure of their religious beliefs to be manifested. The Essenes are no more. Yet, it behoves us to learn just exactly what it is that the Essenes contribued to Christian beliefs in order to divide the foolish from what yet remains that may be from G-d.

At the appointed time the War Scroll explains that there will be a preliminary battle between the Righteous and the armies of the Kittim allied with the "Ung-dly of the Covenant" in some specific but unknown (because of scroll damage) place. Then the "Exiles of the Desert" would move to Jerusalem for the fmal battle of the first week of years. Following victory over the Romans, the Temple would be cleansed and correct Temple worship would be restored. The war would continue for another 33 years before final victory. While the Righteous pitted themselves against the Ung-dly on earth the heavens would be echoing to a mighty conflict between the archangel Michael, the Prince of Light and Belial, the prince of Darkness and their hosts of "g-ds" (Angels and Demons). The battle is indecisive because the forces of good and evil are evenly matched and victory is given to the Righteous and the Angels through G-d's intervention. There seems to be no role for the leader of the Elect except simply to lead out his forces. Beyond that victory is assured by G-d. The reward for the Righteous is explained in the Manual of Discipline:

...eternal joy in life without end, a crown of glory and a garment of majesty in unending light.

This unending light and eternal joy were simply a continuation of life on earth whereas the punishment for sinners was:

eternal torment and endless disgrace together with shameful extinction in the fire of the dark regions.

The literature of Qumran describes a messianic elite who have chosen to follow the command of Isaiah 40:3 to "make a straight Way in the wilderness for our G-d". They lived in desert camps waiting to be joined by a Heavenly Host of Angels to engage in a Holy War against their enemies. They are preparing themselves for "the End Times" by living a life of extreme purity. They sought The Way of Perfect Righteousness, The Work of the Law, and The Way in which the Law works. Acts 9:2 calls members of the early church the followers of The Way. The scroll of the Habakkuk Commentary tells us that the Council of the Community was located in Jerusalem, offering a potential link with the Jerusalem Church.

JOHN THE BAPTIST

Zacharius in the gospel of Luke (1:76-78) describes his unborn son, John the Baptist, thus:

be called the prophet of the Most High, for you will go before the Lord to prepare his ways... when the day shall dawn upon us from high... to shine upon them that sit in darkness...

There seems to be a good deal of the Essene in this language. Luke continues:

And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts until the day of his shewing unto Israel.

What is meant by "the child...was in the deserts" other than that he was brought up at Qumran. Zacharius was a priest and he and his wife were both elderly according to the New Testament. The Qumran community took in waifs, strays and orphans according to the classical writers. One of the thanksgiving hymns in the Scrolls appears to confirm this having:

...Thou wilt care for me; for my father knew me not and my mother abandoned me to thee.

So from Luke (1:5) we know John the Baptist came from a priestly family. In the Hebrew and Arabic versions of Josephus, John the Baptist is called the High Priest. Since he could not have been the High Priest of the Jerusalem Temple a position reserved at that time for a few aristocratic priestly families, the opponents of the regime must have had an alternative hierarchy with their leaders paralleling those in Jerusalem. The centre of the alternative organization was at Qumran and John could have been a High Priest of the alternative priesthood.

JOHN THE BAPTIST HAS MANY SIMILARITIES WITH THE ESSENES

- The word of God came to him, says Luke, in the wilderness which is the desolate land between Qumran and Jerusalem.
- His ministry was in all the regions around Jordan, in other words not far from Qumran.
- He baptized those who repented. People had to repent urgently and be baptized by John to be ritually pure because a "greater one" than he would come to baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire.
- He advocated communism, saying: "He who has two coats, let him share with him who has none; and he who has food, let him do likewise". The Essene monks had to give all their goods to the Community, as did the Nazarenes in the Acts of the Apostles.
- He expected a Messiah, quoting Deutero -Isaiah (40:3-4): "...the voice of one crying in the wilderness: prepare the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." The Qumran community justified their withdrawal to the wilderness with the same quotation.

The obvious difference was that John seems to be a solitary ascetic not a member of a community. Plainly though this is not true. John the Baptist had disciples as all four gospels tell us and Acts further explains that his disciples had spread far and wide. Christian baptism was rivalled by the baptism of John.

Baptism was a special rite to the Jews, a ritual purification before going to war, a soldier's oath of allegiance, a "sacramentum" and is still so called by the church. For the Elect, like those at the Qumran community, it was a cleansing of the body, the soul having already been purified by righteousness. The Essene Manual of Discipline prescribed washing in water for those who had repented:

They shall not enter the water to partake of the pure meal of the saints, for they shall not be cleansed unless they turn from their wickedness - for all who transgress his word are unclean.

And all Israel had transgressed in allowing the foreigner to rule. Thus even the Messiah, to the Jews a man - with supernatural powers maybe - but not a god, had to be washed clean of this sin by baptism.

The first gospel written, Mark, does not tell us that John the Baptist recognizes Jesus as the Messiah. Matthew introduces it and it is strengthened in Luke. But when John baptized Jesus he simultaneously crowned him a king or a High Priest because a voice acknowledges him as a Son of God.

In the gospels Jesus has the highest praise for John as the forerunner of the Messiah but otherwise the gospels play him down to a sort of opening act for the main act. Nonetheless they acknowledge that John heralded not just the Messiah but a whole period of violence:

In the days of the Baptist and until now the kingdom of Heaven has suffered violence, and the men of violence take it by force.

Though John, like Jesus, was not a miracle worker, his own disciples, like Jesus', became convinced he was the Messiah after his death. Rivalry between John's followers and those of Jesus was apparent even in the New Testament. Mandaean tradition has it that John arrived in Jerusalem and exposed Jesus as an imposter, an incident that might be reflected in the New Testament when John in prison no longer believes that Jesus is the Messiah and sends a message asking whether he is the one or whether another is to be expected. This might have reflected John's disappointment in Jesus' preparations for an uprising.

John the Baptist referred to himself as "Enosh", the reborn grandson of Adam, and so he was known by the Mandaeans who revered him. Enosh in Hebrew means "Man", so we have the curiosity that John the Baptist was the Man and Jesus was the Son of Man! This might have been a Jewish joke. If John the Baptist played the role of the priest at Jesus' baptism as seems likely then it would have been his voice announcing his "beloved son" as the coronation liturgy required. Thus we have the irreverent titles: the "Man" and the "Son" of "Man" or, in Aramaic pronunciation, "nash" and "bar nash".

Answer for yourself: Did John the Baptist live longer than Jesus?

The latest year of Jesus' death is 33 AD. The Tetrarch Philip died in 34 AD on the day that John interpreted a dream for him. Herod Antipas killed John and later was defeated in battle in 36 AD by Aretas, king of the Petraean Arabians, an event considered to have been retribution for John's murder. John must therefore have been killed within a year of 35 AD, the very year that Simon Magus, a disciple of John, led a rebellion on Mount Gerizim in Samaria. Antipas was probably more absorbed by John's potential for inflaming rebellion than he was by Salome's dance or John's criticism of his marital arrangements.

Note that Matthew's Gospel associates John's initial appearance with the return of Joseph and Mary from Egypt ("in those days..."). Since the Holy Family had fled from Herod and returned when he died, "those days" must have been about 4 BC. The apocryphal Gospel of the Twelve Apostles says that John came baptizing "in the days of Herod, king of Judaea". Thus John was at least 60 years old and more likely nearer 70 when he was murdered.

THE ESSENES AS REVOLUTIONARIES

THE STAR

The thrust of the War Scroll like many of the Qumran fragments is markedly apocalyptic. It anticipates a battle between the Kittim, the "Sons of Darkness" and the "Sons of Light". We have the familiar expression, "Sons of Light", from Persian religion for the members of the Community but who are their enemies, the Kittim? The answer seems to be the Romans.

Answer for yourself: But are the scrolls referring to the Romans of Pompey's invading armies of Republican Rome in 63 BC or the Romans of the time of Christ, soldiers of Imperial Rome?

The War Scroll says the Kittim invaders had a king, which seems to count out the invasion of Pompey because Rome was a republic - unless they regarded Pompey as a king. The Habakkuk Commentary says that the Kittim offered sacrifices to their standards. Professor Driver of Oxford University tells us this was a practice of Imperial Roman soldiers but not Republican ones. They could not have been Pompey's troops but must have been those occupying the country from 6 AD till the destruction of 70 AD. And these scrolls must have been written or edited during or after this period in the first century. Elsewhere appears the "slain of the Kittim" and the "falling of the Cedars of Lebanon". The Cedars of Lebanon mean the Priesthood or the Temple because the Hebrew root of Lebanon means white signifying the white linen of the priests (the same imagery is used of the Community itself who also wore white). These passages seem to be referring to the Jewish War and the destruction of the Temple.

The leader of the Elect in the struggle against the Kittim is the Messiah prophesied in Numbers 24:17:

There shall come forth a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, a quotation which occurs in several Qumran sources. It seems "The Star" was another name for the Messiah. This is the true source of the Star of Bethlehem in Matthew. The Star of Bethlehem has nothing to do with stars in the sky, comets or supernovas but is simply a metaphor based on the "Star" prophecy - the Star of Bethlehem means The Messiah. The Messiah is also referred to as a star in Revelations 2:27-28 and the Second Epistle of Peter 1:19:

Rev. 2:27-28 27 "And he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers; even as I received of my Father. 28 And I will give him the morning star."

Second Peter 1:19 "We have also a more sue word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts;"

A related scroll fragment ends with an explanation of Jacob's blessing on Judah (Gen 49:10):

The sceptre shall not pass from Judah, nor the staff from between his feet until the coming of Shiloh to whom the people will gather.

It interprets the sceptre as sovereignty and the staff as the Covenant of the kingdom given to the branch of David in perpetuity because he kept the Law with "the men of the Community"! Shiloh is the Messiah of Righteousness and is the same as the branch of David. The feet are the leaders of Israel. Now in the Damascus Document the sceptre is the Nasi, the Princely Leader of the Community who will smite all the children of Seth (the enemies of Israel) and the staff is the Law which has to be followed until the One who pours out Righteousness stands up " is resurrected " at the End of Days. Thus the Messiah of Righteousness and the One who pours out Righteousness are the same - the branch of David.

This is a very important passage for it would not be until the teaching of the resurrection of the "Christ," Jesus, that the Essenes would become followers of Jesus and become part of the Jesus Movement!

Nowhere in the Scriptures is Shiloh used as a messianic name except here and modem scholars tend to seek other readings. But here its interpretation is plain. Note also that, though the messianic leader will smite Israel's enemies, he is not himself the Messiah.

The Star prophecy, supported by other messianic readings, was the key to the persistent troubles in Palestine in the intertestamental period. Josephus in the Jewish War says the prediction that a world ruler would come out of Palestine was the inspiration for the Jewish revolt. Suetonius and Tacitus, apparently following him, make the same assertion. Josephus cannily gained favor with Vespasian, the invading Roman general, by telling him the prophecy had been fulfilled in his victory - he was the sceptre and would rule the Empire, which later he did. The uprising in 132 AD was evidently grounded in the same prophecy because the leader of the uprising, one bar Kosiba was renamed bar Kochba, the Son of the Star, a pun - the words have almost the same pronunciation.

The Cairo Damascus Document and the Manual of Discipline seem to imply that there would be more than one Messiah " a Kingly Messiah and a Priestly Messiah. Other texts suggest just a single Messiah.

- Thus the Qumran Damascus Document reads that there is one Messiah "of Aaron and David".
- The Cairo version describes the Messiah as "the Root of Planting out of Aaron and Israel".

Thus the Root of Planting is one Messiah out of the two lineages of Aaron and Israel, the one is both Priest and King - the Melchizedek, the name used for Christ in the Epistle to the Hebrews! Fragmentary material at Qumran confirms this.

What we fail to see in such a "Melchizedek" reference is the Gnosticism which lies at the core of Essene theology!

What so many writers and interested partes miss is that the Cairo document indicates that the Messiah had already come and later references to "arising" and "standing up" must therefore indicate resurrection. Daniel 12:13 uses the Hebrew for "standing up" in just this sense.

There are a plethora of fragments containing parts of Daniel which writings were among the most inspirational for messianic Jews at the time of Christ. Josephus in Antiquities of the Jews tells us that the Jews of the time considered Daniel as one of the greatest prophets... for the books that he wrote are left and read by us still today... he did not only prophecy future events, like the other prophets but specified the time of their accomplishment.

Prophets were seen as diviners and soothsayers in the first century and the Essenes themselves had a reputation for reliable prophesy. They would certainly have been trying to divine the signs that the End was Nigh. Fragments of a letter in the Qumran caves explain the "End of Days" which it mentions repeatedly, sometimes using the unusual description the "End Time". The letter also repeatedly mentions "the Way". It describes how at the "End Time" a particular concatenation of events occurs by which it can be recognized. The people of Israel then had to return to the Law "never to turn back" if they were to be judged as Righteous or Justified at the Day of Judgement.

At the start of the Jewish War readers of Daniel might have interpreted the 70 years of wrath (Dan 9:3) as beginning with the death of Herod (though hated enough himself, his building the Temple might have been seen as blessed compared with what followed) in 4 BC " the presumed date of the birth of Jesus - and lasting until 66 AD, the start of the ultimately failed rebellion. Furthermore the prediction in Daniel 12:7 of "the time, two times and a half" which preceded the "End Time" tied in with the three and a half years from the stoning of James the Just in 62 AD to the outbreak of the war. Thus the patriots had sufficient to convince them that the "End Time" had arrived and the battle should commence.

But thirty years earlier, the followers of the Nazarene band of Jesus probably counted the last seventy years from the time of Herod's taking Jerusalem in 37 BC. They were expecting the End Days round about 33 or 34 AD. Jesus's mission according to John, lasted about three years and he had probably allowed the three and a half years of Daniel's prophecy to build up to his revolution. If Jesus timed his mission according to the prophecy of Daniel to correspond with the "End of Days" or "End Time" he got it wrong, but then so did the diviners at the time of the Jewish War, and at many other times.

HATE YOUR ENEMIES!

A Jewish scholar, Yigael Yadin, thinks he detects a reference to the Essenes in the Sermon on the Mount when Jesus says: "Ye have heard it said... hate thine enemy. But I say to you love your enemies." Yadin assures us that there is nothing in Rabbinic Jewish tradition which urges hatred of enemies. The Essene Manual of Discipline on the other hand says new members have to swear to hate the Sons of Darkness for all eternity:

that they may love all the sons of light, each according to his lot in God's design, and hate all the sons of darkness, each according to his guilt in God's vengeance.

Nonetheless initiates were to pray:

I will pay no man the reward of evil; I will pursue him with goodness. For judgement of all the living is with God and it is he who will render to man his reward.

In practice this is turning the other cheek. Hatred of the Ungodly was required but no one could judge another man with a view to handing out punishment. He had to pursue him with goodness. All this sounds odd in the light of the War Scroll and many other texts but it was a command which would be lifted when God set about purging the world. And it was a rule which would not have applied to gentiles in any case once the End Time began. The net effect was that initiates of the Essene order had to hate the Sons of Darkness but could do nothing about it until God indicated that the end was near.

The Essenes hated foreigners. The writer of one fragment urges his readers not to give their inheritance to foreigners for "they will come to dwell among you and become your masters..." Another fragment includes the sentence "The Lord is ruler... to Him alone belongs sovereignty" which recalls Josephus who wrote of the followers of Judas of Galilee, they call no man Lord but God, thus allowing no recognition of rulers other than God. A High Priest, Joezar, son of Boethus, the Egyptian that Herod made Priest, had persuaded the Jews to pay tax to Rome which the Herodians collected. This was not popular, nor were tax collectors. An opponent of Herod, Sadduc, joined Judas of Galilee in revolt against the tax. Josephus also explains in the Jewish War that the acceptance of gifts, which was an innovation introduced by the Boethusians, helped spark the War. The Zealots were so incensed by foreign gifts to the Temple that they wanted them banned. It was the eventual refusal of the junior priests to offer foreign sacrifices that helped trigger the war.

The attitude of the Qumran Community exactly matched this. The Community was not anti-Temple but it was anti-the polluted Temple. It was zealous for a pure Temple and that was an important symbol of Jewish nationalism. The Temple was at least in part polluted by foreigners and their unclean contributions presented in "skins" of animals which had been "sacrificed to idols". These problems are unlikely to have applied at the earlier period of the Maccabees implying that they pertain to the time of Jesus.

Dogs were also banned from the Temple as unclean flesh eaters. The Elect referred to gentiles as dogs along with the deaf and the blind, metaphors for their opponents. (Those who were really crippled or infirm were considered to be under the protection of the Angels of Holiness). In this respect the Herodians were equally foreign as collaborators and in the war the rebels torched their palaces and those of the Boethusian High Priests.

The Qumran use of the word "fornication" is also relevant to the question of foreigners. It was applied to those who married outside Jewry. The essential aim was to keep Israel, a Holy People, separate from others. The command in the Manual of Discipline was to "separate yourselves" to prepare a way in the wilderness. Thus another theme arose - how to recognize purity and separateness. Separateness extended to crops in the field and fibres in a cloth " no mixing was allowed in either. In the Damascus Document the separateness of pure and impure in the Temple is considered inadequate because "they" sleep with women during their periods and "they" marry their nieces. Who are "they"? Those who sleep with women during their periods are the gentiles because Jews considered this grossly impure. Those who marry their nieces are, of course, the Herodians for whom marriage of nieces was common. The Temple was therefore itself grossly impure.

Jesus had nothing to do with foreigners. He was interested only in Jews. Even the Syro-Phoenician woman only won him over through her humbleness. Several of Jesus's remarks show disdain if not hatred for foreigners. Jesus in saying "love your enemies" spoke to Jews and knew they understood him to mean only Jews. He wanted Jews to love each other so that God's kingdom could begin. Partly this involved uniting them against the foreigner because God helped only those who help themselves. It was necessary to rid the land of the pollution of the foreigner to bring in the kingdom of God.

The Qumran sectarian documents refer to some of their enemies as "Ephraim", "builders of the wall" and "spouters of false things", the latter a play on the words "halakhot" (religious laws) and "halaqot" (false things or falsehoods). These are the Pharisees who according to the Talmud held dominance under the Maccabees. The sectarian documents refer to the Sadducees as "Manasseh". Manasseh and Ephraim were the names of the two sons of Joseph blessed by Jacob. Ephraim signifies fertility and Manasseh signifies forgetfulness. The Pharisees" fertility was in creating new laws and theSadducees forgetfulness was over the promise of Solomon to Zadok of the priesthood forever. Furthermore King Manasseh was a reformed idolater and Manasseh in Ezra signified those who had married foreign women, strong hints of Hellenization of the official Priesthood.

The Pharisees were not entirely the men of the people depicted by later Rabbinic tradition, though they possibly had the best interests of the people at heart. The Pharisees had a reputation as surrenderers. They were the "seekers after smooth things" of the Qumran writings, so called because they took the path of least resistance so that the people would suffer least. Josephus writes that two prominent rabbis, "Pollio and Sameas" " probably pseudonyms for Hillel and Shammai - convinced the people to surrender to Herod and the Romans in 37 BC. Herod remained forever in the Pharisees debt. At a later period Josephus says that it was the "principal men of the Pharisees, the Chief Priests (Herodian Sadducees) and the men of power" (the Herodians) whose intermediary was a mystery man called Saul, who invited the Romans into Jerusalem to put down the uprising in 66 AD. The Pharisees, Josephus himself and Tiberius Alexander, Philo's nephew, supervised the destruction. Pharisees were pragmatists but did not endear themselves to the Essenes who were nationalists, nor most of the people who wanted shot of the invaders.

Yigael Yadin, thinks Jesus was an Essene who advocated revision of the Manual of Discipline. Here may be a distinction between the Essenes and the Nazarenes - the Nazarenes were less exclusive. They felt that all Jews should be warned that their time was nearly up, and that they should repent if they wanted to enter the kingdom. Jesus does not regard any Jew as lost to Belial forever. His objective was to recruit Jews as soldiers of the Sons of Light for the imminent battle. Any Jew had the chance of repentance and a favorable outcome when the kingdom of God arrived no matter what sins they had committed. In this belief he was the successor of John the Baptist. His message was addressed to Jews and only Jews were included in the enemies you should love, not foreigners. The Jews were God's Chosen People. The New Covenant made with the Elect was a Covenant to guard the Old Covenant. In short the duty of the Elect was to try to carry as many of the Chosen as possible into the coming battle. The Essenes, Jesus believed were the vanguard which had to mobilize the rank and file.

Paul took this extension of the Elect of God further still. Paul opposed the views of Jesus in many way; here we find that instead of the exclusive view of Jesus regarding who was to be in the Kingdom of God, Paul wanted to give everyone the chance to join God's Elect and enter God's kingdom, even if they were gentiles.

Paul identified with the Essenes because they had split from the Jerusalem Temple. The Essenes contrasted themselves with the Temple hierarchy in the Damascus Document. Quoting Proverbs (15:8) it says:

The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord but the prayer of the righteous is his delight, which reminds us of Jesus's discussion with the Pharisee. For the Essenes the split with the Temple was of no further consequence. They were God's Elect and the dawn of the kingdom was nigh when all the wicked and their polluted Temple would be destroyed.

The kingdom never came but the Temple was destroyed by the Romans leaving the two traditions: the Pharisaic and the Essene. The one became Judaism and the other became Christianity.

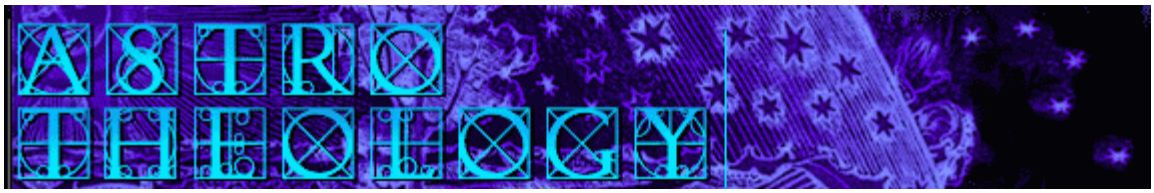
ESSENE REVOLUTIONARY ACTIVITY

The Community by the Dead Sea became particularly active at times of trouble. They seem not to be simply pacifist monks but actively engaging in the rebellions. The longest period of occupation from 4 BC to 44 AD, the very period of the gospels, was a period of constant agitation falling only just short of perpetual insurrection.

From the Hasmonaean period to the intertestamental period two powerful tendencies sundered Judaism:

- One was Hellenization
- The other was Apocalypticism.

In a way they were opposites because the Hellenizers saw a future in the Greco-Roman world whereas the Apocalypticists saw no future at all without a divine intervention. The pursuit of Hellenization was loosening the ties of the Laws of Moses to permit Jews more freedom within the Empire whereas the pursuit of Apocalyticism was cleaving rigidly to the Jewish Law, separating from the gentiles and preparing for the coming kingdom of God on earth.



The outcome was paradoxical. The victory of the Hasmonaeans supported by the pragmatism of the Pharisees kept Hellenization within bounds ultimately leading to modem Rabbinic Judaism. The Apocalyptic trend led to repeated rebellions and eventually to the destruction of the Temple and with it the priestly parties. But one apocalyptic sect - the Essenes - was to divide, break loose from the bounds of Judaism, become thoroughly Hellenized and eventually form a new world religion based on Jewish tradition and using the Jewish Holy Books.

It this group of apocalytpic Essenes which become the Proto-Christians!

THE APPLICATION OF ASTRO-THEOLOGY TO THE ESSENE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

Answer for yourself: Have you ever wondered how a religion with a Jewish Rabbi (Yeshua) at the center of it so quickly became a world-religion among anti-Semitic nations within just 2 centuries? Boy, that is a good question and the answer may surprise you!

To find this answer to the above question we must begin with the Essene priests which became some of the earliest followers of Jesus as recorded in the New Testament:

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

It is these "priests" which were members of the group commonly referred to as "Essenes" or those of the "Qumran sect" which converted in mass to the Jesus Movement following the crucifixion of Jesus. Along with the "conversion" of these Essene priests it is of major importance to recognize that these Essenes/Qumran sect brought with them their existing religious beliefs and theologies concerning their "Teacher of Righteousness" and applied them to Jesus as well. Once we understand the role and the origin for the religious beliefs attributed to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness following his death then we can more easily see how such these same "religious beliefs" were later applied to Jesus following his crucifixion by the same Essenes. All one has to do is compare doctrine for doctrine the religious beliefs held by the Qumran sect concerning their Teacher of Righteousness and those described in the New Testament concerning Jesus.

THE ESSENE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS AND WHAT THE ESSENES/QUMRAN SECT BELIEVED ABOUT HIM

There is evidence which indicates that, about 70 B.C.E., or soon thereafter, an Essene prophet known as the Teacher of Righteousness had been put to death by the Jewish authorities because of doctrinal, ritualistic, and organizational heterodoxy; that, in due course, his followers declared:

- That he was God himself
- That he had appeared as a man in Jerusalem
- That his death was an atoning sacrifice for the elect
- That he arose from the grave and returned to heaven

That he would send a representative in a few years who would be another "anointed" redeemer or a Messiah

Answer for yourself: Where do we have to look to find the origin for such religious beliefs as were held by the Essenes concerning their beloved Teacher of Righteousness?

Answer for yourself: What do all of these above "religious beliefs" which are attributed to the Essene Teacher of Righetousness have in common?

They All Find Their Origin In Sun-Worship!

That's right; all of the above religious tenants of the Essenes as applied to their Teacher of Righteousness had been applied to almost every Aryan Gentile nations' sun-gods since time immemorial.

That in itself may not be shocking but shocking should be the fact that this same Essenes/Qumran cult would see in Jesus their "returned Teacher" and begin to apply these "solar-myths" and "sun-myths" to Jesus once they converted to the Jesus Movement. When this all settles in then you should see that many of the very core religious beliefs of Christianity concerning Jesus are nothing more than re-cycled Sun-Worship. The facts and evidence are made available further on in this web-site for your inspection.

This again explains the rapid acceptance of Christianity among the nations; those to whom the "Gospel" was preached only accepted only another "flavor" of religious beliefs concerning another "Godman" since these doctrines were already familiar to them and had been since time immemorial. To further answer the above question it becomes readily obvious, once one has the information, that the rapid acceptance of Christianity, with a Jewish Rabbi at its center, by non-Jewish nations worldwide, is attributable to the fact that these non-Jewish nations were presented nothing new with the spread of Christianity; the same religious tenants presented them were, for the most part, parallel with their prior religious beliefs taken from different manifestations of Sun-Worship. Having had to give up few of their existing religious beliefs, only modifying them slightly, one now understands the rapid advance of Christianity among Gentile nations. The vast majority of these Gentile nations, into which Christianity was to be later introduced, already had in their religious tenants the same beliefs as taken from Sun-worship that we later find the the Essene/Cult:

- The belief in a God who came to earth in the form of a man
- That this Godman was to die
- The death of the Godman was understood to be a sacrificial atonement
- The Godman was believed to have rose from the head and ascended into Heaven
- That this Godman was to return, either himself or in the form of an "anointed Messiah" in order to complete redemption

If you did not notice, these "personified sun-myths," as taken from almost every Gentile nation of antiquity, are to be found reproduced in their entirety in the Essene/Qumran cult. This is problematic for the Christian.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN JESUS AND THE ESSENE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

These same "religious beliefs" which the Essene/Qumran cult applied to their beloved Teacher would later be applied to Jesus by these same Essenes once they converted to the Jesus' Movement (Acts 6:7). This fact explains the two completely different pictures of Jesus as recorded in the New Testament: the Synoptic "human" Jesus and the "super-human" Jesus of the Gospel of John.

It is the belief of many scholars today that Jesus had for some years been a full-fledged member of the Qumran Order; and that, following his immersion where God spoke over him, that he was wholly persuaded that he was himself the Messiah expected by the Community, he subsequently left it and preached the Gospel to the public; and that finally, in a revised concept of his own mission, he declared himself to be the Christ, re-enacted the role and the passion of the slain Teacher, and proclaimed that in his eschatological role he would himself reappear as the last judge and the all-powerful Son of Man.

It is also the conclusion of many scholars, as well as the New Testament as well (Acts 6:7), that the core of the pristine Christian communion consisted of individual Essenes who defected to it soon after the crucifixion; that soon after the destruction of Jerusalem they came over in large numbers and constituted the Christian-Jewish communion known as the Ebionites and Nazarenes; and, finally, that many of the multifarious primitive Gnostic communions, which flourished during the early centuries of this era, bear the indelible imprint of Essene origin and influence.

But what is unknown to most Christians today is that the above "religious beliefs" attached to the Essene Teacher of Righteousness by the Essenes following his crucifixion, although foreign to Biblical Judaism, are not foreign to the Aryan nations of the world; in fact these religious tenants of the Essene/Qumran cult are the very basics of Sun-Worship known throughout the world by the non-Jewish nations.

These "personified" sun-myths of the Essene/Qumran cult can be traced from the origin of mankind and our earliest written documents of the nations reveal this along with many archeological finds; only only need start with Osiris and Egypt to find the origin of such a Godman. Not surprisingly these documents show little variation in these sun-myths among the Gentile nations down through the centuries.

What is of interest for us in our study is that these "solar myths" of the Aryan nations would eventually find their way into the Essene/Qumran community. Again this is critical once one understands how these Essene/Qumran sect becomes the backbone of the Jesus Movement.

WHY WOULD THE ESSENES ADOPT SUCH "SUN-MYTHS" AND GRADUALLY REJECT BIBLICAL JUDAISM?

Of major importance in our study are the reasons why such "sun-myths" would be accepted by this Essene/Qumran group which began as a fiercely Judaizing program at their beginning. Once one understands the history and the dynamic developments which occurred that pushed this staunchly Jewish fraction away from Judaism then one is better equipped to understand how they would desert from Biblical Judaism over the span of 250 years and adopt a religious philosophy which has more in common with Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, and Pythagoreanism than Judaism. Once one understands the momentous developments that occurred that influenced these "pious ones" during the Inter-Testamental years then he is better equipped to understand not only the religious evolutions of the Qumran sect but how they could develop into an esoteric cults of celibate-communist apocalypticists at the end which rejected Judaism in toto.

It is to these developments we now must turn momentarily. But first, having been acquainted with the Essenes and astro-theology, the end result of such solar-mythology is the personification of sun-myths that find their ultimate expression in Sun-worship and Godmen. It is to this "pattern" of Godmen adopted by the Essenes we now turn.

THE APPLICATION OF THE OSIRIS MYTH TO THE ESSENE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

It is taken for granted that you have acquainted yourself with the Osiris Myth and its various interpretations before reading this article. If not, then do so before you read this article to ensure you get the ful meaning from it.

The available evidence indicates that, about 70 B.C.E., or soon thereafter, an Essene prophet known as the Teacher of Righteousness had been put to death by the Jewish authorities because of doctrinal, ritualistic, and organizational heterodoxy; that, in due course, his followers ascribed to him very elaborate theological doctrines which later became the bedrock of Christian doctrine as well. The Essenes believed of their Teacher of Righteousness:

- The Teacher of Righteousness was God himself
- That God had appeared among them in Jerusalem in the form of a man
- The Teacher of Righteousness death was an atoning sacrifice for the elect
- That the Teacher of Righteousness had arose from the grave and returned to heaven
- That the Teacher of Righteousness would send a representative to return in a few years

Answer for yourself: Does any of this sound familiar?

Answer for yourself: How can these Essene beliefs concerning their Teacher of Righteousness be later believed about Jesus as if they are unique and Divine revelations?

Answer for yourself: Have we confused ideas connected with the Teacher of Righteousness with Jesus because we have failed to correctly understand the Dead Sea Scroll literature and the religious beliefs of the Essenes?

Answer for yourself: What is the truth about the origins of these religious beliefs attributed originally to the Teacher of Righteousness? Are you aware that he exalted his writings above Moses?

Answer for yourself: Could the above Essene Christological beliefs attributed to the Teacher of Righteousness originate in personified Sun-worship and you not know it?

These are very important questions with startling answers. What is important for the followers of Jesus to understand right from the first is that these "religious beliefs" are precisely the picture of Jesus given the reader by the New Testament. It is not only our belief at Bet Emet Ministries, but the belief of many other Biblical scholars today, that Jesus had for some years been a full-fledged member of the Essene Order; and that, wholly persuaded that he was himself the Messiah expected by the Community, he left it and preached its Gospel to the public; and that finally, in a revised concept of his own mission, re-enacted the role and the passion of the slain Teacher, and proclaimed that in his Second Coming he would conduct the Last Judgment as the all-powerful Son of Man. This is nothing more than Essene religious doctrine long before it became "cherished Christian doctrine

It is, upon weighing the evidence at our disposal, our conclusion as well as the conclusion of many of today's leading Bible scholars on the Dead Sea Scrolls that the core of the pristine Christian communion consisted of individual Essenes who defected to it soon after the crucifixion; and that soon after the destruction of Jerusalem they came over in large numbers and constituted the Christian-Jewish communion known as the Ebionites, which treasured its Jewish heritage far more than other wings of Christianity.

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests [these being the Essenes] were obedient to the faith.

It would be these Essenes, whom, making the identification of the crucified Jesus, with their crucified Teacher of Righteousness, would convert to the Jesus Movement in the early first century. As many of them would come to the synagogue we find that they brought with them their "religious theology" concerning their Teacher of Righteousness and applied it to Jesus. Then let us understand that within the synagogue we find the mingling of theological beliefs about Jesus as the Messiah of Israel which explains the two different views of Jesus we find in the New Testament; the Synoptic Gospels and their portrayal of Jesus as fully human and the Gospel of John and his portrayal of Jesus as a Godman. It is these ideas attributed to Jesus we find in the Gospel of John that come from Essene theology and their Essene Christology.

Once understanding this then the only thing one needs to find out for himself is the origin for the Essene beliefs concerning their "Christology" and their "Teacher" and to make sure that they do not originate from Sun-Worship. Such a path is not only discouraging but heartbreaking for a Christian as one comes to the truth and facts behind the Christ of John as one sees that the figure of Essene Christology is little more than personified Sun-Worship. And let us not forget that this will become the very theological base for the Christian Church. The rest of the web-site contains the evidence proving such to be true.

THE ESSENES AS THE FIRST CHRISTIANS

Answer for yourself: Who are the Nazarenes?

Whenever as many as ten members of the Community gathered for a meal they took their seats in the order of their rank, and the Priest presided. No one could touch the bread or new wine until the Priest had blessed them and taken his. But in the Rule of the Congregation at a meeting of ten or more "Men of Renown" (Essene leaders - the Council of the Community) the Messiah is also present and takes bread and wine after the priest but before the others did, according to their seniority. Qumran scholars consider the sacred meal to anticipate the banquet in Heaven at the End of Days. They assume the participation of the Messiah to be symbolic - he was present only in spirit. But, from the description, It sounds as if the Messiah were really there. Maybe he was!

ARE THE "NAZARENES" ANOTHER NAME FOR THE ESSENES?

In the Qumran literature the Hebrew word Nasi, meaning "leader" or "prince" is used frequently to mean a messianic leader - not the Messiah as such but the "Prince of the Many".

Answer for yourself: Did the Nasi play the role of the Messiah at the sacred meal of the Council of the Community?

If so Nasi could be the real origin of the gospel term Nazarene.

Nazarene certainly did not mean "of Nazareth" because Nazareth at the time was a milestone saying "Sepphoris 4 miles". Even if it existed, which there is great doubt at the time of Jesus, it was so insignificant that it could never have been used as a helpful description. People would have said: "Jesus of where"? Nazarene was obviously a word which people understood. The Nazarenes were those who followed Jesus, the messianic leader, the Nasi. (the leader, the anointed (Messianic leader).

The Semitic root NS (Nasi) relates to lifting or carrying and metaphorically translates as forgiving as in lifting and carrying away sins. Jesus was reputed to blaspheme by forgiving sins. It is possible that the Nasi had this power.

There are several other fascinating word links between the names of Jesus and his followers, and the Essenes. The Semitic root NSR means "protector" or "saviour". The Arabs still call Christians the Nasrani. Jesus is the Greek form of the Hebrew word Joshua which means the Salvation of G-d.

Hosea, meaning Salvation, is the original name of Joshua. It is properly written Osee. The Aramaic for "save us" is "osanna" the cry of the multitude when Jesus entered Jerusalem as a king. Epiphanius speaks of the Ossenes, a Jewish sect by the Dead Sea obviously identifiable with the Essenes. Essene is properly rendered Osim, the Saviours. Thus the Osim were also the followers of the Saviour, Jesus. The Koran's name for Jesus is Essa from the same word, Osee. Epiphanius also tells us that besides Nazarenes the early Christians were known as Jessaeans. David, the great king of the Jews, the model of the warrior Messiah, was the son of Jesse. So it seems that the Jessaeans were simply followers of Jesus because he was the heir of David (before he became the son of a virgin!). The truth is slightly more extended. The identification Jessaeans comes from Isaiah which records:

And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of its roots and bear fruit, (Isa 11:1 explained further in 10), a quotation much revered by the writers of the scrolls and by Christians - Isaiah also means the Salvation of G-d! The branch is an alternative name for the Messiah. The word NSR, vocalized as netzer, means a branch " it is equivalent to the word Nazarene. This is surely what was spoken by the prophets when we read in Matthew 2:23:

and came and dwelt in a city named Nazareth: that it might be fulfilled what is spoken by the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene.

Matthew's reference to the prophets has puzzled scholars because there is no explicit mention of "a Nazarene" in the Old Testament. In the sense given it by Christians it would be surprising if there were since it is a moot point whether Nazareth existed even at the time of Jesus let alone in more ancient days. The Old Testament reference is to Isaiah's branch out of the roots of the rod of the stem of Jesse, which gives us both Nazarene and Jessaeans.

Baigent and Leigh tell us the Hebrew for Keepers of the Covenant, one of the names the Essenes chose for themselves, is Nozrei haBrit, whence Nosrim - Nazarene! Finally we know from Luke that John the Baptist was a Nazirite, one who wore his hair uncut and did not drink wine, and so also was Jesus's brother, James, who became leader after the crucifixion. The Essenes also might have been Nazirites because the wine of the messianic meal seems to have been "new" wine or unfermented grape juice. Essene references to wine should be read as new wine and the same is probably true of the gospels. Jesus was not a wine bibber.

We have several words with relevant meanings all apparently serving as the origin of the word "Nazarene". Curious? Not at all. Jews at that time loved punning, and their language lent itself to it, especially in writing where vowels were not expressed. The Nazarenes and Essenes would have loved the multiple meanings G-d had associated with their name.

Nazarenes appear to be a type of Essene. It seems to translate "those belonging to the Congregation of the Messianic Prince". Within twenty years of the crucifixion they were being called Christians.

SIMILARITIES BETWEEN JESUS AND THE ESSENE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

Jesus was a highly respected man whose prophecy that the kingdom of G-d was nigh kept his followers agog and expectant for many years after his death. As the immediacy of the kingdom receded, a corpus of teaching and narrative lore was needed to retain the interest of those who were still loyal and to attract new converts.

Answer for yourself: Where did this all come from?

Jesus the Nazarene has remarkable similarities with the Essene Teacher of Righteousness.

Answer for yourself: Did some confusion arise between the two?

The Teacher of Righteousness is referred to in the Manual of Discipline and the Damascus Document. In the Manual of Discipline the Teacher is associated with "the time of the preparation of the Way in the wilderness" by "the teaching of the miraculous Mysteries" (cf. Isa 40:1-3 which is used in the description of John the Baptist). He is commanded to be "zealous for the Law and the day of vengeance" conjuring up explicit images of the Zealots. In John 2:27 Jesus has "zeal" and in Acts 21:20 James' followers are "zealous for the Law". In the Damascus Document the Teacher is to "walk in the Laws" until the "standing up of the Messiah of Aaron and Israel in the Last days" where standing up can be synonymous with coming, return, rising or even resurrection. In the Damascus Document the Messiah (singular) of Aaron and Israel will (or did) "atone for their sins" (cf. Hebrews).

There is a reference in a scroll fragment to the "putting to death of the Righteous One". Compare this with the passage in James (5:6) which says:

Ye condemned the Righteous One; ye put him to death though he doth not resist you.

This fragment echoes other themes of, and the style of, James's epistle calling for patience and restraint. Even the language including the use of words like tongue and vipers are closely similar. Indeed the "tongue" imagery of James 3 is used to attack lying adversaries and the tongue is described by the identical, though common enough, expression, "the stumbling block", both in James and in the scroll fragment.

The above examples are beyond coincidence.

In James 2:20-24 the "Man of Emptiness" knows not that "a man was justified by his works" and "faith without works is dead", a plain contradiction of Paul's message that faith alone brings salvation, now considered to be the essence of Christianity. James is an Essene document only slightly edited by a Christian.

Other fragments also suggest that the Nasi, the Prince, of the Community was put to death, though it could be interpreted that the Nasi put someone else to death. The context is that of that revered quotation from Isaiah - "a rod shall rise from the stem of Jesse and a branch shall grow from his roots" referring to the Messiah. Elsewhere a messianic figure will overthrow the evil generation. This fragment possibly refers to a crucifixion. Though the word is not complete the meaning seems to be confirmed by a subsequent command "Let not the nail touch him". If these fragments are not referring to Jesus but to a leader of the Essenes who was crucified on an earlier occasion the whole of the gospel story is cast into doubt as a rehash of the earlier event.

THE SCROLL SCHOLAR, M. DUPONT-SOMMER, SUMMARIZATION OF THE REMARKABLE SIMILARITIES BETWEEN THE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS AND JESUS CHRIST:

- Both were martyred prophets subsequently revered by their followers as the Suffering Servant.
- Both preached penitence, poverty, humility, love of one's neighbor and chastity.
- Both prescribed observance of the Law of Moses.
- Both were the Elect of G-d and the Messiah, the redeemer of the world.
- Both were opposed by the priests, the Sadducees; were condemned and murdered.
- Both seemed to found a church whose believers thought he would return in glory, whose central rite was a sacred meal presided over by priests and whose members held goods in common and believed in brotherhood.
- Both will be the supreme judge at the Last Judgement.
- Both apparently predicted the fall of Jerusalem.

Answer for yourself: Did the Essene Teacher of Righteousness who died over a hundred years earlier become the model for Jesus Christ after the crucifixion of Jesus?

Dupont-Sommer examines the second part of Isaiah, often termed Deutero-Isaiah, which was long believed to have been written during the Babylonian exile 200 years after the first part. Here appears the account of the "Suffering Servant despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows" who has "been wounded for our transgressions" yet by whose "stripes we are healed". Christians have taken this as prophesying Jesus, but Dupont-Sommer argues that it is a direct reference to the Teacher of Righteousness added to Isaiah as late as the intertestamental period. Dupont-Sommer urges a re-examination of other Old Testament passages in Daniel, Zechariah, Psalms and the Songs of the Servant of Yahweh in Deutero-Isaiah believing them to be all possibly inserted references to the Teacher of Righteousness.

If this is true it is easy to see how the Essene/Nazarene followers of Jesus transformed him into a reflection of the Teacher of Righteousness after his crucifixion.

CHRISTIAN AND ESSENE COMMON FEATURES

Christianity and the Essenes sect have too many features in common for it to be chance.

- They both believe in baptism. Vermes tells us the Manual of Discipline ordained that the initiate "shall be made clean by the humble submission of his soul to all the precepts of G-d" but only after "his flesh is sprinkled with purifying water and sanctified by cleansing water".
- The earliest Christians "held all things common" " they were primitive communists. Yet the Manual of Discipline states that all shall bring their "knowledge, powers and possessions" into the Community, that they shall "eat in common and pray in common" and that a new member's property shall be "merged...to the Community".
- The early church in Jerusalem was led by the twelve Apostles (still twelve even after Judas had died showing that the Apostles were not particular persons but positions to be filled when vacant " fourteen or possibly fifteen Apostles are mentioned in the gospels) of whom Peter, James and John had special responsibility. The Community was led by a Council of 12 people, apparently with three priests having special responsibility.
- Both the Community and the first Christians were messianic: the Christians regarded Jesus as the Messiah; the Community had their "Teacher of Righteousness" with a similar history.
- Both communities also use the same phraseology. Jesus said:
- "blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth", an exact expression of the Community's beliefs about itself for they called themselves "the Poor" and "the Meek" and they were preparing themselves to inherit the earth when G-d's kingdom on Earth was created. Many other instances can be quoted especially from Matthew which was the one closest in language to the Aramaic.
- Both communities originally cleaved rigidly to the Law of Moses and so, evidently did Jesus because he says in the Sermon on the Mount that he has not come to destroy the Law but to fulfil it and that "one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the Law till all things be accomplished".
- If the confusion of the timing of the Last Supper in the Bible is anything to go by the calendar used by Jesus did not match the official Jewish one. The Community used a solar rather than the official lunar calendar which might have allowed Jesus and his disciples to have had their Passover meal a day earlier so that he was crucified before Passover started.
- Both communities had an identical ritual meal. The Christian one supposedly specially instituted by Jesus at the last supper, the Community one laid down in the Manual of Discipline in which the priest shall "bless the first fruits of the bread and new wine" after which the Messiah, who is present in spirit, or the Nasi, who is really present, extends his hand over the bread that they might begin.
- Both communities referred to their leader as "Master".

Both communities held an important gathering at Pentecost.

New Testament scholars believed John was the last of the gospels written and was strongly influenced by Persian religion and Platonic philosophy. From the scrolls however some scholars now take a different view - John follows the tradition of the Essenes.

John has the conflict of Light and Darkness and expressions like, "the light of life", "children of light", "walking in darkness", "the spirit of truth" and "eternal life" all of which occur in the Manual of Discipline. John has:

And all things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made.

The Manual of Discipline has the following:

And by his knowledge everything has been brought into being. And everything that is, he established for his purpose; and apart from him nothing is done.

The scroll fragments prove to be messianic, make use of the same frequent scriptural quotations used in the New Testament books, have similar concepts of Righteousness, Piety, Truth, Justification, Works, the Poor, the Meek and use similar vocabulary. The Hebrew word "hesed" in the Qumran fragments is translated by traditional Qumran scholars as "Piety" but it can also be rendered as "Grace" which is the translation used in Paul's epistles. Scroll words are Christian words.

CHRISTIAN LANGUAGE IN THE SCROLLS...THE EBIONITES HIDDEN NO LONGER

Some Scroll fragments are of hymns to the poor. The Qumran literature frequently refers to the Community as the Poor, the Meek and the Downtrodden, words all used frequently in the gospels. Like English, Hebrew has different words for them but in the scrolls they seem to be used interchangeably. One of the Community's names for itself was the "Poor Ones". The Star prophecy of the War Scroll reads that:

by the hand of the Poor Ones whom you have redeemed by Your Power and the peace of Your Mighty Wonders.., by the hand of the Poor Ones and those bent in the dust, You will deliver the enemies of all the lands and humble the mighty of the peoples to bring upon their heads the reward of the Wicked and justify the Judgement of Your Truth on all the sons of men...

Answer for yourself: Can it be coincidence that the Poor Ones was a name of the followers of James in the Jerusalem Church (Gal 2:10 and Jas 2:3-5)?

Paul claims the only condition James imposed upon him in his missions to the gentiles was to remember the poor. It sounds patronizing, as though James is reminding Paul that motherhood is a good thing. In fact he is reminding him to send money for the Poor Ones in Jerusalem, the Nazarenes who still had a lot of widows to support.

In his Ecclesiastical History written in the fourth century, Eusebius describes a deviant Christian sect, the Ebionites, who held the brother of Jesus, James the Just, in special regard. They refused to accept that Jesus was divine but thought of him as an ordinary man, naturally conceived and notable for his righteousness but having no divine aspects. They did not accept that faith was sufficient to save and were therefore careful to observe the Law in addition - "...they evinced great zeal to observe the literal sense of the Law".

They had no regard at all for Paul.

Eusebius thought their name came from their "low and mean opinions" of Christ - Ebionites comes from the word Ebionim meaning the Poor Ones. They could have been none other than the remnants of the Jerusalem Church of James the Just perpetuating the name used by the Nazarenes, the Essenes and James himself.

The Scrolls also use the same curious expression that Jesus the Nazarene uses in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:3) but has never before been found in any ancient work and was long thought to have been a mistranslation - "the poor in spirit". It appears in the War Scroll and in the Manual of Discipline.

Other Scroll fragments are replete with Christian imagery. One focuses on the Righteous, the Pious, the Meek and the Faithful, all synonyms for those who follow the Way of the Community. Echoing the Damascus Document, it says G-d visits the Meek and calls the Righteous by name. G-d's spirit hovers over the Meek announcing to them "Glad tidings" and He makes the Root of Planting grow. The Messiah "shepherds the holy ones" and he commands the "heavens and the earth" including the "Heavenly Host". The fragments contain references to "making the blind see", "raising up the downtrodden" and "resurrecting the dead". The Pious (Hasidim) are glorified on the Throne of the Eternal Kingdom. In some of the fragments the bones passage of Ezekiel is used to promise resurrection for the Pious and the Righteous.

Jesus taught "love thy neighbor as thyself" (cf. James 2:8)

James 2:8 8 If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well: (KJV) and "love the Lord thy G-d".

Josephus in Antiquities says John the Baptist taught "Righteousness toward men and Piety towards G-d" and also notes this as Essene practice. Scroll fragments tell us the Community's notion of Piety meant "loving G-d's name". Thus Essene teaching and the teaching of Jesus amount to the same thing. Both the Epistle of James and the Qumran texts associate piety with poorness and meekness and they and the gospels declare that wealth is not compatible with righteousness.

Isaiah 11.2 has:

The Spirit of the Lord would settle on him the origin of the imagery at Jesus's baptism. The scrolls have the same but expressed even more explicitly:

The Holy Spirit settled on His Messiah.

Here the Spirit of the Lord becomes the Holy Spirit and the recipient of it, His Messiah, is explicit.

Other fragmentary texts convey to us that "Perfection" language is important to the Community. Thus the scrolls and fragments have "the Perfect of the Way", "Perfection of the Way", "walking in Perfection" and "perfect Holiness" (cf. 2 Cor 7:1):

2 Cor 7:1 1 Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of G-d. (KJV)

This may be compared with the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:48):

Be perfect as your Father in Heaven is perfect.

"The Way" terminology also illustrated in these expressions and very common in the scrolls is similarly echoed in Acts (see 16:16, 18:24f, 24:22).

The Epistle of Barnabas is a second century Christian but non-canonical work full of Qumran expressions such as The Way of Light, the Way of Darkness, the Way of Holiness, the Way of Death, keeping the Law, Righteousness, the Last Judgement, Uncircumcised Heart, Dark Lord and such.

Paul is very fond of Essene words. 2 Corinthians 6:14-15 is purely Essene even to the use of the word Belial, the Essene word for Satan, the only place it ever appears in the New Testament.

2 Cor 6:14-15 14 Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? 15 And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? (KJV)

The "many" or the "majority" are common New Testament expressions usually for groups of Christians. An equivalent expression occurs in the sectarian documents and is often translated "congregation". Equally the Essene documents refer to people in some sort of official role translated as "overseer" or "guardian". It is the word which was rendered into Greek as "bishop".

In Daniel 2:44 (possibly related to Luke 21:20) Daniel prophesies that G-d will set up a kingdom which will last forever. Qumran scroll fragments speak of an Eternal Kingdom ruled by a Messiah, the Son of G-d or the Son of the Most High, whose "rule will be an eternal rule". Compare this with Luke 1:32-35:

He will be great and will be called the son of the Most High; and the Lord G-d will give him the Throne of his father David... for that reason the Holy offspring will be called the Son of G-d.

We have seen that, in the Bible, Son of G-d is a designation of a great king like David (Ps 2:7, Ps 89:27 and 2 Sam 7:14 and also Heb 1:5 and 5:5). From some scroll fragments we find the Eternal Kingdom will be an earthly one and that the Son of G-d will judge the earth and bring peace by subjugating all other kingdom's and peoples. The people of G-d will make "everyone to rest from the sword" so there will be peace on earth. The "sword of G-d" is a phrase met in the War Scroll. This imagery recalls that of Matthew,

I come not to send peace but a sword.

Besides the sword of war there is also the sword of judgement but here its contrast with peace makes the meaning clear. The sword of war is necessary to initiate the kingdom which then brings the sword of judgement and finally peace.

In parts of another document there is a set of beatitudes like those of the Sermon on the Mount. Indeed the Sermon on the Mount is remarkably reminiscent of Qumran. Some similarities have been noted. Another is that Jesus teaches that oaths are unnecessary because no one should ever tell lies (Mt 5:33-37). We have seen the concern of the community for truth. The Manual of Discipline calls the group "the community of Truth"; they rail against "The Lie"; Josephus says they refused to swear on oath and were excused from taking the oath of loyalty to Herod. The Sermon on the Mount includes the duty to turn the other cheek towards an aggressor and this too is an Essene precept, as I have noted.

Remarkable also is the set of assertions in the Sermon on the Mount introduced by "You have heard it was said..." and linked to their rebuttal by "...but I say to you..." One Qumran document, apparently a letter, lays out a set of 22 false interpretations of Law and their rebuttal. The interesting thing about it is that it uses almost the same language as the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew. A series of assertions are prefaced "You say..." and are answered by arguments preceded by "But we think..." in essence the same as Jesus does on the Mount.

SCROLL LANGUAGE IN EARLY CHRISTIAN DOCUMENTS

I have noted above that Jewish scholar, Geza Vermes, finds no parallels in traditional Jewish literature with the Qumran Rules but several with early Christian literature. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs is a non-canonical work which in its philosophy and expression seems to be a bridge between Christianity and the community of Qumran. Dr R.H.Charles, who translated the Testaments and dated them as early as 100 BC, thought there were many echoes of the Testaments in the gospels and even more in the Epistles of Paul - over 70 words are common to Paul's writings and the Testaments which do not appear anywhere else in the New Testament. The words "meekness" and "mercy" occur often.

At one point the Testaments speak of "a man who reneweth the Law in the power of the Most High" being called a deceiver and "not knowing his dignity" slain thereby "taking innocent blood through wickedness". It goes on to say...

.your holy places shall be laid waste even to the ground because of him. And ye shall have no place that is clean; but ye shall be among the gentiles a curse and a dispersion until he shall again visit you and in pity shall receive you through faith and water.

These sound like references to Jesus, the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews in 70 AD but it could perhaps refer to the Teacher of Righteousness and the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey in 63 BC. The Testaments repeatedly uses the Greek word Christos which of course could refer to Jesus but equally could simply mean Messiah. Particularly impressive is the similarity of Matthew 25:35-36 with a passage from the Testament of Joseph. The latter has lines like:

I was beset by hunger and the Lord himself nourished me. I was sick and the Lord visited me. I was alone and G-d comforted me...

While Matthew has:

I was hungry and you gave me food. 1 was sick and you visited me. I was a stranger and you welcomed me...

Passages of the Sermon on the Mount are also anticipated. It promises that the poor shall be made rich. The reader is urged to love G-d and "to love your neighbor as thyself". This doctrine seems to have become popular around that time. It appears in the Book of Jubilees and in the Zadokite documents - The Damascus Document has:

They shall love each man his brother as himself; they shall succour the poor, the sick and the needy.

And it was was offered by Rabbi Hillel, when challenged to teach the Torah as succinctly as possible, in the form:

What is hateful to thee, do not unto thy fellow." this is the whole Law.

Another early work was the Two Ways which also was not included in the canon and subsequently was lost. Later scholars found a Greek manuscript called the Didache or the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles. It began "There are two ways..." and appeared to be the missing document. It was manifestly a Christian work but portions of a Latin version were also found with scarcely any Christian references. Though Jesus is mentioned there is no indication of atonement indicating its very early date. Besides doctrines like the Way of Light and the Way of Darkness and the sacrament of baptism, it refers to the sacred meal of bread and wine and looks very much like a Christian adaptation of an early, presumably Essene, work.

Interestingly, a work that was regarded as canonical in the first few centuries of the Christian era is the Shepherd of Hermas where a Son of G-d features but is never referred to as Jesus or Christ. Furthermore the church spoken of by Hermas has a long history before the Son of G-d was sent to purify it and to recall it to G-d's commandments: it was not founded by the Son of G-d. Hermas also mentions the Didache and the Two Ways confirming our deduction above. Atonement was by baptism. This sounds very much like a Nazarene or an Essene text.

CONCLUSION

The conclusion from the body of evidence presented here must be that the Nazarenes and the Essenes had almost everything in common. Certainly there are differences, particularly those indicated in Christian documents. Some are differences that are phoney because they have been introduced by the gentile Church; the others are genuine differences because the Nazarenes were a branch of the Essenes. Mainly these all come to a relaxation of the exclusiveness of the Essenes. Yet even this might have been a part of the Essene philosophy in the sense that it allowed for the recruitment of the Simple of Ephraim to the Elect as described in the Nahum Peshar. When the diviners considered the time right a Nasi was sent out into the community to test the mettle of the Simple. This safeguarded the Essenes as a whole while allowing G-d to show whether the auguries were correct or not. John the Baptist was one such; Jesus was his heir. Jesus's success led him to think G-d was with him but then he failed in the north; or should we say Israel failed him.

The word Christianity was not used until about 50 AD in Antioch (Acts 11:26). Subsequent to then and during the earlier move from Palestine the original movement of the Zadokite Priests in protest of their ouster from their rightful positions as the High Priest of Israel we find the movement over time mutating into the Essene rejection of Judaism and finally its culmination into the Christianity we now know, but the foundations in the manuscripts of Qumran seem clear. The change was from a narrowly Jewish, nationalistic, xenophobic and apocalyptic sect attached to the Mosaic Law, to one which was cosmopolitan, free of legal obligations, dependent only on faith and pacifist, looking to a cosmic G-dman for their salvation which was itself a synthesis of the pagan mystery religions of the world. It was not a simple change and required the talents of an exceptional man to effect it. Paul, the apostate was such a man! But in the wider Empire the soil was fertile and ready to yield to a vigorous plant. The Nazarene movement became Paulinized.

There are many hard things one learns if he is truly on a quest for religious and spiritual truth. Since Christianity today is built more upon Paul than Jesus it seems when one begins to examine and expose the lies and falsehoods connected to the Paul legend one irritates Christians more than if one attacked Jesus. But such expose of Paul is necessary if one's true motive in study is to come to a place where his worship of the Creator by truly in Spirit and in Truth. It is to such an expose of Paul we must turn next.

THE ESSENES AND THEIR INFLUENCE ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

It never ceases to amaze me in my studies the overall failure of Christian commentators to be acquainted with the evolution of the Essenes and their religious doctrines, dogmas, philosophies from generation to generation. It seems as if the vast majority of writers on the Essenes read Josephus, Philo, or Pliny and believe these accounts are a realistic view of this theologically complex group of apocalyptists. An unbiased study of the Essenes will show that this group grew by gradual stages, from a Judaizing program at the beginning into an esoteric cult of celibate-communist apocalytpists at the end which had repudiated Judaism to a wide extent. Serious investigation into these Essenes will reveal how they were able to create in secrecy the elements, which, according to accepted Christian history, were proclaimed for the first time to an astonished public by John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth. Their secret doctrines were now for the first time being publicly proclaimed to the masses. The story of the Essenes is in reality the story of the origin of Christianity.

Many writers, including Martin Larson, Dupont-Sommer, Edmund Wilson, John M. Allegro, Robert Eisenmann, L. Schiffman, M. Burrows, G. Vermes, and many others, have given vivid intimations of this. The knowledge gleaned from these men and their research into Essene history as well as their religious doctrines, gives unsuspected light upon the origin of Christianity and the career of its founder, as well as that of a predecessor, the Teacher of Righteousness.

THE HISTORY OF THE EVOLUTION OF THE ESSENES

The Qumran sect's origins are postulated by some scholars to be in the communities of the Hasidim, the pious anti-Hellenistic circles formed in the early days of the Maccabees. The Hasidim may have been the precursors of the Essenes, who were concerned about growing Hellenization and strove to abide by the Torah. Archeological and historical evidence indicates that Qumran was founded in the second half of the second century B.C.E., during the time of the Maccabean dynasty. A hiatus in the occupation of the site is linked to evidence of a huge earthquake. Qumran was abandoned about the time of the Roman incursion of 68 C.E., two years before the collapse of Jewish self-government in Judea and the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 70 C.E. The chief sources of information for the history of this fateful time span are the Qumran scrolls and the excavations, but earlier information on the Essenes was provided by their contemporaries: Josephus Flavius, Philo of Alexandria, and Pliny the Elder. Their summary accounts are continuously being borne out by the site excavations and study of the writings. The historian Josephus relates the division of the Jews of the Second Temple period into three orders: the Sadducees, the Pharisees, and the Essenes. The Sadducees included mainly the priestly and aristocratic families; the Pharisees constituted the lay circles; and the Essenes were a separatist group, part of which formed an ascetic monastic community that retreated to the wilderness. The exact political and religious affinities of each of these groups, as well as their development and interrelationships, are left relatively obscure by these three accounts and more investigation is needed to come to the truth about this group in light of the widely disparate scholarly views that exist today.

The crisis that brought about the secession of the Essenes from mainstream Judaism is thought to have occurred when the Maccabean ruling princes Jonathan (160-142 B.C.E.) and Simeon (142-134 B.C.E.) usurped the office of high priest (which included secular duties), much to the consternation of conservative Jews; some of them could not tolerate the situation and denounced the new rulers. The persecution of the Essenes and their leader, the teacher of righteousness probably elicited the sect's apocalyptic visions. These included the overthrow of "the wicked priest" of Jerusalem and of the evil people and, in the dawn of the Messianic Age, the recognition of their community as the true Israel. The retreat of these Jews into the desert would enable them "to separate themselves from the congregation of perverse men (IQ Serekh 5:2).

The Essenes persisted in a separatist existence through two centuries, occupying themselves with study and a communal way of life that included worship, prayer, and work. It is clear, however, that large groups of adherents also lived in towns and villages outside the Qumran area.

By 143 B.C.E., the Zadokites had become known definitely as the Sadducees; and the Chasidim, splitting into two parties, had become known as the Pharisees and the Essenes. The Essenes could be looked upon as "ultra-strict" Pharisees. The Sadducees became identified with the rich and successful; the Pharisees became the popular leaders; and the Essenes gradually evolved into an esoteric communion of celibate communists.

As stated above, it is a shame that so few have endeavored to trace the evolution of these Essenes (Holy Ones) from their pristine, pre-Chasidic beginnings as a Zadokite reaction against Hellenization among the Jews, into the frozen, rigid, esoteric, and celibate-communist mystery-cult which they had become in the days of Philo and Josephus. Until this is done then it is very difficult to look at the writings left from this group of individuals and discern that many of their "religious doctrines" originated outside of normative Judaism and find their points of origin in the Pythagorean, Buddhist, and Iranian religious culture.

There is evidence which indicated that, about 70 B.C.E. or soon thereafter, an Essene prophet known as the Teacher of Righteousness had been put to death by the Jewish authorities because of doctrinal, ritualistic, and organizational heterodoxy; that, in due course, his followers declared that he was God himself, appearing as a man in Jerusalem, and that his death was an atoning sacrifice for the elect; that he arose from the grace and returned to heaven; and that he would send a representative in a few years who would be precisely the kind of Messiah that was proclaimed for Jesus by his followers. There is a strong indication that if Jesus was not at one time affiliated with the Essenes, that he was strongly influenced by them and their doctrines; yet at times we find Jesus' individuality and diversion from some of the Essene tenants. Many feel that Jesus was persuaded that he was himself the Messiah expected by the Essene Community, that he left it and preached the Gospel to the public; and that finally, in a revised concept of his own mission, re-enacted the role and the passion of the slain Teacher, and proclaimed that in his eschatological role he would appear as the last judge and the all-powerful Son of Man.

The book of Acts attests that the core of the pristine Christian communion consisted of individual Essenes who defected to it soon after Jesus' crucifixion; that soon after the destruction of Jerusalem these Essene Priests came over in large numbers and constituted the Christian-Essene communion known as the Ebionites; and, finally, that many of the multifarious primitive Gnostic communions, which flourished during the early centuries of this era, bear the indelible imprint of Essene origin and influence.

Those who speak of "our Judeo-Christian tradition or culture" are laboring under a serious misconception. Ours is not the social, political, or economic system reflected in the Mosaic Law or the Yahweh prophets, which existed in Palestine following David and Solomon; and western life is separated by an even more impassable gulf from the ethics, political economy, and religious discipline set forth in the Essene and Synoptic Scriptures. Our culture is based substantially upon Graeco-Roman antecedents. The Essenes absorbed their basic ideology originally from Zoroastrianism and later from Greek-mystery sources, particularly Pythagoreanism. The Essenes group, originally a return to Torah movement, would evolve into a group that would reject Judaism in toto; and except for certain Buddhist accretions, Jesus and the pristine church reproduced the Essene pattern faithfully. Since, however, this form of Christianity was wholly unacceptable in the pagan world, it was Hellenized in the Pauline literature and the Fourth Gospel, both of which reflect Stoic influence; these eventually became the essential foundation for that reconstruction or restitution of Christianity known as the Protestant Reformation. Ancient Hellenized Christianity itself did not long survive; for the soon-to-be victorious Catholic Church, in order to establish itself as a theocracy, absorbed their most salient elements from the great pagan cults which were its competitors.

It should be obvious to almost any reader or disinterested observer that very few indeed believe and fewer still practice the Gospel as proclaimed in the New Testament, especially the Synoptics. A dwindling minority profess to embrace one or two of its elements, while ignoring the remainder. It is safe to say that not one American in a thousand would accept the Gospel if he were required to live according to its commandments.

Answer for yourself: Why, then, does it continue as the dominant religion of the western world?

Neither inertia or surrender to the past nor yet the power of vested and venerable institutions can explain the power of the Christian religion. For the dominance of Christianity in the western world finds its momentum from the fact that Paul and the writer of the Fourth Gospel Hellenized the pristine Essene evangel, then it was paganized by Catholicism, and then the Protestant Reformation revolutionized, not only the religious, but also the political and economic structure of northern Europe. The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures over a period of centuries. Had this not been so, it would simply have been a restrictive creed and would, like many others, soon have vanished from the stage of history.

The central elements in the Synoptic Gospels are:

- The divine, atoning, and sacrificial savior, who gives his own life to redeem that of his communicants and who, by rising from the grave, is empowered to confer divinity and immortality upon them also
- An ethical system which makes every one economically and politically equal in a social order where want and injustice are forever abolished, and in which the family, based on sex and procreation, is replaced by the larger family of the celibate saints
- An eschatological doctrine, according to which the redeemed will enjoy everlasting happiness in communion with each other in a kingdom of righteousness, from which all others will be banished into everlasting torture
- The promise of an imminent Parousia when the savior will reappear in power to conduct the Last Judgment and institute the everlasting celibate-communal kingdom of heaven on earth, which will then belong to the saints in perpetuity.
- The redeemed were to be healed of all their physical and other maladies for time and eternity

What escapes the understanding of 99.9 % of all Christians is that the immediate source of these concepts for Christianity was the Essene society. Behind the Essenes lie the ultimate origins of these above religious concepts must can be traced down through history from Egypt to the Essenes of Judaism as we see the involvement of the mystery-cults infused into Essene Judeo-Christianity along with the major religions of the pre-Christian world pagan world...such as:

- 1. Egypt and the Original Saviour God...Osiris
- 2. Adonis and Aphrodite
- 3. The Greek Dionysus

The Essenes of Jesus' day had evolved into a syncretistic religious group that contained all of the above religious beliefs mixed in with normative Judaism...and out came Christianity after the death of Jesus as some or all of the beliefs from the above varieties of pagan religions was applied to him by the Essenes.

THE TRADITIONAL AND POPULAR MISCONCEPTION CONCERNING THE ESSENES

Most believe, judging by the recent publicity concerning the Dead Sea Scrolls since their discovery, that the casual inquirer might conclude that the existence of the pre-Christian Essene cult was revealed for the first time after a Bedouin boy, following his goat, discovered a cave near the Dead Sea in 1947. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The truth is that many scholars and historians had dealt with this religious organization at length in articles, essays, and even in elaborate scholarly works long before the discovery of the caves. Every competent student of western religion knows well of the celebrated passages in Pliny, Philo, and Josephus describing the Essenes and most take for granted this is all that is needed to be known to describe this religious sect and their beliefs. Again nothing could be further from the truth and far too many Christian writers and "supposed" authors of the Dead Sea Scrolls have failed to look beyond these three "summary statements" in writing upon the pre-Christian Essenes.

Enough material to fill a small library has now been produced concerning the Essenes; and yet, in spite of all the advantages available to modern scholarship, one of the most accurate analyses of them yet today was published in 1889 and was authored by Frederick William Evans. He maintained that Jesus was heavily influenced by Essene theology and was most likely a member of the order at one time (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 21). John Allegro also stated: "The Essenes were, many of them, converted on the day of Pentecost, and formed the body of the Jerusalem Church, with its spiritual origin" (John Allegro, The Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 161). Allegro goes on to say: "the members of the first Christian Church 'were Essenes. They loved one another so that they sold their possessions and had all things in common. They forsook the generative life, with its wives and husbands, for Christ's sake and the Gospel's…" Jesus then, taught celibacy and communism; and the first Jerusalem Church consisted largely of Essenes who came over to Christianity.

As stated in another article, the Essenes of Jesus' day were a far cry from the Essenes who began a separatist movement from the Temple and corruption of the Priesthood in roughly 150 B.C.E. Warren Felt Evans, who died in 1889, makes mention of the "method of healing practiced by Jesus, and perhaps also of the mystic Pythagorean sect of the Jews called the Essenes…to which sect Jesus himself unquestionably belonged" (Ibid.). Evans states that the writer of the Gospel of Luke was an Essene (Esoteric Christianity, Boston, 1886, p. 100), and he adds: "Jesus came to do for the world at large, by revealing the sublime wisdom of the ancient mystical sects and brotherhoods, what had been done only for the chosen few in the sacred privacy of the inner recesses of the temple" (Ibid., p. 79). "Jesus, then, according to this was an Essene; the Essenes were Pythagoreans; and the unique mission of Jesus was to reveal the esoteric doctrines of the Essene-Pythagoreans to the world at large" (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 21-22).

The surprising this is not that the Essenes have been well known, but that very little has been understood concerning their esoteric nature and doctrines. Even more amazing is the fact that although several of their most important documents have long been extant and widely circulated, not even the most acute scholars ever suspected the true origin of these before 1947; and that to this day a great deal of confusion persists concerning them.

THE NATURE OF THE ESSENE FAITH

Among a people totally dedicated to religion, the Essenes, from their proto-beginnings to the end of their career, were the most fervent, pietistic, and dedicated. Furthermore, after the consolidation of Yahwism, the Essenes alone were able to absorb the essence of other religions and so create a new and powerful synthesis of their own. It is for these reasons that several Jewish scholars have found it difficult to accept the Essene documents. J. L. Teicher, agreeing with various other writers, maintains that the Essenes were none other than a cult of Christians (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 25). Upton C. Ewing believes that all the Christological and Messianic references in Essene literature point only to the founder of Christianity, that they are, therefore, genuinely prophetic, and that there was only a single cult of this kind in Palestine, which might be called Essene-Christian (The Prophet of the Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 132-133).

But before we call this religious sectarian group "proto-Christian" we need to look at the religious beliefs they held; both in the beginning of their conception as well as their demise.

Like many other cults, the Essenes began by accepting the dominant religion of Judaism and its Scriptures; before very long they were creating new and divergent revelations, which to them in time became superior to the orthodox or to the writings of Moses. Every successful prophet builds upon, but remakes, the doctrines and practices accepted by his prospective converts. Thus, almost every new faith possesses in reality two related but also disparate scriptures: first, the established and conventional; and, second, the new revelations, the distinctive possession of the avant-garde. Thereupon, the cult takes the next step; it claims also a unique power to interpret the old canon. Thus, the new communion become independent. Almost from the beginning the Essenes began the creation of new scriptures; and they believed with realizing certainty that their leader, known in successive generations as the Teacher of Righteousness, the Master of Justice, the Man Who Reneweth the Law, etc., alone could reveal the esoteric and prophetic meanings of the orthodox Jewish canon (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 26-27).

THE ESSENE METHODOLOGY IN CREATING NEW SCRIPTURE

Answer for yourself: What is the pseudepigraphic technique as used by the Essenes?

The Essenes were certain that their scriptures, especially the Book of Enoch, possessed unquestionable priority and supremacy. The unparalleled authority of such works lay in their exact prophecies, accurate to the date of composition, which the amazed communicant could easily understand. These already-accomplished predictions were then followed by others for which similar and imminent fulfillment was confidently expected. This is known as the pseudepigraphic method; and behind it lies a long and interesting story.

When the Jewish priests consolidated their power after the return from Babylon, they outlawed all prophecy (Zech. 13:3-6), since that could disturb the public tranquillity and discredit the incumbent priesthood. The purpose of this proscription was to freeze the existing canon. The ingenuity of man, however, is not so easily thwarted; and effective techniques were developed by which new revelations could be promulgated. The ban against prophecy gave rise to the literary form known as the pseudepigraphic apocalypse, which was to play so large a role for several centuries in Jewish life.

The method is daring: a fervent prophet with an irrepressible message composes a "revelation" which he attributes to some ancient personage, provides a suitable historical setting, delineates history up to his own day under an easily understood symbolism, and the, relying on the credit established for the immediate future, especially an eschatological cataclysm. The Chasids, the Essenes, and the Pharisees became masters of this pseudepigraphic method and, by its use, composed an entire corpus of extraordinary literature, edited by R.H. Charles and published in 1913 as the Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE ESSENE CULT

THE ZADOKITE PERIOD 195-175 B.C.E.

For want of a better description, we can refer to the earliest anti-Hellenizing reaction among the Jews as the Zadokite movement: it began and ended during this period.

THE CHASIDIC PERIOD 175-145 B.C.E.

This period is best described as the "proto-Essenism" period. These thirty years were crucial for the formation of the ultimate Essene theology. The Chasids (Chasidim, Hasidaeans) came into existence about 175 B.C.E. and had split away from the more conservative Zadokites. These Chasids formed a fervent and militant organization dedicated to the establishment of a purified Judaism. The immediate objective was the total defeat of the Syrian Hellenizers and the Jewish apostates who cooperated with and supported them. For some reason, an extraordinary event seems to have occurred during the first decade of this period, without which there would probably never have been any Essene communion; the Chasidim split into two divisions., of which one remained in Judea while the other exiled itself, or was driven, into the Syrian desert, not far from Damascus, shortly before or about the year 170 B.C.E.

However, the evidence indicates also that these exiles returned soon after Mattathias and his sons wet up their standard at Modin in 167 B.C.E. During the struggle against the Syrians, the two fractions submerged their differences and became militant co-patriots. Precisely what Chasidic developments occurred from 160-145 B.C.E., remain obscure. However, we believe that the two divisions not only remained distinct but that the gulf between them probably deepened.

The thirty years following 175 B.C.E. were prolific in literary production. The oldest extant writing is the Damascus Document, composed before 170 B.C.E.. This was followed by the first portion of Enoch, to which is assigned the date 170-168 B.C.E. The third scripture consists of Chapters 7-12 of the canonical Daniel; this was not produced by the Essene movement proper, but by the more conservative Chasids, who never left Judea; the date is probably 164 B.C.E. The fourth scripture is the second portion of Enoch, composed about 162-161 B.C.E. The fifth work, The War of the Sons of Light, written about 163, is quite different. Following this, there seems to be a literary interruption, for no extant documents reflects a date following 160 and preceding 142 B.C.E.

ESSENISM AS A PUBLIC CULT 145-105 B.C.E.

About 145 B.C.E., as we learn from Josephus, the three great Jewish sects or political parties emerged as well-known and definite entities (Antiq., XIII, v9). The old right-wing Zadokites became the Sadducees; the more conservative wing of the Chasids emerged as the Pharisees; and the radical Chasids, the People of the Covenant, became the Essenes. Allegro states that from "the Pious Ones," or Hasidim…we can almost certainly trace the origins of the Essenes, and the Pharisees (Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 97). The Sadducees were rich, educated, successful, powerful Jews; and they absorbed the Epicurean philosophy. The Pharisees became the popular leaders of the people; in due course, they elaborated the Mosaic Law into an extraordinarily elaborate code; and they were probably influenced by the Stoic school of thought. The Essenes became more and more dedicated to the holy life of religious separation, which drew them finally into the Pythagorean way of life. The Essenes of 140 B.C.E. were quite different from the esoterics of 75 B.C.E., and even more from the rigid celibatecommunists described by Philo, Pliny, and Josephus. One can, upon personal investigation, observe the gradual trajectory of their development way from traditional Judaism and toward a synthesis of Pythagorean-Buddhist-Iranian apocalyptic beliefs.

During and following the years beginning at 145 B.C.E., the People of the Covenant continued for some time as a public organization which required no novitiate or secret indoctrination and which lived a fairly conventional existence. They developed a corpus of literature which gradually supplemented or supplanted the canonical; they had undoubtedly already revised the calendar. The revised calendar was probably one of the first Essene deviations from orthodox Judaism because the Damascus Document refers to The Book of the Divisions of the Times According To Their Jubilees and Their Weeks, which probably contained a system connected with their novel calendar (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 30). This calendar placed their feasts and holy days on date diverging from those celebrated by the orthodox; and, although we cannot be sure just when they ceased to offer burnt sacrifices, this deviation may have begun about 125-120 B.C.E., and it is certain that such ritual were proscribed when they became Pythagoreans (Ibid.). This conclusion is supported by the fact that Jubilees (140 B.C.E.) reflects the common practice of burnt sacrifices in many passages; but the Testaments (130-125 B.C.E.) has only a single reference to such a ritual (Levi 9). There is no reference at all to such sacrifices in the subsequent documents; and they are condemned in The Manual of Discipline (104 B.C.E.).

Although there was no new apocalypse, several scriptures of high order were produced during this period, probably including many of the Thanksgiving Psalms. To the great doctrinal composition known as the Book of Jubilees as well as the third portion of Enoch, we assign the approximate date of 140. The fourth major production is the substratum which constitutes the bulk of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, probably written about 130-125 B.C.E.

THE CELIBATE-COMMUNIST CULT EMERGES 105-60 B.C.E.

The continual evolution of the religious theology of the Essene cult, which began in 195 B.C.E., take a turn again before or about the year 105 B.C.E. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that it was never necessary for the cult to discard or even to revise its own previous literature; and still more by the fact that modern scholarship has often failed to distinguish between pre- and post-Pythagorean documents among the Essene collection. We cannot know all the factors which brought about the transformation of a separatist movement within Judaism that ultimately culminated in a Pythagorean-Buddhist cult that elevated their own writings above the Tanakh, but we know that late in his career, John Hycranus ("the Wicked Priest") went over from the Pharisees to the Sadducees and began to persecute the Pharisees (Antiq., XIII, x, 5-6). Along with this he persecuted the dissident Essenes who were "super scrupulous Pharisees" in many regards and they suffered in double measure. We know that the Essenes gave allegiance to John Hycranus while he was opposed by Antiochus VII and when he assumed the triple crown (Prophet, Priest, King); but they must have turned against him during the cruel aggressions he perpetrated upon his neighbors after 125 B.C.E. And they would certainly never have condoned the savage sadism of Aristobulus I during his one year reign of terror.

Around 104 B.C.E. the Essenes established their headquarters at the Dead Sea; and we consider it certain that about this time they gravitated even more toward Pythagorean religious beliefs in rejection of the Temple cult and all that Judaism personified. Basically you, at this time, could consider them a Pythagorean mystery cult.

Some of the most influential and important scriptures date from this period! The Manual of Discipline summaries the laws and organization of this Pythagorean Essenic cult. It contains a large amount of information that was apparently unknown to Philo Judeaus and even to Josephus. In this period also belongs possibly some of the most important literature of the Essene collection; ENOCH FOUR and FIVE, which reflect a totally altered social philosophy. The Habakkuk Commentary is very important, because of the story which details the Wicked Priest in Jerusalem (John Hycranus who usurped the position deserved by the Zadok priesthood) who, because of "the wrong done the teacher of righteousness and the men of the party, God delivered into the hands of his enemies." The final Essene composition, and perhaps the most important of all, consists of additions to the Testaments which re-create in vivid term the ministry, sacrificial death, resurrection, and ascent to heaven of the last Teacher of Righteousness.

THE LAST OF THE ESSENES 60 B.C.E. TO 70 A.D.

What is said next is very important that you understand. When the Essenes became known to Philo and Josephus, they had long been in their state of rigid maturity. Never has there existed a more secretive or thoroughly disciplined organization. They expected their Messiah (Angel-Messiah) within two or three decades following 60 B.C.E.; and if so, they must have found means of rationalizing the delay in his coming after 30 B.C.E. Also, what had probably been intended as an interim or preparatory morality and organization became for them not only a permanent but also a highly desirable way of life. By selling all that they had and giving it to themselves collectively, by turning over to the Order all that they earned during many years of industry, and by living always in the strictest frugality, the members had made their community wealthy. The hope of a supernatural kingdom was, therefore, no longer the sole attraction: for the Society could practically guarantee life-long security from the ills and buffetings of a cruel and uncertain life.

While the Pharisees, who were already the rabbis of the Diaspora, assumed spiritual leadership over the scattered nation, the Essenes, like their opposites, the Sadducees, vanished as an independent cult; and there is evidence that soon after Christianity burst upon the Judean scene, a majority of the Holy Ones came over, forming the first Jerusalem Church; and then, after the destruction of the Jewish capital in 70 C.E., reorganized themselves into the Christian sect known as the Ebionites. (Larson, The Essene Heritage, p. 20-32).

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESSENE LIBRARY

The collection of writing recovered in the Qumran environs has restored to us a voluminous corpus of Jewish documents dating from the third century B.C.E. to 68 C.E., demonstrating the rich literary activity of Second Temple-period Jewry. The collection comprises documents of a varied nature, most of them of a distinct religious bent outside what would be considered normative Judaism. The chief categories represented are:

- 1. Biblical
- 2. Apocryphal or pseudepigraphical
- 3. Sectarian writings.

The study of this original library has demonstrated that the boundaries between these categories is far from clear-cut. The biblical manuscripts include what are probably the earliest copies of these texts to have come down to us. Most of the books of the Bible are represented in the collection. Some books are extant in large number of copies; others are represented only fragmentarily on mere scraps of parchment. The biblical texts display considerable similarity to the standard Masoretic (received) text. This, however, is not always the rule, and many texts diverge from the Masoretic. This presents a serious problem for the Christian whether he knows of it or not. Analysis of these discrepancies yields more than simple alternate readings; we have divergent and conflicting theologies that confront us in such comparisons. We find readings that conflict theologically with the Received Masoretic Palestinian text and which substantiate the sect's unique theological persuasions as taken from the pagan religious mentioned above. In other words, we find variant readings where the Masoretic text has been changed to reflect the Essene's theology as it had evolved under Pythagorean, Buddhist, and Iranian influences. These changes began with the Essenes in Alexandria, Egypt, with the translation of the Jewish Scriptures into Greek; for it was then that such pagan religious concepts made their way into the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures. Copies of these altered Greek texts existed at Qumran alongside the Masoretic Jewish texts.

They disagreed theologically in no small way!

CONCLUSION

When reading the New Testament it must be kept in mind that what we are reading are the religious concepts of these Essenic believers which converted as a group to the Jesus Movement following the crucifixion of Jesus. With them came their unique religious beliefs that had separated themselves from the Jewish mainstream. Many of their religious beliefs, affective everything from Messiah to salvation, can be found to be a compromise with normative Jewish teaching as coming from Moses and the Prophets. If one looks deeply then he finds what the facts show: that the Essenic religious beliefs of 30-70 C.E. are almost completely different from what the group in its inception in 170 B.C.E. held and cherished. In place of the fulfillment of the Torah and the Tanakh we find a unique synthesis of religious beliefs gathered from many pagan nations to which mention was made above. This unique synthesis had produced a unparalleled theology regarding their Angel-Messiah and his role in the redemption of mankind. Instead of preserving for mankind the truths concerning the Davidic Messiah promised by YHVH, we find a Pythagorean, Buddhist, Iranian, Egyptian, Greek, and Mithraic godman and these concepts were applied to Jesus by this group and their influence and legacy can be seen in writings of the New Testament which portray Jesus in such a manner. Your further study into this area is encouraged that you see these things for yourself. THE FACTS AWAIT YOUR DISCOVERY!

THE ESSENES/NAZARENES AND PAUL: THE JERUSALEM CHURCH IN TURMOIL

Immediately after Jesus had been crucified his followers had fled. Many had been killed in Jerusalem and more had been crucified by Pilate - they did not want to stay around to find out whether there would be more arrests. Peter, the gospels admit, cut off a man's ear, the merest indication Jesus' gang used force resisting arrest. He was too scared to admit that he was a disciple and denied it three times.

Yet in Acts, Peter and the Apostles are active again in Jerusalem shortly afterwards. Matthew however says they fled to Galilee, out of direct Roman rule, a safer and more sensible option. John makes it clear they were in hiding, meeting only in secrecy, because doors were shut when they assembled. The apocryphal Gospel of Peter says explicitly that the Apostles were sought by the authorities as malefactors who wanted to set fire to the Temple.

Answer for yourself: How then were they able to continue to proclaim their Messiah, only half-heartedly hindered by the civic authorities, as Acts maintains, so soon after an uprising?

The answer lies in events in the Roman administration. Pilate was withdrawn to Rome in 36 AD and the executive of the Empire changed with the death of Tiberius in 37 AD. After an interregnum the new administrators would have taken office with new concerns. The remnants of Jesus' band then felt able to return from Galilee and tentatively to resume activity. The activity now was not revolution but persuading people that the Messiah was Jesus and that he was soon to return on a cloud with a heavenly host as in Daniel. The disciples still expected a miracle and Israel to be liberated as Luke-Acts proves. And Peter continued to preach that God had promised to King David to put one of his descendants on the throne of Israel.

Considering the apparent failure of their Messiah they were surprised to find themselves enjoying much success in winning Jewish proselytes. The number of disciples in Jerusalem greatly increased and even priests [Essenes] adopted the new faith (Acts 6:1; 6:7). Few, perhaps none, of these new proselytes would have been gentiles though many may have been Hellenized Jews. The orthodox Jews feared that the whole population would be converted. A century later Tacitus writes that the death of Jesus was a blow "which, for a time, checked the growth of a dangerous superstition; but it broke out again, and spread with increasing vigor, not only in Judaea. . .but even in the city of Rome". The Recognitions of Clementine, a third century work possibly based on Nazarene tradition, confirms this success.

Answer for yourself: What was the reason for this astonishing success?

It still seems surprising that a failed Messiah should posthumously become so successful. Jesus had spread the word that the day of judgement was at hand, indeed twice in Matthew (Mt 16:28 and Mt 24:34) Jesus promised to his disciples the kingdom within a generation. Ordinary Jews were superstitious and demoralized. With each hope dashed they sought another to cling to. Perhaps the message of Jesus' life remained valid though the messenger was dead - the kingdom was at hand, still! Most Jews believed in life after death, only the Sadducees did not, and talk of the recently deceased Nasi returning on a cloud with a heavenly host to realize God's will in fulfillment of the prophecy of Daniel renewed their faith in the Messiah just when it had apparently been frustrated.

Thus the disciples' initial disappointment at Jesus' failure turned into a new hope and the Apostles benefited from a sort of apocalyptic hysteria. They convinced themselves that the late earthly Jesus was not a warrior Messiah but represented Israel as the suffering servant of Isaiah. This tortured and despised man was sentenced to a dishonorable death, remained silent in his defence and was unhesitatingly dispatched but was rewarded with victory after death. Accounts of Jesus' trials were written with this model in mind.

So Peter, John, the son of Zebedee, and James, the brother of Jesus, founded the Jerusalem Church.

The epistles of Paul confirm that James was a pillar of the church along with Peter and John. Peter and John were already Apostles but James was not (unless it could be shown he was James the son of Alphaeus).

Answer for yourself: Why should he have been a founder of the Church?

He was not one of the Twelve but he was Jesus's successor as head of the Church. The reason must have been that he was his brother and next in line. Perhaps this is the royal line of David, especially since on James' death the son of another brother of Jesus, Jude, became leader. It was the norm for dynasties to head sects in Judaea at that time. The leaders of the Maccabaean revolt constituted a dynasty. The High Priesthood was a dynasty. The Zealots were led by the dynasty of Judas of Galilee. The clear succession of leadership which obviously existed is possibly evidence that the sect was not newly founded after Jesus' death.

Now Jesus' family are depicted in the gospels as doubting him so it is again mysterious that a brother should assume leadership on Jesus's death. Acts fails to mention that James is Jesus' brother, though Paul in a letter written much earlier openly admits it. Nor does Acts say anything about the martyrdom of James. Indeed Acts wrongly says Peter succeeded Jesus as the leader of the Jerusalem Church when all other evidence shows it was James. The lie was inserted later by the Church of Rome, traditionally founded by Peter, to give it greater authority.

The New Testament treatment of the family of Jesus is a further attempt by Christian editors to dissociate their god from his origins. After the quarrel reported in the gospels when Jesus leaves his family in disgust they are scarcely heard of again until the crucifixion. Jesus apparently rejected his family in the gospels because they had no faith in him. For a church desperately trying to be gentile, that served to prove that even Jesus' family connections with Jewishness had been severed.

The Church led by James, the brother of Jesus, was a Jewish sect, orthodox in all respects except for their belief that the Messiah had appeared in the person of Jesus who had died a felon's death, hanging from a tree, but had been resurrected and would soon (within their own lifetime) return with the hosts of Heaven to free the Jews from persecution. They knew Jesus as a devout Jew, who had not repudiated the Torah, indeed who was zealous for the Law. His Sabbath cures were not against the Law.

They believed they were living in the End Time, the days just before the inauguration of the kingdom of God on earth when the pure would be selected to rule the world as the passages from the Psalms of Solomon, given in a prior article, makes clear.

Emphatically they did not regard Jesus as divine. Not only would that have been blasphemous but James and his brothers and sisters would have regarded it as absurd. They had lived with Jesus all their lives and would have been aware more than anyone of his humanity. Since a Jewish Messiah could not be divine, they regarded him as human even though God had revived him from the dead! In Acts 2:22 Peter does not describe Jesus as a god but as "a man accredited to you by God" - a special man, yes, but a man nonetheless. The evidence even of the gospels is that Jesus could not have contemplated the blasphemy of a man claiming to be a god. This is the position taken by Bet Emet Ministries as well based upon all the evidence accumulated over 16 years of intense study.

A feel of the original Palestinian fount of Christianity, the Nazarene Church, is given by the Epistle of James the Just (or Righteous) which was regarded by Christians as far removed as Eusebius and Luther as unsuitable for inclusion in the canon. Its language is much like that ascribed to Jesus in the synoptic gospels and its sentiments very much like those of the Qumran Community, for example in emphasizing the spiritual benefits of poverty. It is a document of the style of a Qumran exhortation with no mention of a dead and resurrected redeemer and indeed scarcely a mention of Jesus at all. This also supports the idea that the Nazarenes were a sect which existed before the crucifixion of Jesus, and, indeed, that it was not originally a religion "of Jesus" but one of righteousness and correct living which Jesus had served as an unusual leader.

SCHISM IN THE JERUSALEM CHURCH

Curiously after Jesus' death, in many ways little was different for the Jews in the Jerusalem Church. They were Nazarenes, a variety of Essenes - not the monastic Essenes of Qumran but the village Essenes. As Nazarenes they had been Apocalyptic Jews - they still were, but now expected the Messiah who would return on a cloud to be their late leader Jesus. Before they had been the Elect preparing themselves through purity for the End Time - now the End Time had begun and the need for purity was absolutely pressing. Before they had had a set of complex Rules designed to ensure righteousness - the same rules applied. Before they had been certain they were the Chosen Ones of the New Covenant - now they were ecstatic with the certainty and wanted every Jew to join before Jesus returned to start the kingdom of God.

Nazarenes practised circumcision and accepted food prohibitions. They were accepted by other Jews as a Jewish sect and taught in the synagogues just as Jesus had. They were not persecuted by orthodox Jews, quite the opposite, the Nazarenes were considered as defenders of Jewish religious and patriotic ideas. None of this would have been possible if they thought that Jesus was a god. And even in Acts (5:34-40) the Sanhedrin continues to accept the activities of the Apostles.

Unlike the Essenes of the Qumran monastery they worshipped at the Temple as village Essenes did. Their attitude to the Sadducees had not changed but Jesus had symbolically purified the Temple anyway and would soon return to finish the job. Astonishingly James is reported to have been permitted to enter the Sanctuary. This can hardly have been true. The confusion possibly arises because James was a High Priest in waiting, trained at the Essene alternative Temple at Qumran and ready to serve when Jesus established God's kingdom on earth. Eusebius, the Father of Church History, confirms that the Jerusalem Church continued to sacrifice in the Temple and to keep the Law even after the gentile churches had split away.

Like the monastic Essenes and unlike the village Essenes, the Nazarenes held goods in common as Acts makes clear. They were expecting the present world to end - and soon! So there was little point in keeping individual wealth. Converts had to turn over their belongings to the community when they joined. Josephus tells us Essenes who held anything back were severely punished. According to the New Testament, Nazarenes were also severely punished - God murdered them! Acts tells us God murders two such people, a man and his wife, Ananias and Sapphira, after Peter had demanded to know why they were holding goods back. It sounds harsh for a god of love. If Ananias and his wife were killed by God, for the trivial sin of withholding some of their possessions, one wonders why God is so lenient when much worse crimes are committed. No good god could have such warped standards. The New Testament avenger was Peter - not God.

After these deaths "a great fear came upon the whole Church".

Answer for yourself: But why?

Answer for yourself: Had they all been holding something back and thought God might finish them too?

No, the incident can better be understood if it happened in the period when the Nazarenes were still underground and Peter's wrath was because the two had received money from elsewhere. They were informers! The members of the Church would then be naturally fearful for their lives, not knowing whether they had been betrayed or whether others were also ready to inform. Naturally the true story could not be told in the gospels without revealing that the band were outlaws so it was appropriately disguised.

Peter and John, the son of Zebedee, are twice arrested. Twice they are released. On the first occasion for fear of the people and on the second occasion because Gamaliel, the leading Pharisee and rabbi of the cautious and liberal school of Hillel, argued that the Sanhedrin should exercise restraint in case these men truly had the support of God - if they had not it would be evident soon enough. In his speech to the Sanhedrin Gamaliel compares the actions of Jesus' supporters with the uprisings led by Judas of Galilee and Theudas, the leader of another gang of 400 rebels. In this context the New Testament itself clearly identifies the disciples of Jesus with revolutionary gangs.

Two hundred years before, the Greek king, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, believing himself to be Zeus, had his statue erected in the Temple of Jerusalem. The Jews were appalled and outraged, calling the incident the Abomination of Desolation. It began the long period of Jewish resistance to foreign oppression. Another Abomination of Desolation occurred when Caligula insisted on erecting his statue in the Temple in about 40 AD. Tacitus says disturbances erupted in Judaea and food producers went on strike. Josephus, who would have been expected to give a full account of these events as important factors in the build up to the Jewish War, surprisingly mentions only protests when riots would have been expected.

Answer for yourself: Was this the work of Christian censors? Had noting actually occurred?

To the Nazarenes, for whom Jesus had started the purification of the Temple and who expected him to return on a cloud, this second abomination would have been seen as a signal that the return was imminent.

Answer for yourself: Were the Nazarenes the fomenters of the new tumults?

Perhaps the tumults were of ecstasy or were strikes of workers seeing no point in laboring when the world was about to end. Though not violently revolutionary such actions would be disturbing enough to the authorities. But no mention is made of any of this in Acts, though the mini-apocalypse in Mark 13 possibly records it indirectly as Jesus' prophecy of hardship and tribulations to come.

By the time of the trial of Stephen, the Nazarenes had already split into two factions. Mainstream Nazarenes were Jews admitted to the Temple and subject to the Laws of Moses contrary to the impression given in the New Testament. Stephen was one of the Hellenized members of the community of Nazarenes, Jews who spoke Greek rather than Aramaic and used the version of the Old Testament called the Septuagint. Many were Jews of the dispersion, like Paul, and had a more liberal outlook than the Jews of Palestine, having integrated much more into the Greek culture that from the time of Alexander had dominated the region.

Closer contacts with gentiles made some of them more willing to consider changes to the Mosaic taboos. Gentiles had long been accepted into association with Judaism as "godfearers" who accepted the Jewish God, and indeed many Jews were not averse to having them as associates since they added to the Temple contributions. But actually to become a Jew, to convert, they had to undergo circumcision and accept the food taboos. Gentile women were willing to be converted but the idea of circumcision scared off many men. Stephen's blasphemy was to decry the Laws of Moses as outdated, outraging orthodox Jews. Stephen claimed Jesus had abolished the tedious Mosaic Laws so godfearers could become converts. Jews who remained orthodox objected to the message he was preaching and Stephen was called to account before the Sanhedrin.

Stephen put his liberal views at his trial. In his oration he refers to Jesus as The Righteous or Just One who they betrayed and murdered. In the Dead Sea Scrolls the expressions The Righteous One (Zaddik) and The Teacher of Righteousness occur frequently. Josephus speaks of a man called Sadduc who instigates revolt with Judas of Galilee at the time of the census of Quirinius in 6 AD. Sadduc (Zadok or Zaddik) might also be rendered The Righteous One.

The speech incenses the Sanhedrin and they order his stoning, and apparently the suppression of the church - Acts reporting: "they were scattered... except the Apostles".

Answer for yourself: The new religion is hounded by the stubborn and malicious Jews - but why not its leaders? Why not the Apostles?

Surely the leaders would be the first to be persecuted. The explanation is that the Apostles and their followers were not advocating a split with the Laws of Moses - they had done nothing wrong and could not be punished for anything. Only the Hellenist faction was persecuted. One of its oppressors was a young man called Saul. Saul later has a vision of the Christ, is converted to Christianity and adopts the name Paul.

In an interlude between Roman governors, the puppet king, Agrippa, murders James, the son of Zebedee, one of Jesus' chosen Apostles and far more important than Stephen, yet nothing is said in Acts except that it "pleased the Jews". Peter is again imprisoned but again escapes by a miracle, though it seems more likely that Agrippa had to release him because the people were so outraged by the murder of James that he was obliged to release Peter. It is at this point that Peter disappears and the narrative passes on to Paul. The Acts of the Apostles completely ignores the remainder of Peter's career, the fate of the Jerusalem Church and the rest of the original Apostles! They pass into total oblivion.

Answer for yourself: Why do we know so little about them?

It is natural, of course, to write history from your own viewpoint and the truth is that the stories the other Apostles had to tell have not survived. Some died, some did not have their personal experiences transcribed, perhaps some who did failed to have them accepted into the canon. And, if my reconstruction is true, it is likely that most of Jesus' chief lieutenants died with him. Many evidently died in action. We know of the two crucified at the same time but we don't know who they were except that they were in the same condemnation. The Romans would have rounded up and crucified as many of the conspirators as they could. The surviving Nazarenes, we have noted, had a lot of widows to provide for. The truth is probably that neither Peter nor the other Apostles who founded the Jerusalem Church were Jesus' chief confidants. They might have owed their survival to the fact that they were not at the top of the hierarchy. We only have their accounts of what happened and, since they were not of the inner circle, they were not in the best position to know.

This would, of course, explain why, in the gospels, they were so often in the dark about what was going on; why they often appeared so stupid - they were not privy to plans at the highest level. Thus they seemed not to know about the foal on the entry to Jerusalem. Jesus had had it already arranged - but by whom? It seems odd that these people did not know if they were really his chief confidants. They also did not know about the secret room in Jerusalem where the last supper was held or the man with the pitcher who led them there. The senior but not top ranking lieutenants of Jesus who survived told the tale as if they were more senior than they were - human nature! In any event the momentum of the plot moves out of the hands of any of the original survivors because the story in Acts is now switching from Peter to the self-appointed Apostle, Paul.

PAUL OF TARSUS AND HIS RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS

Jesus had no thoughts about founding a church. Paul, who never knew Jesus in person, actually founded Christianity. He considered his visions of the resurrected Christ to be superior to direct experience of the living Jesus.

The main sources of information about Paul are his epistles and the New Testament book, attributed to Luke, the Acts of the Apostles. The epistles naturally are partially autobiographical and liable to show him in the best light, and the author of the Acts of the Apostles, which was written later than the epistles, was partisan: he was a fervent supporter of Paul. In reading these sources we therefore have to guard against the bias for Paul there naturally is within them. The Acts of the Apostles has many faults. It is a sad mixture of several sources, compiled selectively and heavily edited. The sequence of events in it is confused. It is not historical. It was written in Greek for a Greek audience offering the Pauline, and not a Nazarene view of the origin of Christianity. The only independent source we have about Paul is an extract from the writings of the Ebionites which gives quite a different picture. No unexpurgated memoirs have survived of the men who actually knew Jesus. The Christianity which came down to us is Paul's version - the version of a man who knew nothing about the life or work of Jesus, had never met him and was not interested in him except as a divine sacrifice.

Acts indicates that Paul was a Jew of the dispersion born in Tarsus in Cilicia, Asia Minor (modern Turkey). He was originally called Saul, or more probably Solon because Tarsus was a Greek city, and was brought up in Jerusalem. Paul does not tell us his birthplace in his epistles but he does claim he was an Israelite of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew and a Pharisee.

Acts says he left Tarsus to go to Israel to study with the leading Pharisee, Gamaliel. Paul however does not make this claim himself and it is likely to be false because the starting place for a student of Gamaliel was a profound knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures and, though Paul is well versed in the Scriptures, most scholars cannot see sufficient depth in Paul's writings for him to have been taught in the best school. Acts claims that Paul was born a Roman citizen - his father must have been a Roman. Yet Acts also clearly implies that Paul was a member of the Sanhedrin (Acts 26:10 "my vote was cast against them" suggesting that he had a vote in the Sanhedrin). Both statements about Paul in The Acts of the Apostles could not be true. Acts and Paul's own letters show that he was willing to distort the truth ("be all things to all men"). A blunt person would say he was a liar - he would say whatever was expedient.

Paul seems desperate to be seen as an orthodox Jew of a respected party, for despite the impression given in the New Testament, the Pharisees were seen throughout the Roman and the Parthian Empires as a serious and respectable religious group. Yet material relating to Paul seems uniformly anti-Pharisee. Thus he says he was flogged five times by "the Jews", New Testament code for the Pharisees.

Answer for yourself: Why then did he claim to be a Pharisee?

Biblical scholar, Hans Maccoby, argues that by so doing he strengthened his argument that Pauline Christianity was the successor to the Jewish religion. Paul, the devout Jew, who persecuted the original followers of Jesus, the Nazarenes, by the grace of God was converted and then saw in the new religion the successor to Judaism. There must be something in a religion that means more to a devoutly orthodox Jew than his own!

Saul's family had had to flee from Gischala in Galilee, a breeding ground for revolutionaries, during some messianic disturbances - quite probably those involving Jesus. Thereafter he disliked messianic movements, whence his persecution of the Nazarenes. Saul was the "young man" in The Acts of the Apostles who looked after the coats of the persecutors of the Nazarenes who were stoning the martyr, Stephen.

Saul went to the High Priest for letters to the synagogues in Damascus giving permission to extradite Nazarenes and bring them back to Jerusalem. In a vision on the way to Damascus Saul is confronted by Jesus who asks "why are you persecuting me"? and Paul becomes convinced that it is the heretics who preach Jesus's message, not the appointed Apostles. He becomes a convert to the Hellenist sect taking the name Paul and appoints himself as Apostle to the gentiles.

Answer for yourself: Such is the story, but could "a Pharisee of the Pharisees" work for the collaborating High Priest?

It seems unlikely, even if the traditional enemies, the Pharisees and the Sadducees, were united in wanting to punish the Hellenistic branch of the Nazarenes opposing the Laws of Moses. Maccoby poses the following questions:

- Is it not odd that Saul should go to Damascus when he evidently had plenty of work harrying the Nazarenes in Judaea?
- Is it not also odd that an apparently private citizen should apply for permission to pursue the Nazarenes abroad ? surely it was a job for the authorities if it had to be done at all?
- What authority would the High Priest of Judaea have over people living in Damascus, a Syrian city?
- What authority would the High Priest have over synagogues, teaching establishments run by rabbis and supported by local Jewish communities, wherever they were?

If Nazarenes had to be pursued, it is difficult to see why the High Priest would not have sent one of his own Temple Guard. Indeed all of this persecution by Paul would be better explained if he were a member of the Temple Guard, implying that Paul was a paid agent of the High Priest and therefore directly or indirectly an agent of the Romans. If Paul worked for the High Priest, it suggests that his claim to be a Pharisee is a lie.

These conclusions depend upon our understanding Damascus to be the famous Arab city in Syria. The reference in Acts to the street called Straight seems to confirm that it is. But if there were another Damascus in Judaea it could have fallen under the jurisdiction of the High Priest who could therefore have legally sent his policeman. If "Damascus" were a code word for the Essene community at Qumran then Paul would not have been going outside of Judaea to get to "Damascus". Acceptance of this idea would directly link Paul, the early Christians and the Qumran Community. Now in Galatians, Paul says after his conversion: "I went away into Arabia; and again I returned unto Damascus. Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem". This confounded scholars until the Essene headquarters was recognized as Damascus but now it is clear. After becoming a follower of Jesus, Paul went to Qumran to be initiated as an Essene, a procedure which takes three years. This is further demonstrated in his writings which use more Essene words than any other books of the New Testament. The references to the street named Straight and to Arabia evidently are editors' additions inserted through ignorance or deceit. And in Acts Paul's sojourn in Damascus is turned in typical fashion into a dispute with Jews not the period of initiation it really was - the disputes came later.

Back in Jerusalem, according to Acts, Paul became allied with the Hellenists led originally by Stephen and Philip. He appeared to switch from being ultra-orthodox to being ultra-radical. Paul's idea now was to let all those who believed in Jesus to become full members of the Church and blow the Mosaic Law. The author of Acts makes it appear that Paul upheld Jesus' idea that there was now a superior Law while the Jerusalem Church of Jesus' original followers were too stupid to understand this and upheld the old Law. In fact, of course, Jesus was as orthodox as his brethren and he is depicted thus in the gospels. But Paul wanted to substitute the new Law of the redemption of mankind from original sin through the sacrifice of the quasi-divine being. To this the Law of Moses was a hindrance.

James the Just and the Palestinian followers of Jesus would hear nothing of it!

Since the Nazarenes were still a part of Judaism, the original Apostles did not trust Paul and eventually he incensed orthodox Jews of the Diaspora so much that the they threatened to kill him and he had to be sent to Tarsus. Thankful to be rid of him the leaders of the Jerusalem Church allowed him to go on his self appointed mission to convert gentiles. The Nazarenes were still expecting Jesus to return on a cloud and if Paul could be gotten rid of converting gentiles in foreign parts then fine. But he returned in 49 AD again to seek to persuade the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem to abrogate the Mosaic Law for gentiles.

According to Acts Paul succeeded but Paul's own letters make no reference to this victory even though it would plainly have been a triumph for him. In fact the opposite is true - James reasserted the status quo: "godfearers" could only be associates of the Church; circumcision was necessary for conversion. The Nazarene authorities, who had known Jesus during his lifetime, were adamant that the Elect would consist of Jews or full converts to Judaism. Paul proves it himself, for off he went writing letters illustrating his contempt for the associates of Jesus. (Gal 2:6, Gal 2:16, Phil 3:9). He writes of "false Apostles" and "reputed" pillars sent to counter his teaching, confirming that the Apostles opposed him. He berates the Galatians for accepting this "different gospel"; he refers to "another Christ whom I have not preached" showing clearly that there were two quite different and antagonistic interpretations of Jesus' purpose. Paul acknowledged to the gentile proselytes that the Jesus of the Jerusalem Church was "another Jesus" (2 Cor 11: 3-4). Later, representatives from Jerusalem visit him in Antioch apparently to accuse Paul of backsliding in his adherence to the Law. Paul and Barnabas are ordered back to Jerusalem. The first schism in the Church had been recognized.

WHO ARE WE TO BELIEVE: JAMES OR PAUL?

If the New Testament is to be believed in respect of Peter, he is unsure which of the two factions, Paul's or James', to follow. Paul writes that he opposed Peter's orthodox view at Antioch but persuades Peter of the correctness of the liberal interpretation and Peter then eats with gentiles. Faced with members of the Jerusalem Church, Peter reverts to the orthodox view. The Recognitions of Clementine speaks of a tradition that Peter tells followers at Tripolis to believe only those who bring the testimonial of Jesus's brother, James, from Jerusalem. He warns of: "false prophets, and false Apostles and false teachers, who indeed speak in the name of Christ but do the work of the devil". He was speaking of Paul! Peter was therefore opposed to Paul and Paul's influence on him sounds like more Pauline fantasy aimed at boosting his prestige.

So in 58 AD Paul was summoned to Jerusalem by James and the Elders for propagating views contrary to the Church. Paul's friends asked him not to go but he determined to do so. James and the other "Zealots of the Law" accused Paul of abrogating the Law of Moses. No reply was recorded but Paul agreed to undergo a solemn purification proving that the Nazarene Church again imposed its will upon Paul and that it had not abrogated the Law. James might have arranged this knowing that Paul had been teaching false doctrine and that he could not refuse a request to undergo purification without damning himself.

Paul was known by some orthodox Jews of the diaspora and hated by them as an apostate. This is illustrated in Acts when a furious mob gave chase to Paul. They felt Paul had violated the Temple by undergoing ritual purification, as James had ordered, though he was a hypocrite who deliberately and habitually preached violation of the Law. Only the Roman soldiers saved him and escorted him to safety in the Antonia fortress. The Romans intended to give Paul a whipping, presumably for causing a public disturbance, but Paul pulled another rabbit out of the hat. He revealed that he was a Roman by birth and could not be punished without trial. Some forty Jews then plotted to kill him but the Roman commander found out, supposedly from Paul's young nephew, and Paul was taken to Caesarea protected by a substantial body of troops! From Caesarea he is, after some time, taken to Rome for trial (on what charges nobody knows) and there he disappears from history after apparently living under house arrest for two years. The narrative ends suddenly.

THERE IS MUCH THAT IS ODD WHEN IT COMES TO PAUL:

- Paul turns out unexpectedly to be a Roman,
- has apparent wealth,
- began on good terms with the Temple officials,
- finished on good terms with the Roman officials.
- In his Epistle to the Romans (16:11) he has a companion called "Herodian" and in Acts (13:1) a member of the Antioch Church is the foster brother of Herod the Tetrarch. The Herods were the family of the puppet kings of Palestine and the Herodians were the party of supporters of the Herods. Paul seemed well in with the Romans and the Jewish collaborators.
- Was Paul a Roman spy or agent provocateur? Was his mission to infiltrate the messianic movement in Judaea to undermine and betray it? We do not know what
- became of Paul - as we noted, Acts ends suddenly - although tradition has it that he was martyred. What though of another tradition that he went to Spain? Was he pensioned off by the Emperor in a Spanish villa?

WHAT DO THE EBIONITES HAVE TO SAY ABOUT PAUL?

There is one independent source about Paul. The Ebionites or poor men, were suppressed by the Church as heretical but fragments of their beliefs remain in Heresies by Epiphanius. They say that Paul was not a Pharisee, his parents were gentile converts to Judaism, he went to Jerusalem as an adult, became a henchman of the High Priest and eventually sought fame by creating a new religion. Ebionites did not accept Paul's view that Jesus was a divine sacrifice but saw him as a human sent to begin the new era, as prophesied. They accepted the Torah, obeyed the Law of Moses and regarded themselves still as Jews. They were the remnants of the Jerusalem Church! J.L.Teicher of Cambridge University, who identified the Qumran Community with the Ebionites, goes further - he believes the Teacher of Righteousness was Jesus and the Liar of the Qumran Scrolls was Paul.

Paul's letters were written before about 60 AD, only 30 years after the crucifixion of Jesus yet already they speak of serious disagreements between himself and the Apostles in Jerusalem.

As the true successors to the Nazarenes it was the Ebionites not Paul who transmitted the pure teaching of Jesus, for their founders, Peter and James, had known Jesus in life.

Also by 30 years after the crucifixion, the Pauline gentile churches of Italy, Greece and Asia Minor and the Gnostic churches of Libya and Egypt had split from the Nazarene church in Jerusalem. The latter led by James the Just remained under the authority of the Sanhedrin and followed Judaic conventions.

THE FATE OF THE NAZARENES AND THE RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS OF PAUL

Paul's enemy, James, was the "brother" of Jesus. This seems to have been literally true but, even if brother was a form of address among the Nazarenes, it is plain that James knew Jesus intimately and would have known in detail the nature of his message. The Church maintains that James, a non-Apostle, suddenly appeared as head of the Church because he was miraculously converted by the resurrected Jesus. One would have thought that he would therefore, like Paul, have been in great demand as a preacher of the power of the new faith. But, apart from the one epistle which many Christians hate, sounding as it does very much like Jesus and very little like Paul, his testimony did not suit the Pauline church so he was virtually erased from history.

In the Recognitions of Clementine an attack on James in the Temple by an "enemy" and a mob is recorded. James is beaten with a club and thrown down a flight of stairs in the riot. James is rescued by friends and flees to Jericho to recover. Eisenman, quoted by Baigent and Leigh, claims that this event is the same as the attack on Stephen in Acts. Luke or later editors changed the name because the account could not record that Paul had assaulted the leader of the church, Jesus's brother. Jericho is quite close to Qumran, the headquarters of the Essenes. Later in the story in the Recognitions it transpires that the "enemy" has a commission from the High Priest to travel to Damascus with letters to arrest the followers of Jesus!

Answer for yourself: Who does this sound like?

Clement of Alexandria (150-215 AD) called James Zaddik, the Righteous or the Just. According to Hegesippus, James drank no wine, ate no animal food, did not have his hair cut, took no baths and did not use oil. He wore priestly robes and was the only one allowed into the Holy of Holies. He must have been the High Priest. Epiphanius confirms that James wore the mitre of the High Priest. It seems odd that early church historians should not find it peculiar that a leader of the church was also a High Priest of the Jewish Temple. He must have been an opposition High Priest. That he "took no baths" is plainly an error: a scribe will have lost "never" in an expression like "never failed to bathe". James is obviously an Essene.

Now, if the reference to the stoning to death of James in Josephus is accurate, his death occurred between the terms of two procurators, around 62 AD, only a few years before the Jewish War began. The church historian, Eusebius tells us that following the death of James, Vespasian began to siege Jerusalem, a reference to Vespasian leading the Roman army of 66 AD. Using a technique of many early historians, he links by association the siege of Jerusalem with the death of James. Moreover in a passage in Josephus now lost there is also a reference to the war being a direct consequence of the death of James the Just:

"who was the brother of Jesus known as Christ, for though he was the most righteous man the Jews put him to death".

James seems to have been a more important person in first century Jerusalem than Christianity acknowledges.

Eusebius, says that the Nazarenes, like the Pharisee followers of Hillel, refused to join the rebels in the uprisings of 66 AD and 132 AD. In fact Pharisees like Josephus did fight in the Jewish War and it seems unlikely that Nazarenes would have remained aloof. They would have seen the War as a further act in the return of their Messiah to conquer the sons of Seth. In 132 AD it was a different matter. Bar Kosiba claimed a Messiahship which Nazarenes would have considered as false.

The contradiction might be explained if Eusebius spoke only of the Hellenized faction of the Nazarenes. In Ecclesiastical History Eusebius relates that the Nazarenes fled across the Jordan to Pella, a gentile city, at the start of the revolt in 66 AD. Yet if those escaping were gentile Christians opposed to the Jewish nationalist cause they cannot have survived long because Pella was sacked by the Jews early in the campaign. If, on the other hand, the orthodox Nazarenes, who had been involved in the rebellion, had fled to Pella when the cause seemed lost, they would have fled into the path of the advancing Roman armies.

Nazarenes escaping the victorious Romans would sensibly have fled south to Egypt alongside other Jewish militants and found refuge in the sprawling suburbs of Alexandria, a largely Jewish city. If they had remained pacifist during the war or participated but failed to escape to Egypt they would have taken to the hills and desert. Perhaps these are the ones Eusebius meant. They became the Ebionites or the Poor Men, and survived until the fifth century, revering Jesus as a man not as a God and rejecting the heresy of Paul. Their leader was chosen from among the heirs of Jesus, as the Jerusalem Church had done. The Ebionites accepted Jesus as their Messiah and expected him to return. They would not therefore have been willing to accept anyone else as the Messiah. The Ebionites refused to support Bar Kosiba and were persecuted for their stand.

Acts does not mention who founded eminent churches at Alexandria and Rome, though there are Christians at Rome when Paul arrives there and the Church of Alexandria was a major rival of Paul's churches. Nazarenes in Alexandria had established a church, with different views from Paul's. But as time passed with no heavenly hosts appearing, Jewish Christians came to accept Jesus as a failed Messiah and reverted to Phaniseeism or Rabbinic Judaism as it now was, while gentile believers accepted the Pauline heresy. Little has changed today because the Gentile still do. I was one of them until I began a serious study of my faith. Then I saw the problems as I have laid them out to you. Matthew illustrates this transition. It preserves much of the Palestine tradition, being the most overtly Semitic of the gospels but, like the others has as its hero a divine Son of God rather than a mortal Son of David.

Paul's teachings were heretical in that they opposed the leader of the Church at Jerusalem, James the Just. Paul only knew Jesus through his visions but arrogantly he claimed to know him better than Apostles that knew him in the flesh. He formulated his own eclectic theology and reflected it from the figure of Jesus crucified that he preached. The drift of the New Testament is strongly in favor of Jesus being the pre-existent Son of God, divine in his own right. This was Paul's intention though even Paul hesitated in claiming outright divinity for Jesus. To achieve his ambition Paul wanted the requirements of the Mosaic Law to be eased for his gentile converts. James refused. Non-Jews could already enter into the Jewish religion as "godfearers" but to become Jews they had to obey the Law. Paul had a vision of a universal religion but the Mosaic Law was an obstacle which had to be removed. He failed and was obliged to undergo an orthodox purification ritual proving to his own followers that he was subservient to the Jerusalem Church leaders.

Paul was not a Pharisee. Indeed he was only a first generation Jew, the son of godfearer parents who had become Jewish proselytes. But he realized the advantages of being thought a Pharisee and he adjusted his biography accordingly. He didn't miss a trick, pursuing whatever he thought might be useful to him, and always having something up his sleeve. He was all things to all men. He was a combination of charlatan and genuine evangelist. The era was noted for them - men like Simon Magus and Apollonius of Tyana. He taught that the Torah had been superseded by the death on the cross of Jesus, the Son of God, in atonement of men's sins. Faith in this was the only way to be saved. Paul reached these ideas from a synthesis of Essenism (with its dependence on the Jewish Scriptures) and mystery religions, convinced himself that they were true and propagated them with gusto.

Asia Minor, Paul's birthplace, was the source of several of the mystery religions that had entered the Empire and Paul could hardly have avoided their influence. Having heard from the Nazarenes about the death and resurrection of Jesus and been impressed by their conviction, Paul equated Jesus with the dying and resurrected Gods of the East. The theme of these religions were immensely popular and Paul realized that the idea of Jesus had the added advantage of having occurred in real life in apparent fulfillment of the age old prophesies of the Jewish Scriptures. Paul could usurp the history of the Jews to use its long tradition as prophetic of his concept of Christianity with its dying and resurrected god of the mystery religions and its Heaven descended redeemer of the Gnostics.

The apparently simple message of Jesus began being distorted by his image as the Paschal lamb, tortured to appease God. Pagan converts brought in their expectations of sacramental suffering, death and resurrection introducing aspects of the mysteries of Adonis, Hyacinth, Attis, Osiris, Orpheus, Mithras, etc., the gods who died for the sins of mankind. Since the women in the Christian story were unimportant or were introduced later, they began to attribute to the mother of Christ the characteristics of many of the great pagan goddesses, Isis, Cybele, Demeter, Diana. For their sacraments they took the Essene baptism by water and the Persian - Mithraic and Essene - communion by bread and cup.

No Nazarene would have believed Paul's synthesis. Jesus' message, acceptable to a Jew but seditious to a gentile, was twisted into Paul's message, blasphemous to a Jew but acceptable to a gentile. Through Paul, the strict apocalyptic Jew, Jesus, was rejected by his own people and became Jesus Christ, a heathen god.

PAUL'S EMPHASIS UPON THE CRUCIFIXION AND THE TROUBLESOME TRADITIONS

After only a short time on the cross Jesus was given a drink and quickly expired. The others crucified with him had to have their legs broken to bring on a quick death. Joseph of Arimathaea asked Pilate's permission to take him from the cross. Pilate was astonished that he had so soon died and asked the centurion to confirm it, which he did, and permission was given. Joseph and Nicodemus, both behaving as if they had an interest in the body, wrapped it in linen and put it in a new tomb cut out of rock in a private garden. The tomb was sealed by a large rock pushed against the entrance.

After the Passover the two Mary's and others, or Mary Magdalene alone, came to the tomb early on the Sunday morning to wash and prepare the body. The stone had been rolled away and the tomb was empty. A young man (or two men) in pure white garments tells them that Jesus is risen and has gone to Galilee. At this point the earliest gospel ends (ignoring the final twelve verses which were added later). The significance of the pure white garments is not that these men are angels of God but that they are angels (messengers) of the Essenes. Jesus had an important position in the Essene order. His body was removed so that he could be given a proper burial in a place approved by the community. The messengers from the sect give orders to the disciples - they are to escape to Galilee, out of Roman jurisdiction. Matthew says soldiers had been placed on guard to prevent the disciples from stealing the body but no other gospel mentions this and it is transparently an editorial addition to overcome the criticism that the body had been stolen by Jesus' followers.

Immediately after the crucifixion the disciples had despaired and were incredulous to hear that the tomb was empty. This proves that Jesus cannot have taught his disciples to expect his bodily resurrection on the third day as the gospels maintain since otherwise they would have been expecting Jesus to rise, would not have despaired at his death and would have rejoiced to hear of the empty tomb. The five occasions Jesus spoke of his death and resurrection in the gospel stories look suspiciously like interpolations based on hindsight.

The Church's attempt at accounting for the inconsistency of the Apostles' behavior was to accuse them of stupidity. Of course they were not stupid. If they were, Jesus must have been stupid to have chosen them. If they really did not understand when Jesus told them what to expect then his words must have been far more obscure than they are in the New Testament. The plausible explanation is that they were completely surprised by the news of the empty tomb. Jesus had made no prophecies about his personal resurrection. Their behavior was therefore perfectly understandable. Their leader was dead, their rebellion had failed, God had not intervened - they despaired. Then someone had the temerity to steal the corpse! Tertullian, a Christian of about 160 AD, states that the body of Jesus was removed from the tomb by the man in charge of the garden wherein the sepulchre was situated so that his lettuces would not be spoiled by the crowds!

According to the verses added to Mark, it is Mary Magdalene who first sees the risen Jesus. As if to provide an explanation the author immediately tells us that Jesus had cast seven devils from her. It seems her madness was subject to relapses and further devils had then to be cast out. In short she was unreliable if not badly neurotic. Despite Jesus' apparent prophecies, the disciples did not believe her.

Christian belief depends mainly on Jesus' appearances rather than the empty tomb. Writing long before the gospels were written, in the earliest Christian works we have, the Apostle Paul never attempts to convince sceptics about the resurrection by quoting witnesses to the empty tomb. His evidence is Jesus' appearances: to the women, to two disciples on the way to Emmaus, to Peter and others in Jerusalem, to the Apostles on a Galilaean mountain. Paul was not interested in the living Jesus but only in the resurrection and, as the first Christian writer, having heard of a hysterical woman's reaction to Jesus' crucifixion and abduction, he could have invented additional appearances to confirm it. He adds a remarkable appearance to a throng of 500 which even the gospel writers must have found stretched credulity too far.

If, as some suggest, Jesus did survive the crucifixion he could hardly have been making appearances all over the place within days. He had been horribly wounded in arms, feet and side. He must have been kept in a safe house for months to recover, moved only if necessary and when sufficiently fit would have been taken out of the Roman Emperor's reach to Parthia.

Yet the disciples in the gospels are certain that Jesus was alive and not just a vision. The author of Luke is at pains to demonstrate that Jesus was truly alive. In Acts he tarries for as long as forty days. But he was not recognized by Mary Magdalene nor by two disciples on the road to Emmaus. In his final appearance in John by the Sea of Galilee, the disciples again do not recognize him. If all this were true and not elaborations of a Pauline invention then it implies that Jesus was heavily disguised - or being impersonated! These people knew him extremely well, so why otherwise couldn't they recognize him? If in disguise, he must have been hiding from the authorities! At his final appearance he behaves like a man about to depart quickly - to Parthia rather than Heaven - repeatedly urging his disciples to "take care of my sheep" - plainly meaning the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

The Quran says that Jesus survived because a substitute was crucified in his stead. According to the Basilidians, the substitute was Simon of Cyrene. Mark's and Matthew's gospels, from the point when Simon is mysteriously introduced into the account (Mt 27:32-44; Mk 15:21-32), are completely ambiguous about who was crucified. They could read that Simon was. Only at the point of death when they report that "Jesus" cries out is the doubt settled.

Answer for yourself: So what is the truth? No one really knows and this must remain a matter of faith, because let us again take note, that resurrection from the dead is a cardinal doctrine of Judaism believed by both the Essenes and the Pharisees.

If these traditions hint at the truth, a lot could be explained. Simon had been substituted for Jesus and had been crucified. But the Nazarenes did not want to risk the Romans finding out by leaving the wrong man hanging there. Most Romans would not have known Jesus but collaborators would and the longer that Simon remained on the cross the more likely it was that the substitution would be noticed. So Simon was poisoned and whisked away by Joseph and Nicodemus after only a few hours on the cross when days would have been the norm. Of course, the problem was not solved because the Romans might want to inspect the corpse - so they disposed of it secretly! Jesus Jesus was still alive but could only appear in disguise until such time as he could get away to the East. And so he does - there is a further tradition that Jesus eventually died in India.

Only Luke mentions the ascension into Heaven - in Acts. The words in Mark are simply that he was received up into Heaven and even these are in the last twelve verses now considered to be added. We are faced with an astonishing event, reputedly seen by many but recorded only by one. It simply is not credible that people seeing such an astonishing occurrence would not report it later. Many think it is fiction. In spite of all the conflicting traditions I want to believe, but now you have the whole of the truth concerning the crucifixion of Jesus and the many conflicting legends that surround it.

CRUCIFIXION-A PAGAN RITE

The odd thing about the crucifixion is that it re-enacts ancient pagan rites of human sacrifice.
Eusebius tells us, quoting Philo of Byblus, the Jewish King traditionally gave his beloved son as a sacrificial offering for the nation as a ransom to avenging devils. Thus Abraham wanted to sacrifice his son Isaac; David attempted to stop a famine by sacrificing seven royal princes, hanging them before the Lord, at the beginning of the barley harvest, about the time of the Passover; Mesha of Moab sacrificed his eldest son; King Hiel sacrificed his sons when Jericho was founded; Kings Ahaz and Manassah burnt their children in sacrifice; Ishmael was nearly sacrificed by his father, like Isaac, according to Arab legend.

The king personified the tribal god and as such was the father of the people; the son therefore represented the people themselves. Thus the actual son of the king was sacrificed as the symbolic Son of the Father (bar Abbas) representing the unworthy tribe. With time this rite became more symbolic, a condemned criminal being substituted for the prince, as in the Babylonian Sacaea when the substitute was dressed in fine robes to represent the prince, a crown was put on his head, he was scourged and finally hanged or crucified - just as Jesus was!

Though human sacrifice was made illegal in the Roman republic in 196 BC, it seems to have continued till later, particularly associated with the military. In, many places in Roman Britain for example human skulls or skeletons are found with the bones of sacrificed animals at the sites of temples or shrines. They might have been people who died naturally though it seems unlikely that a ready made corpse would be thought to propitiate the god rather than a sacrificial victim. More probably they were criminals who had been sentenced to capital punishment and so were used to double up as a human sacrifice. The mockery of Jesus by the Roman soldiers who dressed him in robes and crowned him with thorns prior to his crucifixion was plainly some such ritual - Jesus might well have been a human sacrifice in fact.

The sacrifice of a lamb or a kid at the Passover similarly was a symbolic human sacrifice. The substitution of a ram for Isaac in the story of Abraham probably represents the change over from human to animal sacrifice and provides the authority for it. The Laws of Moses make the change explicit. But when Jesus ben Pandira in the reign of Alexander Jannaeus was stoned and hanged from a tree on the eve of the Passover, was this an indication that tyrants in cruel mockery or even the people themselves sometimes revived the old custom?

Answer for yourself: Was the custom of the exchange of the criminal referred to in the gospel accounts a reference to the sacrifice of a condemned criminal at Passover alongside the lesser sacrifice of a lamb?

Answer for yourself: In troubled times was a symbolic bar Abbas chosen from among the condemned, dressed as a king and sacrificed?

Caiaphas said it was expedient for a man to be sacrificed for the good of the nation.

Answer for yourself: Was it Pilate's joke that the king of the Jews should be sacrificed according to the defunct custom in mock piety?

In 40 AD the mob at Alexandria, a town with a large expatriate Jewish population dressed up an old man with a crown, a sceptre and a purple robe and hailed him as Karabbas and Maris according to Philo Judaeus. Karabbas is plainly a misspelling of Jesus and Mans signified a king.

Answer for yourself: Was this another example of the old custom revived or was it a demonstration by orthodox Jews against the growing cult of the false god, Jesus Jesus, The Christ?

The victims of the sacrifices were normally hanged on a tree until dusk as the Old Testament repeatedly indicates and in the Greek language hanging from a tree and crucifixion are synonymous. The two others hanged with Jesus would, on this hypothesis, represent the king's attendants, one being on his right hand and one on his left. Even if the crucifixion were not intended as a human sacrifice, anyone who knew of the old custom must have seen it as just that.

Jesus' attendants on the cross had their legs broken to shorten their lives but Jesus was already dead. The object of crucifixion was to provide a slow death. The victims were usually tied to the cross or branches, sometimes with nailing also. Their feet rested on a support on the upright or trunk enabling them to press upward from time to time to relieve the strain on the chest and lungs. Once the legs were broken, the strain would soon lead to death, there being no relief. Since Jesus was already dead without any broken bones and, according to John, on the eve of the Passover, he became the perfect sacrifice - the Paschal lamb had to be perfect; it could have none of its bones broken!

The piercing of Jesus's side by the lance of the soldier testing whether he was still alive also ties in with ancient sacrificial custom. Strabo records that the early Albanians offered a human sacrifice to the moon goddess by piercing his side with a sacred spear. Similarly the sacrifices at Salamis, Odin where the victim was hung on a tree before being pierced, and in the worship of Mithra where the bull as Mithra incarnate was pierced in the side by a spear.

Thus, following ancient and largely superseded traditions, early Christians thought of Jesus' crucifixion as sacrificial (1 Cor 15:3: "Christ died for our sins"). Paul's teaching of Christ crucified was central to the success of the evangelist. The followers of Jesus were able to convince themselves that their hero had died as a human sacrifice. He had become the Paschal Lamb: it was God's will. Thus the dead Christ became more important than the live one almost as soon as the death occurred and certainly by the time Paul had taken it to the gentiles. This explains why in all of the Pauline corpus of literature there is only two references to anything that Jesus taught; Paul being concerned not for what Jesus both believed and taught but for what he interpreted Jesus' death to mean.

THE PROBLEM WITH PAUL'S ANALYSIS OF JESUS' DEATH

If by chance you are not aware, or have not encountered such materials and information on this website to the effect, you need to know that all the eastern religions of the Roman Empire had an incarnate god who died as a divine sacrifice and returned to life. It was a sine qua non of a decent religion! But here was something really novel - this one actually happened! And similarly most gods of the time ascended into Heaven. Adonis, Dionysus, Hercules, Hyacinth, Krishna and Mithras were among those who so ascended usually in full view for the benefit of their followers. And so did the epitome of Old Testament prophets, Elijah. The Christian God could do no less!

The cross was significant in itself. For Christians it is a mighty talisman giving cosmic insurance against evil or danger, or, as a gesture, expressing gratitude to higher powers for deliverance. The Apostle Paul said he would glory in naught "save in the cross of our Lord" (Gal 6:14). Yet the cross was an object of worship in its own right long before the Christian era. A Christians hymn to the praise to the cross goes:

Hail, 0 Cross, triumphal tree, true salvation of the world; among trees there is none like thee, in leaf, flower and bud.

A tree had been sacred to various gods. An image of the god Attis was hung upon the sacred pine tree at the commemoration of his death. The faithful also worshipped the tree itself. The tree sacred to Osiris was similarly treated, being the first of the pattern; the god's body being placed literally on the wood and upon its branches. Cyrus, called by Isaiah the Messiah, was crucified in some versions of his myth; Prometheus who suffered eternal torment for mankind was crucified according to Lucan. Crucifixion was understood as the pious beaning of suffering. The Druids worshipped a cross made from a large tree denuded of leaves and stems save for its two main horizontal branches. Buddhists also symbolize life with a cross sprouting leaves and branches.

The mark made on the foreheads of the righteous in Ezekiel (9:4-6) is in Old Hebrew TAU - "t" to us - the mark of the cross. It signified that they should be saved at the coming visitation. Thus it was the sign of life and so was associated with salvation, and paganism (it stood for the god Tammuz), centuries before Christianity. The mark of TAU was made on the foreheads of those initiated into the Mithraic mysteries just as Christian initiates were marked at their baptism. Ancient religions identified god with the sun and so the TAU symbol is often associated with the solar disk.

One such is the Egyptian Ankh or Crux Ansata carried by Osiris. Another is the cross inscribed within a disk common as a halo in Christian art. The vestal virgins, devoted to the goddess Vesta of Roman religion, who took an absolute vow of chastity punishable, if broken, by burial alive, always wore a cross as a pendant round their necks just as nuns do today!

Paul was being typically opportunist when he spoke of the "cross of Christ", the "preaching of the cross" and the "blood of the cross" because he knew pagans would understand him fully. The worship of the crucifix carried on where pagan cross worship left off and that in turn was a continuation of tree worship.

But the Jews would have nothing of this!

THE ESSENES: LOOKING AT THE THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE FROM THEIR WRITINGS...THE DAMASCUS DOCUMENT

The Essene scriptures were, as Philo remarked, "delivered in enigmatical modes of expression, and allegorically," which would, nevertheless, be plain enough to the esoterics for whom they were intended. Since some of the personalities and incidents discussed are now obscure, definitive interpretations are sometimes impossible. Yet, every now and then, there is an unmistakable reference, which places a whole sequence in its historical setting.

Since the Jewish canon, as organized by Ezra about 450 B.C.E., knew nothing of the novel doctrines later absorbed by the Chasid-Zadokite priests, it became mandatory for them to devise an entirely new corpus of sacred literature, nearly all of which exhibits certain common characteristics, among which we may note the Zoroastrian eschatology, the attribution of all earthly sin to the Watchers, the unquestioned authority of Enoch and his priority over Moses, the inscription of the Law upon "the heavenly tablets," and the insistence upon the 364-day year, which was in conflict not only with the 365 ¼ day Greek year but also with that of official Jewry as well.

In the following information, I use Millar Burrows' translation of The Damascus Document, The Habakkuk Commentary, The Manual of Discipline, The War of the Sons of Light, and the Thanksgiving Psalms.

THE DAMASCUS DOCUMENT...THE FIRST ESSENE DOCUMENT

The Damascus Document, also known as A Zadokite Fragment, was found in Egypt in the Genizah (storehouse for discarded documents) of a Karaite monastery late in the nineteenth century and published in 1910. It represents a stage in the development of the Essene cult long preceding its reorganization into a communist society; and we can only conclude that it was produced by a segment of the developing Chasidim who had broken away from the main body of the older Zadokites because the religious fervor of these was insufficient and because they rejected the new eschatology and prophecy of the group.

Its first section provides a clue to its date of composition. Pursuant to the three hundred and ninety days (years) of tribulation prophesied in Ezekiel 4:5, the author infers that this punishment was to begin with the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 586. This brings us to 196 when God "caused to sprout from Israel and Aaron a root of planting to inherit the land." This was the movement organized by the Sons of Zadok who "were like men blind and groping for the way for twenty years." This carries us to 176. At this point, God "raised up for them a teacher of righteousness to lead them in the way of his heart." Note that this was not the but a teacher of righteousness; the reference must have been to the Damascus leader, elsewhere called the Unique Teacher and the Star of Jacob.

The Damascus Document belongs to an early phase of the Essene movement; it breathes fiercely of Judaism; its Zoroastrian eschatology is rudimentary; the concepts of Pythagoras are unknown; there is no communism;

Hebrew slaves are permitted; members are encouraged to marry; and blood sacrifices are required.

Pay attention to what was just said because in the later descriptions of the Essene cult by Philo, Pliny, and Josephus, all of the above characteristics of the Essenes will be non-existent; in fact just the opposite will be the fruit of the evolution of this "sect" leading up to its destruction in the Jewish War of 66-70 C.E.

This reveals its repudiation of BIBLICAL JUDAISM and its adoption of non-Biblical ideas as taken from the Gentile relgions of Pythagoras, Zoroaster, etc.

The Zadokites of Damascus were exiles who had established their residence in Syria: "The well is the law, and those who dig it are the captivity of Israel, who went out from the land of Judah and sojourned in the land of Damascus" (Damascus Document, section 8). We learn that these exiles had a great leader called "the Star," who was also "the interpreter of the law who came to Damascus, as it is written, 'A Star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel.' The sceptre is the prince of the whole congregation" (Ibid., ix). But we learn also that this "interpreter of the law" was in no sense regarded as the Messiah, nor was he expected to return. Rather he is called the Unique Teacher, between whose death, or "gathering," and the coming of the Messiah, a period of "about forty years" is to intervene. This is a projected fulfillment of Ezekiel 4:6. We hear much concerning the Man of the Lie, who may have been one of the Hellenizing high priests; and we learn that there were deserters from the Damascus Covenanters, and that these were to be cursed, expelled from the congregation, and have no "share in the house of the law" (Ibid).

Assuming that the Damascus Document was composed about 170-165 B.C.E., and that the Unique Teacher was "gathered in" about 170, the Messiah and the annihilation of the wicked were due about 130 B.C.E. according to their prophecies. These forty years are called the "whole period of wickedness."

That the Damascus enthusiasts were a tightly organized group we learn in detail (Sects., x-xx). They lived in camps, or at least had their headquarters there. Groups could be set up in any community with not less than ten members, of whom at least one must be a priest or a Levite. They practiced purification by water and took their sacramental meals in common; and offenses were punished by separation from the sacred food or by excommunication and expulsion exactly as with the later Essenes. To bear a grudge against a brother was a very serious matter; and, precisely as among the Essenes and in the New Testament, an erring brother must first be rebuked in private, then before witnesses, and finally before the whole congregation. Those of the Covenant could not transact "business with the sons of the pit.... And no man shall make an agreement for buying and selling unless he has told the superintendent who is in the camp."

Admission at this time required no novitiate; but it was a very serious matter: oaths and examinations were prerequisite and non-members were denied knowledge concerning the ordinances of the group (Ibid., xvi, xix). Membership was divided into four classes, who were seated in order at "the session of all the camps.... The priests first, the Levites second, the sons of Israel third, and the proselytes fourth" (Ibid., xvii). It was provided that every member must donate for charity "at least . . . the wages of two days every month . . . and they shall put it into the hand of the superintendent" (Ibid., xviii). Between all this and the equality, celibacy, and communism of full-blown Essenism, there remained a wide gulf; yet the road from the one to the other was direct and unbroken.

The Covenanters must "separate from the sons of the pit; and keep away from the unclean wealth of wickedness" (Ibid., viii). They must not "rob the poor"; they must separate the clean from the unclean and "keep the Sabbath day according to its explanation, and the festivals and the day of the fast according to the decision of those who entered into the covenant in the land of Damascus" (Ibid.). This would indicate that a new calendar was devised at this time. Each covenanted is "to love his brother as himself"; and each is "to rebuke his brother according to the commandment, and not bear a grudge from day to day" (Ibid.). These principles were carried over into mature Essenism and the New Testament. This again shows the influence of the Essenes on New Testament theology.

THE WAR OF THE SONS OF LIGHT WITH THE SONS OF DARKNESS

THE SONS OF DARKNESS ARE IDENTIFIED

This book reflects a high degree of Zoroastrian influence. We are shown a world in which the Sons of Light, who are loyal children of Israel, are locked in a vast battle against the Sons of Darkness, or the army of Belial, which, we are told specifically, consists of "the troop of Edom and Moab and the sons of Amman . . . the people of Philistia . . . the troops of the Kittim of Assyria (Syria), and with them as helpers the violaters of the covenant" (The War, I, 1), that is, the apostate or Hellenizing Jews.

DATE

We believe that The War was composed soon after The Damascus Document, perhaps about 165-166 B.C.E., or soon after Antiochus retreated from his African campaign. For we are told that there would be war between the Kittim of Egypt and the king of the north (Syria); "and his wrath shall destroy and cut off the horn of his strength" (Ibid.).

THE SONS OF LIGHT

When The War was written, the Damascus exiles must have returned to rejoin the main body of the Jews in their current wars; they now gave the Maccabees the support they had withdrawn from the Zadokites. After listing the Sons of Darkness, the author declares that the sons of Levi, Judah, and Benjamin and "the exiles of the desert, shall fight against them and their force with all their troops, when the exiles of the sons of light return from the desert . . . And the dominion of the Kittim [the Syrians] shall come to an end . . . and there shall be no survivor of the sons of darkness" (Ibid).

We remember that according to The Damascus Document forty years remained before the Messiah was due; in The War we read that "thirty-three years . . . are left the men of renown" (Ibid). This can only signify that The War was written seven years after the Document. The Messiah was still due about the year 130 B. C.

Take just a minute and reflect that "The Messiah" did not come in 130 B.C.E. and this "false prophecy" should make any "thinking believer" set up and take note that the Essenes had not only this but other inaccuracies in their literature and to base "Christian theology" off their writings is absurd not to mention unsound; yet mainline Christianity relies heavily on Essene Theology for many of their basic Christian dogmas. Such "false teachers" should be exposed and their writings understood for what they really are. Let us not confuse "history" as written by the Essenes and "failed prophecy."

THE HOLY WAR

The author is depicting a holy war as conducted by the Maccabees; but it is neither apocalyptic nor Messianic; it is to be fought by the Jewish saints according to ordinary tactics. The writer has exact knowledge concerning the organization and strategy of current warfare: the array of battle, the number of men and chariots involved, the qualifications of horses and soldiers, the precise role of the priests.

With overweening confidence, the author outlines a series of victorious wars which the saints will wage during a ten-year period against Egypt, Mesopotamia, Lud, Syria, Uz, Hul, "Tozar and Mashsha, who are across the Euphrates"; against Arpachshad, Assyria, Persia, "and the people of the east as far as the great desert;" and finally against Elam, Ishmael, Keturah, and the sons of Ham (Ibid). In short, the saints are to conquer all nations and establish a world-empire surpassing that of Alexander.

Answer for yourself: Did that happen, or were the Essenes, except for the few who joined the Yeshua Movement, totally annilated by Rome in the Jewish War of 66-70 CE? It sure looks like false prophecy again to me. If you have any question as to what is false prophecy and its Divine penalty, refer to the following passages from Proverts about God's commandments regarding false prophecy and then warn Hal Lindsey and the others who pilot "prophecy in the news" today where they hand out rehashed Essene mistaken theology to millions. Shalom.

17 He that speaketh truth sheweth forth righteousness: but a false witness deceit. (KJV)

Prov 14:5

5 A faithful witness will not lie: but a false witness will utter lies.(KJV)

Prov 21:28

28 A false witness shall perish: but the man that heareth speaketh constantly. (KJV)

The Essenes did not speak "constantly;" they were destroyed and perished like the Scriptures said. It was the Pharisees who survived. Something to think about in light of Paul's ideas that all Jews …Pharisees, are blinded. Maybe it is the other way around and we are afraid to consider such an opinion. More later.

Shalom.

THE BOOK OF THE JUBILEES

The purpose of The Book of the Jubilees, which was a drastic revision and elaboration of Genesis and which was written during the reign of Hyrcanus, was to establish the ultimate authority of Enoch (Jubilees IV); to introduce Zoroastrian eschatology (Ibid., XXX); and to supply divine sanction for the 364-day year (Ibid.), consisting of four 91-day seasons.

In addition, it confers patriarchal blessings upon Levi and Judah, and prefigures the descendants of these as the ultimate rulers of Israel and the source of the Messiah (Ibid., XXXI). This is another characteristic of Essene ideology during this stage of its development and is particularly emphasized in the ground-stratum of The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. Unlike the older Jewish prophets, these Essenes had no expectation of reconstituting the twelve tribes.

The author begins by condemning the Jewish leaders for persecuting the true prophets (themselves). In a strain almost identical to various statements of Jesus, we read that God will send them witnesses, whom they will slay; and that they will persecute those who seek the law. - . . And they will go astray as to new moons, and sabbaths, and festivals, and jubilees, and ordinances" (Ibid., I).

This reflects the suppression suffered by the Essenes and the continuing conflict over the calendar and diverging dates for holy days.

THE THANKSGIVING PSALMS

The Thanksgiving Psalms breathe the aspirations of early Essenism, but, since they are devoid of historical allusion, they cannot be placed in a particular decade. They reflect Zoroastrian metaphysics and eschatology: in this they differ from the Davidic psalms. Since they are not concerned with any specific temporal conflict, they are totally different from the Pharisaic Psalms of Solomon, which are filled with terrible imprecations against the Hasmoneans and the Sadducees and relate graphically the capture of Jerusalem and the desecration of the Temple by Pompey, who is even more fiercely condemned.

BACKGROUND TO THE BOOK OF ENOCH

The Book of Enoch was the "principal" Essene Document.

The Book of Enoch is unique, since its various portions represent every formative period of the cult; since it was its principal independent scripture; and since it contains most of its novel doctrines.

The Book of Enoch consists of a series of revelations produced one after another between 180 and about 95-70 B.C.E. In the older portions, we find a commingling of Zoroastrianism with Judaism, somewhat as in the last six chapters of Daniel. The later sections, however, reflect a fundamental development; and this was inevitable, since they were composed after the Essenes became Pythagoreans and express, therefore, a communist and celibate philosophy.

It is pertinent to note that in Enoch we find what will be become first precise formulation of Christian eschatology, according to which all souls are immortal individuals who, at death, pass either into eternal bliss or everlasting torture. This immortality of the soul and the concept of the Parousia, according to which the god-man prophet is both the sacrificial deity and the Messiah who rises from the grave later to return for the purpose of conducting the Last Judgment and establishing on earth the kingdom of the saints, were the specific, original contributions of the Essenes to world-religion.

An Ethiopic MS. of the book was first discovered by Bryce in Abyssinia in 1773. Since then, others have been found. Although The Book of Enoch is quoted directly in Jude 14-15 and was widely known and used in the early Church, it gradually fell into disuse and no copy of it was known in Europe for more than twelve hundred years.

DIVISION AND CHRONOLOGY AND SEQUENCE OF THE BOOK

As the nine parts into which the book is formally divided do not coincide with its real divisions, and as their sequence does not conform with the chronological order of composition, the following analysis might help us come to the truth we need.

FIRST PORTION: Before 170 B.C.E.

Chapters 1-36

What is important for us to note right in the beginning is that there is no Messiah or Son of Man, but a God, known as the Holy Great One, who conducts the last judgment, condems the Watchers to the abyss of fire, and establishes the Messianic Kingdom.

SECOND PORTION 161 B.C.E.

Chapters 88-90

[notice the way the book is put together today that this portion is the 4th part of Enoch as written in sequence]

In this apocalypse, Judas Maccabaeus inaugurates the Messianic Kingdom, which the Messiah later takes over, and from which he is to rule over all nations in Jerusalem. This portion of Enoch is a completely nationalistic Jewish conception, probably written by a Chasid, and it reflects the ideology of the Maccabean War. One should take note of the historical refrences and the time period to which this writing was addressing.

THIRD PORTION 140 B.C.E.

Chapters 77-87

[notice the way the book is put together today that this portion is the 3rd part of Enoch as written in sequence]

Here we find a treatise on Astronomy, explaining in detail the 364-day year and its division into four seasons, as also established in the Book of Jubiless (in the rejection of Judaism we find these conventeers create their own unique calendar).

FOURTH PORTION 105-99 B.C.E. [this portion written 5th in sequence]

Chapters 91-105

This is a highly developed apocalypse, composed after the Essenes became Pythagoreans, in which the desire for riches and power is condemned as the proof of unrighteousness, and in which sainthood appears as union with God and his Son, evidenced by love for mankind and the renunciation of all things worldly.

FIFTH PORTION 95-70 B.C. [this portion written second in sequence]

Chapters 37-59, 60-71

An elaborate Zoroastrian-Pythagorean synthesis. The Lord of Spirits commissions the Son of Man, who now appears under that title for the first time in Enoch, chosen before the world was created, to judge sinners and righteous. The Elect are those who have a congenital compulsion toward righteousness, which causes them to abhor the things of this world, and to love God and their fellowmen; thus, they achieve sainthood and will be called to everlasting glory.

Now that we have the overview of the Book, let us dig a little deeper as we examine each section of the book to trace the evolution of Essene religious through. Shalom.

THE BOOK OF ENOCH & THE EVOLUTION OF ESSENE THEOLOGY...170 B.C.E

THE ESSENE THEOLOGY: 170 B.C.E.

At this point, we meet the earliest extant writing of the Essene movement which may be described as a revelation; it consists of Chapters 1-37 of Enoch. This was certainly written later than The Damascus Document, but it must have preceded the Maccabean revolt; it was, therefore, composed between 172 and 168 B.C.E. In all likelihood it was the primary scripture produced by the Covenanters during their desert-exile. It teems with ideology conforming to the exhortatory portion of The Damascus Document; yet represents a definite advance in theology and philosophic concepts.

HOW LONG DID IT TAKE FOR THE BOOK OF ENOCH TO BE WRITTEN?

We should note first that Enoch consists of some 40,000 words and five distinct compositions, written over a period of approximately a hundred years. In 1913, the great English scholar, Canon R. H. Charles, published his definitive edition of the work, together with a remarkable analysis, in which he divided it correctly into its sections, which he dated with uncanny accuracy. His achievement would have been complete had he realized that this was one of the major scriptures of the Essene cult.

WAS THE BOOK OF ENOCH HIGHLY PRIZED BY THE EARLY CHRISTIANS?

The work was so highly regarded among various early Christian communions that they almost adopted it as their own. It is significant that Celsus, in his True Discourse, an attack upon Christianity written about 175 A.D., refers to Enoch as an authoritative Christian scripture (Origen, Contra Celsum, V, lix); and, what is even more significant, Origen declares that it circulated freely and widely among the Christian churches as a highly valued if not an entirely canonical revelation (Ibid.; De Principiis, I, iii, 3). However, as the Catholic sector of early Christianity became more and more dominant, Enoch fell under the proscription of the Church Fathers; and by the sixth or seventh century, it dropped from sight.

The earliest portion of Enoch opens with a blessing of the ancient revealer upon "the elect and righteous, who will be living in the day of tribulation, when all the wicked and the godless are to be removed" (Enoch I). The dreadful day is fast approaching when (as in the Christian Gospels).

"The Holy Great One . . . will tread upon the earth . . . And all shall be smitten with fear, And the Watchers shall quake...And there shall be judgment upon all men. But with the righteous he shall make peace, And will protect the elect....And they shall all belong to God.....And behold! He cometh with ten thousand of His holy ones, To execute judgment upon all And to destroy the ungodly: And to convict all flesh Of all the works of their ungodliness...." (Ibid.).

The final lines of this apostrophe reappear in Jude 1:14-15:

Jude 1:14-15

14 And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints,

15 To execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.

Also Jude 1:6 states:

6 And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day.

As taken from the New Testament, the book of Jude, verse 6, we find reproduced a favorite concept of Enoch by declaring that the fallen angels "which kept not their first estate . . . he bath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day."

Answer for yourself: What have we learned so far? First of all, the heavy influence of Essene theology on the early Messianic community let alone the New Testament. This should begin to open your eyes that the New Testament has many "Essenic beliefs" scattered among it which the uninformed reader assumes is God breathed; never knowing that these Essenes derived much of their theology from pagan sun-worship. That means Christianity is in a lot of ways only another manifestation of sun-worship; and they don't know it because they have never studied this out. They read and accept doctrines as "Divine revelation" when it can be shown to be nothing more than what God commanded His children not to do or not to believe in.

As we get back to Enoch, after admonishing the reader to observe the regularity of the seasons, the prophet proclaims that only the elect "shall inherit the earth":

"And their lives shall be increased in peace, And the years of their joy shall be multiplied, In eternal gladness and peace...." (Ibid., v).

As you know, if you are one of our regular readers of our articles, we have documented beyond any reasonable doubt how the Essenes of Jesus' day had evolved from what began as a righteous separatist movement from a corrupt Temple Priesthood in 170 B.C.E. to a mixture of Pythagorean-Buddhist-Zoroastrian cult. This escapes the casual reader or student who only looks to Pliny, Philo, or Josephus for their information on the Essenes. What is of importance for our studies is that in this "Essenic Evolution" we have the alteration of Messianic beliefs; what began as a Davidic anointed one to come, who would fulfill the prophecies of Moses and the Prophets, we end up with an Angel-Messiah which is the culmination of sun-worship as filtered down through almost all world religions and which found its ultimate expression through the Pythagorean religious synthesis. This was the beliefs held by the Essenes as they again filtered such pagan notions though the remnants of Judaism which had yet held onto in the wake of their rejection as "priests" since the Hasmonean Dynasty. This means that their "oral traditions" concerning their Messiah of Aaron and their Messiah of Israel had picked up along the say vestiges of sun-myths which were created by prior personifications of the sun. These "messianic beliefs" were to be mixed with expected Davidic messianic beliefs in the first century; especially after the crucifixion of Jesus who many believed was the Messiah. Because of the strong Essene influence in Alexandria, Egypt, as well as in Palestine in these tumultuous messianic hysteria of the first century, many how saw no way out of the calamity enforced upon them by Rome looked no longer to notions of a human-Davidic anointed who would lead them to freedom and salvation, but saw that their only help was if God was to deliver them Himself and it was in the Essenic concept of their incarnated Angel-Messiah this would come. Thus those who would emerge from this terrible time were to emerge with hopes of an Angel-Messianic incarnated godman. These hopes and fears were later to be recorded and such "beliefs" would end un in the New Testament much later along with Davidic beliefs. As Christians we end up with a collage when reading the New Testament; we read of concepts taken from the Jewish Scriptures regarding the "anointed" to come as well as concepts derived straight from "sun-worship" and never know it! Such concepts as derived from sun-worship renders the believer an "idolater" and he never knows it; all the while thinking that such "revelation in the New Testament" has come from God. Nothing could be further from the truth.

In this article I will share with you the most important document used by the Essenes, the Book of Enoch, and I will trace the evolution of the sect along with their religious beliefs, especially those affecting the alteration of the Messianic concept. Then, and only, then, as you read our web-site and begin your own investigation, will you be able to see these facts for yourself and understand how the New Testament misrepresents Jesus so terribly.

ANALYSIS OF THE BOOK OF ENOCH AND THE EVOLUTION OF THE ESSENES AND THEIR RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

As we progress in our study we will discover that the Essenes of the first century looked more like Pythagoreans, Buddhists, and Zoroastrians than Jews. This will be make quite evident as we look at the religious beliefs of the Essenes as we encounter their documents preserved for us today.

The doctrine of the elect and reprobate, unknown in orthodox Judaism, was one of the principal Zoroastrian elements in the Chasid-Essene system from the beginning. The Essenes, being a rejected Zadok priesthood by the Hasmoneans since the victory over Antiochus Epiphanies following the Maccabean war, this should be easy to understand how such "beliefs" would have begun. You might call this "sour-grapes" theology. According to the Essenes, the elect (the Essene brotherhood) are the saints chosen by God for eternal glory before the foundation of the world; their predestined perfection is manifested by their repudiation of sin in all its forms. During the present dispensation, while Beliar (evil) rules the earth, the wicked prosper and the good suffer every manner of injustice. But soon comes the Great Judgment, when the wicked (those in power and who held their position and all who follow in their ways) will be plunged into eternal torment and the saints will possess the earth in everlasting peace and plenty.

ZOROASTRIAN DEMONOLOGY AND ESCHATOLOGY BECOME THE FOUNDATION FOR ESSENIC BELIEFS IN THE DAYS OF JESUS

This earliest portion of Enoch purports to be a vision of Enoch describing a remote future, which was to be the last age and was actually in which the real author lived. It is the most primitive of all extant Jewish documents permeated by Zoroastrianism, and it is certainly older than the second half of Daniel. There is no Messiah or supernatural agency separate from God Himself, who is called the Holy Great One or the Great Glory. The author is filled with wrath against the wicked and unrighteous who seem to be simply the Jewish ruling class. The Watchers, that is, the evil angels who introduced luxuries and weapons of war among men, are sentenced to everlasting torture; and their leaders, Semjaza, is bound in chains and cast into eternal hell-fire. The righteous Elect are shortly to be established as the perpetual rulers in the Messianic Kingdom. God Himself will appear upon earth to conduct the last judgment and to institute His government amidst disturbances of nature.

In chapters 6 through 11, Enoch digresses into a detailed exposition concerning the Watchers. Genesis 6:1-4 states tersely that the sons of God took, from among the children of men, wives, who bore them offspring who became mighty men. On this slender foundation, the writer of Enoch builds a complex superstructure which accounts not only for the origin of evil but also for the arts and sciences. "Enoch," or whoever wrote this, engrafts upon the Mosaic story, an ancient Zoroastrian myth, according to which demons came upon the earth, allied themselves with women, and filled the human race with moral degeneracy. Understand the origin of this myth is not to be found in Judaism, but Judaism often "borrowed" legends and myths" from its neighbors or captors and used them for their own. This is a prime example.

We learn that two hundred of the heavenly angels under the leadership of Azazel and Semjaza defiled themselves with the daughters of men and taught mankind every form of evil, especially the techniques of war, so that they went astray and cried for help as they perished (Enoch, vi-viii). In response, the Most High sent the chief archangels (Ibid., x) to warn Noah of the approaching deluge (Ibid.).

The prophet now announces the damnation of the Watchers and all the sinners of the earth: the Lord commands Raphael [one of the seven archangels or Ameshaspentas appropriated from Persian angelology] to "Bind Azazel" (the Ahriman of Zoroastrian demonology) [Dinkard, IX, xxi, 10-11; Bundahis, XXX, 29-30) "hand and foot and cast him into the darkness. . . . And the Lord said to Michael: 'Go, bind Semjaza and his associates who have united themselves with women . . . bind them fast for seventy generations.... till the day of their judgment and of their consummation....'" (Enoch x). We may assume that the period of seventy generations was about to expire in 170 B. C. Raphael was to bind Azazel, that is Satan or the devil, "hand and foot, and cast him into the darkness...one the day of the great judgment, he shall be cast into the fire" (Enoch, x). This is precisely as happens in Zoroastrianism and in the Christian's book of Revelation. It is very important to note that the Satan or devil-complex is COMPLETELY ABSENT in the purely Jewish Scriptures, since they were based on Semitic ideology, which was entirely devoid of metaphysical dualism.

Answer for yourself: Do you see the similarity with the book of Revelation (again another books highly influenced by Zoroastrianism)?

Something else you need to notice as well look at the evolution of Essene religious beliefs in their almost total rejection of Judaism over 200 years. Early Essenism was untinged by Pythagorean philosophy at this early date by the fact that early Enoch teaches the philosophy of "begetting thousands of children." The Essenes will evolve into a celibate sect in the day of Jesus. Something changed! In Judaism, the first commandment in the Torah is to multiply and have families. Again, we see the rejection of Judaism and the Torah by these Essene Pythagoreans in the first century.

God, we are told, will "destroy all wrong from the face of the earth and.... righteousness and truth ... shall be planted in thousands of children . . . and their old age shall they complete in peace" (Enoch, x). Then would be established the universal kingdom of the saints, modeled upon that of the Great Soshans (Bundahis, XXX, 26, 33): "And all the children of men shall become righteous, and all nations shall.... worship Me" (Enoch, x).

And so the evil spirits, the Watchers, and all the Children of Darkness are at last lodged securely in underground prisons; and the elect are in possession of the earth and the fullness thereof in perpetuity. And note that at this time, the proto-Essenes expected to have sufficient vigor and longevity to become the parents of thousands of children. Blessed are the holy (who in due course became the meek and the poor), for they shall inherit the world and all that is therein.

Enoch is taken up to heaven in the manner of Zoroaster, who stood seven times before the throne of Ahura-Mazda (Ibid., xiv). The Holy Great One declares that the Watchers "were formerly spiritual, living the eternal life, and immortal . . ." But "now," because they united themselves with the daughters of men, "evil spirits.... have proceeded from their bodies ... and evil spirits shall they be called" (Ibid, xvi).

Enoch learns many secrets which reflect a mixture of Greek mythology and Zoroastrian doctrine. Uriel points out a fiery abyss where the Watchers will be confined (Ibid., xix); and another horrible place, where "a great fire ... burnt and blazed . . .(Ibid., xxi). Rafael then conducts Enoch to a vantage point where three hollows in the earth are visible, in which the spirits of all who die are kept until the time of judgment; these are simply an adaptation of the Zoroastrian hell, purgatory, and paradise, where all souls remain until the coming of the Soshans (Ibid). It is indeed interesting to note that during this phase of their development the Essenes believed in purgatory; that is, in three places where the spirits of the dead would remain until the consummation or resurrection. In those portions of Enoch written between 105 B.C.E. and 70 B.C.E. (chapters 91-105, 37-81) there is no purgatory: all souls there go either to paradise forever or to an eternal hell. This mature eschatology, adopted precisely by Synoptic Christianity, is another original Essene contribution to world-religion. We note from Second Maccabees, XII 43-45, completed about 30 B. C., that its author, a Pharisee, still believed in purgatory, a fact concerning the Pharisees confirmed by Josephus as late as 90 A.D. (Anti., 4. XVIII i 3).

In the New Testament, the Son of Man declares that he will send the wicked to the hell prepared for the devil and his angels. Again notice the strong influence in the New Testament as found in Matthew 25:41:

41 Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:

The Zoroastrian influence becomes more and more apparent: the saints of Enoch are to be immortalized by eating of the tree of life: "Its fruit shall be for food for the elect.... And they shall live long lives on earth, Such as their fathers lived' " (Enoch, xxi). The saints, then, could attain an age such as that which Methuselah and Adam had enjoyed when the world was young.

Enoch is conducted by the archangels Uriel and Raphael to the end of the universe, where he finds that souls are kept in three "hollow places," under the earth (Enoch, xviii). This is a re-creation of the Zoroastrian concept according to which the righteous, the wicked, and the neutral souls remain in separate and appropriate regions within the earth until the judgment day.

We also again find the Eucharist. There is a blending of the Persian and Babylonian-Myths in Enoch, xxv. At the Zoroastrian judgment, as in the Mithraic, immortality is to be conferred upon the purified souls by the administration of a last Eucharist; and we find that a similar result is to be achieved by Enoch by eating of the tree of life, the fruit of which was forbidden in the Garden of Eden. Thus the Zoroastrian Haoma is identified with the Genesis concept.

WHAT YOU JUST READ IS NOT JUDAISM…BUT ZOROASTRIANISM

All this is indeed a far cry from the Essenism of a century later: but it is also separated by an even wider gulf from conventional Judaism. The oldest part of the book of Enoch proclaims very nearly the whole array of Zoroastrian eschatology; it transforms the Jewish Yahweh into a likeness of Ahura Mazda; it proclaims the doctrine of the elect and the reprobate; it fills the world with demons who infest every facet of human existence; and it predicts the Messiah of moral judgment.

Now let us contrast this with the very earliest of all Essene documents; the Damascus Document. In The Damascus Document the professed ideal was the practice of a purified Judaism; it seems, therefore, that Essene thinking underwent a rapid and drastic evolution in which orthodox Judaism was fading far into the background, replaced by the flaming gospel of immediate and everlasting glory for the elect and eternal or at least temporary torture for all the remainder of mankind. Two or three generations later, there would be no purgatory, no second chance: redemption would be reserved for the saints alone, and no one else would escape everlasting damnation and torture.

We may say that, as a revealed and independent religion, Essenism came to birth in the desert near Damascus.

THE ESSENES AND THE BOOK OF ENOCH & THE EVOLUTION OF THEIR THEOLOGY...161 B.C.E

THE ESSENE THEOLOGY: 161 B.C.E.

The revelation concerning the Son of Man had as yet been made only to the Elect; the congregation of the righteous was gradually being created; on the Great Day, these would be glorified and their oppressors, "the kings and the mighty . . . who rule the earth" would be delivered up to vengeance, "because they have oppressed his children and his elect . . . and they shall be a spectacle for the righteous," who "shall rejoice . . . because" the sword of the "Lord of Spirits . . . is drunk with their blood.

The Sons of Light are the Elect Ones, predestined to glory.

The second apocalypse is also comparatively primitive, but reveals a distinct development. Like The War, it is very belligerent and intensely Judaic. God Himself is still called The Holy Great One, who again conducts the last judgment. The destruction of the earth is foretold, according to Zoroastrian prophecy, and there is to be a new and glorious Jerusalem.

The vision consists largely of allegory relating the events of Genesis and Jewish history down to Judas Maccabaeus, at which point the end of Time and the last judgment are to occur. Under a transparent veneer, the dramatic personae of Old Testament history parade before us as bulls, heifers, wolves, asses, eagles, kites, ravens, etc.

THE ESSENIC SOUR-GRAPES THEOLOGY

There is a long passage devoted to the seventy shepherds who slew and destroyed more sheep (Jews) than they were commanded by the Lord. These are the kings and high priests who misruled Israel between Solomon and the Maccabees. The Essenes could relate to such persecution from corrupt rulers as they lived out their existence in the desert in protest to their denial of the Priesthood.

After the Babylonian exile, "I saw until that 23 had undertaken the pasturing and completed in their several periods 58 times." Now, if a time is a seven-year period, we subtract 416 from 586 (year of Babylonian captivity); and this brings us of course to the year 170 B.C.E. At this time, a new era of righteousness began, because "behold, lambs [Chasids] were borne by these white sheep [Jews], and they began to open their eyes and to see, and to cry to these sheep. Yea, they cried to them, but they did not harken to what they said" (Enoch, xxv, xc).

This reminds us of a passage in the Damascus Document in which we read "they were like blind men and groping for the way for twenty years." But God "raised up for them a teacher of righteousness to lead them in they way of their heart." The wicked Jews, however, "banded together against the life of the righteous, and all who walked uprightly their soul abhorred."

If you have never read the Damascus Document you should. In it we find the earliest of the Dead Sea Scroll writings. Absent in it is any reference to damnation and catacylsmic judgment. But owing to the fact that these displaced Essenic priests were continually rejected from their rightful Priesthood by the Hasmonean powers that ruled following the Maccabean war and victory, we find that this Essene sentiment would change. Under the influence of the Teacher of Righteousness the anger will come through in their writings. Above you saw how the Essenes' pleas for acceptance and reinstatement was continually refused. Over time the writings of these Essences, in their distancing from the Temple and the Priesthood, and Judaism in general, will take upon a revengeful attitude and gravitate to an apocalyptic mindset and one was not far away...one only needed to look East to Iran and Zoroastrianism and their apocalyptic theologies. This will become the backbone of this desert Zadok movement in a short time. We find it in the beginning of the Enoch document which was the new "Bible" for the Essenes.

Returning to Enoch, we read: "I saw in the vision how the ravens [Syrians] flew upon those lambs and took one of those lambs [Mattathias], and dashed those sheep [the Chasids] in pieces and devoured them. And I saw . . . till there sprouted a great horn [Judas Maccabaeus] from one of those sheep, and their eyes were opened.... And those ravens fought and battled with it and sought to lay its horn low, but they had no power over it." History now passes into prophecy; the battle continues without decision until the God of the sheep destroys all their enemies, who "were swallowed up in the earth" (Enoch, cx). God now sets up His throne "in the pleasant land," (Palestine); the archangel who has kept the record opens the sealed books; and the Last Judgment supervenes (Ibid.). The fallen angels known as the Watchers, the wicked Jewish rulers called shepherds, and the apostates known as "blinded sheep" are cast into the fiery abyss. The supernaturally constructed Jerusalem appears; and the Messianic kingdom in which the Chasid saints are the rulers is established by the Holy Great One. The Gentiles are now transformed into "white bulls," that is, they become regenerate, and submit to the universal dominion of the Chasidim. From the bosom of this enlightened world-community, the Messiah emerges at last, who is, presumably, to rule forever; "the first among them became a lamb, and that lamb became a great animal . . . and the Lord of the sheep rejoiced over it and over all the oxen" (Ibid.).

Thus, for the first time, the Messiah is called a lamb.

One last thought to consider. At this early date the theology is a mixture of both Judaism and Zoroastrianism. You should take note in your further reading and study how Judaism fades into the distance and the Essenes evolve into a Pythagorean-Zoroastrian-Buddhist sect which promoted the religious beliefs of such prior religions.

THE ESSENES AND THE BOOK OF ENOCH AND THE EVOLUTION OF THEIR THEOLOGY...140 B.C.E.

THE ESSENE THEOLOGY: 140 B.C.E.

Now we continue our study of the evolution of Essenic beliefs as we examine chapters 72-82 of the book of Enoch. This deal with the third section of the book; and most scholars estimate its date somewhere between 143 and 140 B.C.E. Like all preceding Essene scripture, it reflects the ideology of private property and free enterprise, which as you know, would be completely reversed in the days of Jesus as revealed not only by their own literature but the accounts of the New Testament as well. This third part of Enoch is profuse in its condemnation of sinners; yet it nowhere correlates wealth or the employment of labor with wickedness.

AGAIN WE FIND STRONG INFLUENCE BY ZOROASTRIANISM AND THE FURTHER DISTANCING FROM BIBLICAL JUDAISM BY THE ESSENES

This portion of Enoch is a treatise on astronomy and is loaded with Zoroastrian concepts. This is important because the calendar was determined by it, together with the number of days in the year, and the sequence of Sabbaths, feast days, and holy days.

Uriel, one of the seven archangels, discloses the secrets of the heavenly luminaries to Enoch, who inscribes them on "the heavenly tablets" and relays this knowledge to his son Methuselah (Enoch, lxxxi). This will become the foundation for a whole new liturgical calendar which replaced the one of Moses and the Torah. Again we find the distancing from Torah concepts of this group of emerging Zoroastrians.

This revelation is important because it established the calendar which placed the Essene feast and holy days on dates differing from those celebrated by all other Jews; and, as we shall see, this may have been the cause of the conflict which culminated in the death of the last Teacher of Righteousness. Again we find the Essenes repudiating Judaism as they knew it along with their Festivals and worship on "appointed days." The Essene calendar created a year of four equal parts, each of three thirty-day months; one intercalated day was added to each quarter, thus making a year of 364 days, which was to replace the confusing Hebrew year, in which a twelve-month period consisted of 353, 354, or 355 days; in each 19-year cycle, there were seven years with an additional intercalated lunar period; so these years had 383, 384, or 385 days (Ency. Brit., 14 th Ed. 4:580-581).

Although the Essene reckoning left something for science to correct (Enoch, lxxii-lxxxii), this innovation was no doubt a source of great pride. The Convenanters were persuaded that their truth had been lost because of the sins of mankind (Ibid., lxxx) and that evil was so multiplied as to threaten its very future existence. We may suppose that, since a 364-day year would in the course of time completely dislocate the seasons and the seedtime, the Essenes must have learned before a generation had elapsed, to intercalate a day or two at certain intervals in order to keep their seasons on even keel.

According to the Essenes, the reckoning used by the Men of the Community was holy, for it had been revealed in the Tablets of Enoch (Enoch, lxxxii); they relied, therefore, upon the highest authority for their years and months and for the dates on which their festivals and holy days should be celebrated, all in opposition to those of orthodox Judaism and the more scientific calculations of the Greeks.

THE ESSENES AND THE BOOK OF ENOCH AND THE EVOLUTION OF ESSENE THEOLOGY...100-90 B.C.E.

THE ESSENE THEOLOGY: 100-90 B.C.E.

Here we find right off a new and different Enoch. We now enter the Pythagorean period of the Essenes and they would remain such until their destruction by Rome. This portion of Enoch is a highly developed apocalypse, composed after the Essenes had adopted Pythagorean religious beliefs and had fused them into a complex amalgamation of Essenic theology. Here we find the desire for riches and power condemned as the proof of unrighteousness, and in which sainthood appears as union with God and His Son, evidenced by the love by mankind and the renunciation of all things worldly.

The holy and righteous are those who have separated themselves from the world, and the possessions of wealth has become the badge of damnation: those who acquire lands and money must burn in the everlasting fires of hell. The apostates consisted of the Hellenizers, the Sadducees, and the later Hasmoneans.

Enoch, chapters 91-105 and the fragment known as The Book of Noah are dated by most scholars about 100-90 B.C.E; and, although they differ both in theology and eschatology from the earlier Enochian literature; especially in a most drastic departure in social attitude and theory. The ferocity which the Essenes once vented upon the Watchers, the Hellenizers, and the Jewish apostates, is now reserved, with hundredfold intensity, for the rich, successful, and powerful people of the world. Since saintliness is now impossible without egalitarian poverty, the possession of any kind of personal wealth, or even the employment of labor, has became the badge of damnation. These portions of Enoch burn with fierce hatred toward those who have acquired wealth and oppress the poor; the author is persuaded that private possessions can be obtained only through social crime.

"Woe to those who build their houses with sin....And those who acquire gold and silver…Woe to you, ye rich, for ye have trusted in your riches, And from your riches shall ye depart.... And your creator will rejoice in your destruction...." But…"Be hopeful, ye righteous, for suddenly shall the sinners perish before you. And ye shall have lordship over them according to your desires" (Ibid., xciv).

The theme is repeated over and over:

"Woe to you who devour the finest of the wheat, And drink wine in large bowls, And tread under foot the lowly in your might" (Ibid., xcvi)

Luke 16:19-31, which tells the story of the Rich Man and Lazarus, as well as 12:16-21, which tells of the Rich Fool whose soul was required by God, are restatements of the following:

"Woe to you who acquire silver and gold . . . and say:…'We have become rich with riches and have possessions....And our granaries are brimful as water.' Yea and like water your lies shall flow away.... For ye have acquired it all in unrighteousness, And ye shall be given over to a great curse" (Ibid.,xcvii)

Let the wicked tremble: for "every sin is every day recorded in heaven . . . till the day of judgment" (Ibid., xcviii). The evil doers "shall be delivered into the hands of the righteous, and they shall cut off your necks and slay you, and have no mercy upon you" (Ibid., xcviii). And "Woe to you who build your houses through the grievous toil of others" for all your "building materials are the bricks and stones of sin" (Ibid., xcix).

In the last days, there will be frightful wars among the wicked in which "the horse shall walk up to the breast in the blood of sinners . . ." (Ibid., Rev. 14:20). In the midst of this gory scene, duplicated in Revelation 14:20, ".... the Most High will arise...To execute great judgment against sinners" (Enoch, c).

"And on account of the deeds of your hands....In blazing flames burning worse than fire shall ye burn" (Ibid.,).

"I tell you, ye sinners," thunders the prophet (Ibid., cii), "I know a mystery…And have read the heavenly tablets, And have seen the holy books" (Ibid., ciii) which declare concerning the saints

"That all goodness and joy and glory are prepared for them....Unto all the generations of the world...." (Ibid.)

On the final day, all earthly injustice will be rectified: "And grieve not that in your life your body fared not according to your goodness, But wait for the day of judgment of sinners, And for the day of cursing and chastisement" (Ibid., cii).

Although the saints must suffer under the present dispensation, they will, under the new, enjoy all the wealth which now makes the sinners so wicked:

"In our troubled days we have toiled laboriously....We have been tortured.... from day to day. We hoped to be the head and have become the tail. . . (Deut. 28:13, 2nd Esdras 6:55-59).

We desired to get away from them that we might escape and be at rest, But we found no place whereunto we should flee and be safe from them. And we complained to the rulers in our tribulation. But they…would not hearken to our voice" (Enoch, ciii).

Instead, "they helped those who robbed us and devoured us and made us few; and they concealed their oppression, and they did not remove from us the yoke of those that devoured us and dispersed and murdered us...." (Ibid.). This, like the passage in The Habakkuk Commentary, clearly implies that certain people (possibly the Sadducees) from whom the Essenes had expected help had betrayed them in their hours of crisis and fearful persecution.

The conditions were bad and not getting any better. Hope was diminishing as this deplorable condition had not existed almost a hundred years. The Essenes, the light of no Divine intervention, was forced to focus on the future for vindication and pinned their hopes on such a Divine intervention through the advent of a God-man Messiah.

THE ADVENT OF THE MESSIAH

The proto-Essenes expected the Messianic kingdom while they were yet alive and prophesied repeatedly that it would come by 130 B.C.E.

It did not come!

Stop right here! What does the Torah teach about false prophets?

Deut 13:1-4 1 If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, 2 And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; 3 Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the LORD your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul. 4 Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him. (KJV)

It saddens me to know that so many Christians believe certain "theologies" about Jesus and the New Testament, never knowing that such "ideas and religious beliefs" had their origin with FALSE PROPHETS whose Divine Oracles never came to be fulfilled. Such religious lies pass for truth today and many who accept such "religious beliefs" fall into idolatry and never know it. Simply said, the Messianic Prophecy of the Essenes has been shown to be false. Those who refer to some of their teachings in promotion of "this" or "that" particular Christian teaching never seem to mention that they failed miserably in their Messianic predictions. They were wiped out by Rome. Their prophecies remained with the rocks until 1948 and anyone who undertakes to read all of their writings find out quickly that they were "religious quacks." It gives me no joy to say as an ordained Pastor that such "Essene Messianic religious beliefs" found their way into the Jesus Movement of the first century and later into the New Testament. People approach such writings and religious beliefs as contained in the New Testament never knowing the origin of such beliefs and the utter failure of true Divine prophecy of those who espoused them!

But now, since the judgment was delayed, the Essenes had not been yet restored to their rightful position as Priests, and the corrupt leaders judged, it had become necessary to reassure "the righteous" that they "shall arise from sleep ;" (Enoch, xci) the elect would experience a glorious resurrection into everlasting mansions at some indefinite time, just as we find in the Fourth Christian Gospel (the Gospel of John). Again we see the Essene influence and their theology infused into the New Testament. The Essenes would sit on thrones and be companions of the hosts of heaven. On the other hand, "great chastisement" would be visited upon this wicked and unrighteous generation (Ibid., xcii), just as Jesus and John the Baptist were in due course to declare. Again a perfect reference to the New Testament.

Now follows the Apocalypse of Weeks, in which Enoch summarizes Biblical and Essene history in ten periods, each of which is characterized by a climactic event. At the beginning of the eighth period, the saints would come into possession of the Enochian revelations and the Community of the elect would be established (Ibid., xciii). Following this, the old order would undergo consummation and judgment, when "... sinners shall be delivered into the hands of the righteous.... And at its close, they shall acquire houses through their righteousness.... And after that, in the ninth week....all the works of the godless shall vanish from the earth. . . And after this, in the tenth week....There shall be a great eternal judgment. And the first heaven shall depart and pass away, And a new heaven shall appear. And after that there will be many weeks, without number forever, And all shall be in goodness and righteousness, And sin shall no more be mentioned forever."

Intertwined with these Zoroastrian concepts, which reappear in our canonical Revelation and elsewhere consider this:

SO WHAT HAVE WE READ AND WHAT HAVE I BEEN TELLING YOU?

The Zadoks were a displaced Priesthood thanks to the Hasmonean rulers following the Maccabee war. After the victory the Zadoks were expecting to reclaim their office, but instead, John Hycranus usurped the Priesthood and forbid the Zadoks to minister. They in response fled such corruption to the wilderness to begin a "new Israel" as, in their opinion, they were the remnant. After repeated persecutions and the death of their Teacher of Righeousness, the remaining Essenes began to repudiate Judaism and gravitated to beliefs alien to conservative Biblical Judaism. In place of the Torah they would pattern themselves after Pythagorean, Buddhist, and Iranian-Zoroastrian beliefs. From the Zoroastrian eschatology they would derive their "star-wars" theology which promised doom to all their adversaries.

Time has shown they were wrong as they disappeared as an apocalyptic movement and became Christians following the death and crucifixion of Jesus. In Jesus these Essenes saw the reincarnation of their crucified Teacher and parallels were then made and applied to the life of Jesus by this group. To recapitulate, all this reflects the fact that in the reign of Hyrcanus or Jannaeus, and probably in both, the Essenes were pursued with fire and sword, their residences plundered and burned; and that they were persecuted, decimated, and driven into esoteric secrecy.

But the victory of the elect would be certain and eternal, at least in their minds: for "your names are written before the glory of the Great One.... ye shall shine as the lights of heaven ... And in your cry, cry for judgment, and it shall appear to you; for all your tribulation shall be visited upon the rulers, and all who helped those who plundered you.... And now fear not, ye righteous, when ye see the sinners growing strong and prosperous: be not companions with them.... for ye shall become companions of the hosts of heaven" (Ibid., civ). Again we are told that the Holy Ones had been plundered and that certain people, who should have protected them, had, instead, aided and abetted the criminals.

The Noah fragment appended to Enoch closes with a vision of the hell in which sinners are confined; and of the glorious heaven reserved for "the spirits of the good who belong to the generation of light . . . and I will seat each on the throne of his honor ... And they shall see those who were born in darkness led into darkness, while the righteous shall be glorious…: (Ibid., cviii). Again the parallels with the New Testament are easy to find as we see Jesus promised his disciples that all of them would one day be seated, each as a judge, on his separate throne (Matt. 19:28).

Now we move to the last part of the Book of Enoch.

THE ESSENES AND THE BOOK OF ENOCH AND THE EVOLUTION OF THEIR THEOLOGY...75 B.C.E.

THE ESSENE THEOLOGY: 75 B.C.E.

Although the firth portion of Enoch stands second in sequence in the book, you need to know that it was certainly the latest portion of the book ever written, probably written about 75 B.C.E.

This is the culmination of the Essene religious synthesis!

We are dealing with chapters 37-71, and these happen to be the longest and most elaborate. Furthermore, this particular religious evolution in beliefs reflects a distinct development which brings Essene doctrine very close to the New Testament. God is here called the Lord of Spirits, and the expression occurs more than a hundred times; he is also described as the Lord of Glory and the Eternal Lord; three or four times he is named the Most High and eleven times the Head of Days; twice we read that his head is white as wool, as in Daniel.

We find right away an elaborate Zoroastrian-Pythagorean synthesis. The Lord of the Spirits commissions the Son of Man, who now appears under the time for the first time in Enoch, chosen before the world was created, to judge sinners and righteous. The Messiah is portrayed as a distinctly separate agency called the Son of Man, as in Daniel. So now the title "Son of Man" carries Messianic connotations according to the Essenes.

The Elect are those who have a congenital compulsion toward righteousness, which causes them to abhor the things of this world, and to love God and their fellowmen, thus, they achieve sainthood and will be called to everlasting glory.

THE ANGEL-MESSIAH OF THE ESSENES….IS NOT THE MESSIAH OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The Essene Angel-Messiah is a Godman. But there is one problem!

This deity is conspicuously NOT the Yahweh of the Pentateuch, the tribal God of the Jews, who is alternately wrathful or repentant, and who commands his Chosen People to commit acts of aggression and moral turpitude. The Essene God is instead the Zoroastrian God of Light relieved, however, of serious cosmic opposition in the form of Pythagorean metaphysics: he is a universal monotheistic power. The marks of Essene authorship are indubitable; any assumption of Pharisaic or Christian origin is implausible.

The theological departure consists chiefly in the separation of the Messianic agency from the Supreme God; this new power, named the Righteous One:

- He is three times called "His Anointed" (which in Greek becomes the Christ)
- He is called "Mine Elect One" sixteen times
- He is called the "Son of Man" eighteen, which is the title Jesus gives himself throughout the Synoptics and with the same connotation.

Here, as in the New Testament, the Son of Man constitutes the agency which will conduct the last judgment, rule over the kingdom of heaven on earth, and establish his "elect ones" in this community of saints.

This Enochian Messiah, this Angel-Messiah, described as not human but pre-existent, hearkens back to Zoroastrianism and the Greek philosopher Zeno and foreshadows the Christology of Paul and the Fourth Gospel.

The Essene-preexistent-Messiah is now, like the Soshans, a spiritual and pre-existing power, to be seated on the throne of his glory at the inauguration of his kingdom. The coming of this Son of Man is to be a sudden transformation, at which time "Mine Elect One shall sit on his throne of glory...And I will transform the heaven...And I will transform the earth and make it a blessing: And I will cause Mine Elect Ones to dwell upon it: But the sinners and evil-doers shall not set foot theron...I shall destroy them from the face of the earth" (Enoch, xlv).

The Essenes lived in happy anticipation of the Last Judgment, when they would behold their enemies burning "as straw in the fire...The name of the Lord of Spirits be blessed" (Enoch, xlviii). Obviously this is Ahuramazda, and not Yahweh!

The Essenes here call themselves "the Holy Ones" or "the righteous and elect" eleven times and simply "Mine elect ones" or "the elect ones" eighteen.

Chapters 37-59 consists of visions in which sinners are judged by "The Righteous One...." (Enoch, xxxviii). According to the Essene literature it seems that between the writing of the fourth and fifth portions of Enoch, the Essene Community had revived its feverish expectations of an almost immediate kingdom to be inaugurated on earth by the all-powerful Anointed One. Like that of the Synoptics (Matt. 24:34), this would supervene in Palestine, and very soon. The elect saints were therefore living daily in the shadow of that overwhelming catastrophe when the Messiah would appear on the clouds of heaven surrounded by myriads of angels to conduct the Last Judgment, consign the rich and powerful into everlasting fire, and convey their lands, houses, and other property to the elect saints (Enoch, xxxviii).

"Here mine eyes saw their dwelling places with His righteous angels....And in that place mine eyes saw the Elect

One.... And all the righteous and elect before Him.... And their lips extol the name of the Lord of Spirits" (Ibid., xxxix).

The seven Zoroastrian archangels, which appear in Enoch as Uriel, Raphael, Raguel, Michael, Saraquel (or Phanuel), Gabriel, and Remiel (Ibid., xx), stand ready to execute the commands of the Lord of Spirits: "And I saw there the mansions of the elect and the mansions of the holy, and mine eyes saw all the sinners.... being dragged off...." (Ibid., xli).

THE RECONSTITUTED EARTH AND ESSENIC CHRISTOLOGY

"I will transform the earth and make it a blessing; And I will cause Mine elect ones to dwell upon it: But the sinners and evil-doers shall not set foot thereon" (Ibid., xlv).

Enoch prefigures the New Testament Christology:

"And there I saw One who had a head of days....And with Him was another being whose countenance had the appearance of a man, Ad his face was full of graciousness, like one of the holy angels. . .This is the Son of Man who hath righteousness. . . And who revealeth the treasures of all that is hidden, Because the Lord of Spirits bath chosen him..... And this Son of Man whom thou hast seen..... shall put down the kings from their thrones and kingdoms,,, " (Ibid., xlvi).

Here is the "exact concept of the Son of Man presented in the Synoptics" who will proclaim divine truth in the world, hurl the mighty from their seats (Luke 1:46-53), sit on the throne of his glory, and, at last, judge all mankind. The all-powerful, preexisting Son will rule in the new dispensation:

"And at that hour that Son of Man was named. . .His name was named before the Lord of Spirits. He shall be a staff to the righteous.... And he shall be the light of the Gentiles.... And for this reason bath he been chosen and hidden before Him, Before the creation of the world and forevermore. . . For he bath preserved the lot of the righteous.... For in his name are they saved.... " (Enoch, xlviii).

"And the sinners," we read, "shall be banished" by the Lord of Spirits "from off the face of the earth" (Ibid., liii). And "I will give them over into the hands of Mine elect: As straw in the fire so shall they burn before the face of the holy.....The name of the Lord of Spirits be blessed" (Ibid., xlviii).

No one, we learn, "shall be able to utter a lying word before the Elect One" (Ibid., xlix) at the Great Judgment; He will then set his saints apart and establish them in His kingdom: "And the earth shall rejoice, And the righteous shall dwell upon it, And the elect shall walk thereon" (Ibid., li).

"His Anointed," then, will be "potent and mighty on the earth," and "there shall be no iron for war" (Ibid., lii). As for the "kings and the mighty.... Michael and Gabriel, and Raphael and Phanuel shall take hold of them on that great day, and cast them.... into the burning furnace" located in a "part of the earth" where there is "a deep valley with burning fire" (Ibid., liv). "Ye mighty kings who dwell on the earth . . . shall have to behold Mine Elect One, how he sits on the throne of his glory.... " (Ibid., iv) just as the New Testament Son of Man is to do in Matthew 25:31. And then, declares Enoch, the Lord of Spirits will establish "the elect in the light of eternal life.... " (Ibid., lviii).

The prophet assures the elect that the righteous who have died will rise into eternal glory whether they "have been destroyed by the desert ... devoured by the beasts" or swallowed "by the fish of the sea...." (Ibid., lxi).

Again it is emphasized that the Messiah is a pre-existing, separate, divine agency:

".... from the beginning the Son of Man was hidden, And the Most High preserved him in the presence of His might, And revealed Him to the elect. And the congregation of the elect and holy shall be sown" (Ibid., lxii).

Since the apocalyptic judgment is imminent, only a brief period remains for the proclamation of the gospel and the building of the holy congregation; those who avail themselves of this final opportunity will shine in glory when they are established in their exclusive kingdom; but when "the exalted and those who rule the earth" are delivered "to the angels of punishment," then the elect ".... shall rejoice over them, Because the wrath of the Lord of Spirits resteth upon them, And his sword is drunk with their blood" (Ibid.).

The wicked weep and implore, but they "find no respite for confession"; they discover too late that "His judgments have no respect to persons" (Ibid., lxiii). Bewailing their fate, they cry: " 'Our souls are full of unrighteous gain…'" (Ibid.). Their doom is irreversible.

The third parable closes with a peroration describing once more the final judgment and the advent of the apocalyptic kingdom (Ibid., lxix). Read Matthew 25:31-46, and then listen once more to Enoch:

Matt 24:31-46 31 And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. 32 Now learn a parable of the fig tree; When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: 33 So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. 34 Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled. 35 Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. 36 But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only. 37 But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 38 For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, 39 And knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. 40 Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 41 Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 42 Watch therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. 43 But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. 44 Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. 45 Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? 46 Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. (KJV)

"With chains shall they be bound, And in the assemblage-place of destruction shall they be imprisoned, And all their works shall vanish from the face of the earth. And from thenceforth there shall be nothing corruptible; For that Son of Man has appeared, And has seated himself on the throne of his glory, And all evil shall pass away from before his face…" (Ibid.).

This is obviously a description of the Last Judgment envisioned in Matthew.

In the final passage of Enoch, the prophet describes his entrance into heaven:

"And I fell on my face before the Lord of Spirits...."And I saw angels who could not be counted, A thousand thousand, and ten times ten thousand. Encircling that house...."And with them the Head of Days, His head white and pure as wool, And His raiment was indescribable" (Ibid., lxxi).

IN CONCLUSION

If you have diligent to read the materials researched for your benefit available on this website then you now see the "big picture." You now see how the Davidic Messiah of Moses and the Prophets has been blended with religious concepts stemming from Gentile religions; beginning with Egypt and Osiris, later grafting religious tenants from Adonis, Dionysus, Demeter, Persephone, Orpheus, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Pythagoreanism, Mithraism, Serapis, and not least, Zoroastrianism upon the Davidic Messiah by the Essenes in their almost total repudiation of Biblical Judaism since they were a spurned Priesthood and had been for almost two hundred years.

If you have again been diligent to study the materials on this website, and I know it is extensive, but to trace the evolution and personification of sun-worship and how it became the very fiber of the Jesus of the Christian church cannot be done simply for it involves a religious synthesis for over 6000 years; since the beginning of time.

It is our hope at Bet Emet Ministries that the readership will take these things to heart and begin their own study to see "if these things be so." A good place to start is with good books on the Essenes like capable scholars like M. Burrows, Lawrence Schiffman, and Martin Larson. Most of Larson's books are out of print but can be located on the Internet at http://bibliofind.com as you surf the world and used book stores.

It is again our hope that this information will help you discern the difference between the worship of Yahweh in Spirit and it Truth and the implicit idolatry that accompanies the current theologies regarding Jesus as taught by Christendom.

Shalom.

THE MANUAL OF DISCIPLINE

A CODE OF CONDUCT

The Manual of Discipline sets forth the practical rules and regulations of the Pythagoreanized Essene community.

THE UNIVERSALIZATION OF THE ESSENE CULT

With the adoption of Pythagoreanism, the cult became universalized near the end of the second century: no longer are the Sons of Light identified as the children of Jacob, and the Sons of Darkness as their current political enemies. Now, instead, it is the poor who are the righteous, because they practice community, and they are pitted against those who are guilty of social injustice or economic exploitation. In this newly discovered division of humanity into saints and sinners, race is no longer a determining or even an important factor.

MEMBERSHIP REQUIREMENT FOR THE ESSENE CULT

Our copy of The Manual begins by listing the duties of the members. They are to seek God; do what "he has commanded through the prophets and Moses; . . . love all the sons of light, each according to his lot in the counsel of God, and hate all the sons of darkness, each according to his guilt."

Josephus declares that one of the solemn oaths taken by an Essene was "that he will always hate the wicked and be assistant to the righteous." Actually, this hatred was a duty quite as sacred as his love for the brethren. The Manual explains that those who enter the covenant must practice community of goods, and must never seek to alter the established calendar. Members must never swerve from the pathway of community "because of any dread or terror or trial or fright in the dominion of Belial," that is, from fear of those who remain outside the holy Order. "The Levites shall recount the iniquities of the sons of Israel and all their transgressions and sin in the dominion of Belial." In a dramatic repudiation of orthodox Judaism, the Essenes declared upon entering the community: "'We have committed iniquity . . . we and our fathers before us.' . . . Then the priest shall bless al I the men of God's lot . . . And the Levites shall curse all the men of Belial's lot and shall answer and say: 'Accursed may you be in all your wicked, guilty works . . . and may you suffer wrath in the deep darkness of eternal fire . ' And all who are passing over into the covenant shall say after those who bless and those who curse, 'Amenl Amenl' "

In The Damascus Document we found that there were four classes, which agrees with Josephus. The Manual, however, speaks only of three: priests, Levites, and lay members. The novices must have been the fourth division. After the cult was communized, no distinction was recognized beween Jews and proselytes.

We are told that until the coming of the Messiah, there must be an annual convocation in which each covenantor shall take his position according to established rank. This confirms the statement of Josephus concerning the manner in which the Essenes arranged themselves in order of precedence and seniority. It is interesting to note Jesus' declaration that the first should be last and the last first, which was obviously part of His revolt against the rigid system of Essene priority, and constituted a democratic invitation to mass-membership along Buddhist lines.

No rituals could bring salvation outside the Order; whoever "refuses to enter God's covenant . . . with the upright he will not be reckoned. His knowledge and his strength and his wealth shall not come into the council of the community . . . He will not be purified by atonement offerings, and he will not be made clean with any water . . .; Unclean, unclean he will be all the days that he rejects the ordinance of God."

THE DOCTRINE OF METAPHYSICAL DUALISM

We have already seen that the Zoroastrian concept of the universe and of every human being was based upon a cosmic dualism in which the two primordial powers carry on perpetual warfare in the macrocosm of the universe, and within every human organism, which is the microcosm. TIlis metaphysical system flowed from Zoroastrianism into Pythagoreanism, and became the basis for its celibacy; it entered Platonism in modified form, making the body the prisonhouse of the soul. Finally, via Essenism, it became the philosophical basis for the Gospel Jesus. This dualism is expressed categorically in the Cathas,32 the ideology of which is reproduced in 7 he Manual, which attempts to engraft these Zoroastrian concepts upon Judaism. In the new synthesis, however, the Evil One is not recognized as unoriginated, but becomes, as in Christianity, a creation of God, who, we are told, "created man . . . and made for him . . . the spirits of truth and error. In the abode of light are the origins of truth, and from the source of darkness are the origins of error. In the hand of the prince of light is dominion over all the sons of righteousness; in the ways of light they walk. And in the hand of the angel of darkness, is all dominion over the sons of error; and in the ways of darkness they walk . . . In the ways of the two spirits men walk. And all . . . their works are in their two divisions, according to each man's inheritance . . . for all periods of eternity. For God has . . . put eternal enmity between their divisions . . . God . . . has ordained" the ultimate destruction "of error.... And he will make the upright perceive the knowledge of the Most High.... For (God has chosen them for an eternal covenant, and theirs is all the glory of man. .

"Thus far the spirits of truth and error struggle in the heart of man . . . and according to each man's inheritance in truth he does right, and so he hates error but according to his possession in the lot of error he does wickedly, and so he abhors truth. For in equal measure God has established the two spirits until the period which has been decreed for the making new."33

Here we have a faithful rendition of Zoroastrian ethics, metaphysics, and eschatology, except that in this version the wicked spirit was created by God, which certainly makes Him responsible for the origin and the existence of evil. As in Persian ideology, the human race is divided into two camps or armies, the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness. The God of knowledge, or prescience, who is here called the God of Israel, gives to some the power to be guided by the Spirit of Light, but to others falls the lot of darkness; every destiny, therefore, is controlled by fate and subject to eternal predestination. Those chosen by God for His eternal covenant are the Elect, who cannot fail to be redeemed. All others must inevitably be plunged into the eternal fires of hell.

The Sons of Darkness are easily recognized because they strive for money and wealth, own property, marry and rear families, and are always concerned over material things; the Children of Light, on the contrary, sell all that they have, combine this with the possessions of the poor, embrace the holy, communist, celibate life, enter the Community of God, and devote their lives to the praise and adoration of the Lord of Spirits. We know that this dualism was well established among the Essenes even before they became Pythagorean.

ADMISSION, NOVITIATE, AND DISCIPLE

"And this is the order for the men of the community . . . to become a community in law and in wealth, answering when asked by the sons of Zadok."35 Members must, The Manual observes, "take it upon themselves in the covenant to be separated from all the men of error who walk in the way of wickedness."35 And it continues: "unless they have turned from their evil," that is, unless there has been a thorough moral regeneration, "they shall not enter the water, in order to touch the sacred food of the holy men." First, there must be an inner transformation; second, there is purification by baptism; and, third, the member is admitted to the sacramental meals, a procedure confirmed by Josephus. The men of the community must never be united with unholy men in work or in wealth; "and no man . . . of the community shall answer when asked by them regarding any law or ordinance."35 As Josephus declared, the member "swears to communicate their doctrines to no one any otherwise than as he received them himself." The same relationships as those enjoined in the early Christian community were operative: "One shall not speak to his brother in anger or in resentment . . . a man shall not bring against his brother a word before the masters without having rebuked him before witnesses.... In these ways they shall walk in all their dwellings.... Together they shall eat, together they shall worship, and together they shall counsel."35

The next paragraph makes it plain, as both Philo and Josephus indicate, that these Essene societies existed in many places; for it provides that whenever "there are ten men of the council of the community there shall not be absent from them a priest...." This was the same ordinance as in The Damascus Document. "And when they set the table to eat, or the wine to drink, the priest shall stretch out his hand first to pronounce a blessing with the first portion of the bread and the wine." This was the daily sacrament which Josephus described and without which the Essene life would have been meaningless.

In explaining how admission to the Order was achieved, The Manual tallies exactly with Josephus. This was similar to that practiced in the original Pythagorean societies. The applicant was questioned by the masters, who rejected him, or accepted him as a probationer for one year, while he submitted to the discipline of the order without enjoying its benefits or fellowship. At the end of this period, if he passed the examinations then imposed, he received baptismal purification and was admitted to the novitiate. At the end of an additional year, there were further examinations, which, if passed, admitted him to the sacred food; his wealth and his wages, which, up to this time had simply been held in escrow, were now mingled with the wealth of the community. However, a third year and the most rigid examinations still remained before he could become a full-fledged brother; if these were successfully met, he was admitted to the holiest sacrament, the eucharistic wine, and to full counsel in the Assembly.

The punishment for concealing private assets was somewhat less drastic than in the case of Ananias and Sapphira: "If there is found among them a man who lies about his wealth, he shall be excluded from the sacred food of the masters for a year, and he shall be deprived of a fourth of his food ration."36

Offenses with their appropriate punishments are now listed: for minor infractions the penalty was exclusion from the sacraments and reduction of the food ration for periods ranging from ten days to two years. For major offenses, the penalty was excommunication and expulsion. For calling a brother a fool, the penalty was three months; for interrupting a neighbor, ten days; for gossiping about the brethren, one year; for murmuring against the community, expulsion; for turning traitor against and leaving the Order, irrevocable expulsion.

It may be difficult for us to realize how terrible these punishments were: exclusion from the sacred food and wine meant temporary spiritual death; reduction in the food ration meant serious undernourishment; and expulsion from the Order meant death from starvation, because, as a result of the terrible oaths they had sworn and the discipline to which they had become accustomed, the Essenes could not eat of any except the consecrated food: expelled members simply lay down and died in the desert. We are told by Josephus that rather than eat any "forbidden food," presumably that provided by the Romans, they died under fearful tortures. If such conduct seems irrational to us, we have simply failed to comprehend the fierce motivations of these cultists.

There is a section dealing specifically with the establisment of the Khirbet-Qumran. We are told that after the Order of the Community has been established in Israel, certain elect members will be chosen for a sacred mission "to make atonement for the land.... When these men have been prepared in the foundation of the community, for two years with blameless conduct, they shall be separated in holiness in the midst of the council of the men of the community."35 These especially chosen holy men will establish a place of God in "the wilderness to prepare there the way of the Lord."

And so we see that the Essenes established a holy headquarters in the desert to study the law and to prepare for the arrival of the Messiah. The great majority continued in the various thiasoi in their regular employment; but those at the monastery must have been professionals of a kind, certainly not wholly self-supporting.

THE HABAKKUK COMMENTARY

The Habakkuk Commentary has occasioned more controversy than any other among the Dead Sea Scrolls. Mr. A. Dupont-Sommer, in a masterly analysis, has established in his Jewish Sect of Qumran II, that the Kittim are the Romans and that the date of composition is shortly after 63 B. C.

The method of the Essene author of the Habakkuk Commentary is to quote a passage from Habakkuk and then to interpret it as a prophecy of current events. What was actually written about the Chaldeans, he applies to the Romans. Should these interpretations seem far-fetched to us, they are certainly much more reasonable than those of modern preachers who profess to find prophecies in the Bible of events yet to come.

The principal characters appearing in The Commentary are "the teacher of righteousness," who was the great leader of the Essenes executed just before Pompey desecrated Jerusalem in 63; and "the wicked priest" or "the man of the lie," who was Aristobulus II, the last of the Asmonean kings.

In prior articles in this series we have already seen that the leader of the Damascus exiles was called the Unique Teacher, the Star of Jacob, and "a teacher of righteousness", and we pointed out that there must have been such a leader who reorganized the Essenes as Pythagoreans late in the reign of John Hyrcanus. This must have been the usual title of successive cultic leaders; the one executed by Aristobulus and thereafter declared the Messiah simply became the greatest of these "teachers."

The Teacher of Righteousness was an actual individual, believed to possess divine powers by which to interpret the scriptures. And so where Habakkuk reads “that he may run who reads it,” this meant the teacher of righteousness, to whom God made known all the mysteries of the words of his servants the prophets" (Commentary, II, 1). When Habakkuk states “Look among the nations and see; wonder and be astounded”.... This means those who acted treacherously together with the man of the lie, for they did not heed the words of the teacher of righteousness from the mouth of God . . . at the end of days: that is, those who are ruthless against the covenant, who do not believe . . . all the things that are coming upon the last generation from the mouth of the priest into whose heart God put wisdom to explain all the words of his servants the prophets" (Ibid.). In short, the Teacher of Righteousness possessed divine power to interpret the prophecies. But the Pharisees and the Asmoneans rejected his message when he told them that they were then "at the end of days"; and they persecuted him and were ruthless against the members of the Covenant.

Now follows a passage in which the Romans are described in unmistakable detail, after which Hab. 1:13 is interpreted thus: "Why do ye look on faithless men, but thou art silent at the swallowing by the wicked men of one more righteous than he? This means the house of Absalom and the men of their party, who kept silence at the chastisement of the teacher of the righteousness, and did not help him against the man of the lie, who rejected the law in the midst of the whole congregation" (Ibid., I, 12).

We believe that "the house of Absalom" were the Pharisees, who, in spite of their own bitter conflict with the Asmoneans and all they had in common with the Essenes, nevertheless kept silence at the trial and "chastisement" of the Essene prophet. The Commentary continues: “But the righteous shall live by faith.”' This means all the doers of the law in Judah, whom God will rescue from the house of judgment because of their labor, and their faith in the teacher of righteousness" (Ibid., I, 4). The Commentary then quotes Hab. 2:5-6, which condemns greed: "This means the wicked priest, who was named according to the truth when he first took office; but when he had begun to rule in Israel . . . he forsook God and betrayed the statutes because of wealth.... He plundered ... the wealth of the peoples, adding to himself iniquity and guilt; and ways of abomination he wrought in all impurity of uncleanness" (Ibid., II, 6).

The wicked priest is here the whole Asmonean dynasty. We know that during the beginning of his reign the Essenes regarded Hyrcanus, who was the first to assume the triple crown of king, priest, and prophet (Antiq., XIII, x, 7), as well as his Maccabaean predecessors with favor. We therefore read that he "was named according to the truth when he first took office . . . but he forsook God and betrayed the statutes." During his maturity, Hyrcanus went over to the Sadducees, fought with his neighbors, placed them under tribute, confiscated their wealth, and forced Judaism upon them. During this fierce crisis, the gulf between Essene and Pharisee was accentuated; for no matter how much the latter hated the Sadducees and the "Apostate" Asmoneans, they always remained throughout thoroughly Judaistic and abhorred the Edomites, Syrians, and other Gentiles even more. The Commentary finds in Hab. 2:8 a prophecy which concerns Alexander Jannaeus and Aristobulus II: "Because you have plundered many nations, all the remnant of peoples will plunder you"; this means the last priests of Jerusalem, who assembled wealth and booty from the spoil of the peoples, but at the end of days their wealth with their spoil will be delivered into the hand of the army of the Kittim, for they are the remainder of the peoples. "For the blood of men and violence to the earth . . . :" this means the wicked priest, whom, for the wrong done to the teacher of righteousness and the men of his party, God delivered into the hands of his enemies afflicting him with a destroying scourge, in bitterness of soul, because he acted wickedly against his elect'' (Commentary, II, 8). The "wicked one," we are told, inflicted "his scourge with judgments of wickedness, and horrors of sore disease they wrought, in him, and vengeance in his body of flesh" (Ibid). Because the Asmonean "last high priests" had plundered their neighbors, the Jewish people were now being ravaged by the Kittim; and, because the "wicked priest" did wrong to the Teacher of Righteousness and to the men of his party, "God delivered him into the hands of his enemies." The Romans were simply instruments used by God to inflict richly-deserved punishment. Josephus states laconically that when Pompey took Jerusalem, "Of the Jews there fell twelve thousand, but of the Romans very few; . . . He also carried bound along with him Aristobulus and his children" (Antiq., XIV, ix, 4-5). This is confirmed by Plutarch in his Life of Pompey (Life of Pompey).

The Commentary proceeds: "Woe to him who makes his neighbors drink, who pours out his wrath; yea, he has made them drunk, to gaze on their festivals!" This means the wicked priest, who persecuted the teacher of righteousness, wishing to banish him; and at the . . . day of atonement, he appeared to them to confound them . . . on the day of fasting, their Sabbath of rest" (Commentary, II, 15).

Here we discover the occasion of the Essene leader's execution. Aristobulus, having determined to exile him, had summoned him for inquisition and trial. But the Teacher of Righteousness turned the tables: on the day of Passover or atonement, which, because of the differing calendars used by the official priesthood and the Essene cult, fell on different days, he appeared boldly before the priests of Aristobulus, challenged their calendar, and made "them stumble." The prophet was arrested, tried, condemned, scourged, and executed during the Passover Festival (notice the parallel with Jesus who would follow much later). This is a very important "link" which will help the Essenes become part of the Jesus Movement much later.

And now at last the Essenes possessed that most precious of all religious treasures, without which any broad soteriological conquest over mankind in the Graeco-Roman world would have been impossible: the Essenes had their sacrificial god-man, who had given his life for the salvation of many. How the Teacher of Righteousness was transfigured by the imagination of the Essenes in the years following his death we learn from The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, which together with the revelations of Enoch, became the basic scriptures of the cult.

THE TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS

In The Testaments each of the twelve sons of Jacob delivers to his children a death-bed monologue including ethical instructions, and prophetical revelations concerning "the last times," which, of course, were always those of the actual writer.

The book presents certain difficulties: for its original stratum was composed in the reign of Hyrcanus; but after the fall of Aristobulus II various passages were added and this era became "the end of the ages." Finally, to add to the confusion, we find a very few minor Christian revisions, belonging probably to the first century.

The book was first composed about 130-120 B.C.E., before the brotherhood became communist and celibate; then, about the year 60 B.C.E., a number of interpolations were made in which the Teacher appears as the "savior of the world." These "added interpolations: and "savior of the world additions" reflect a conception so similar to that of the New Testament that the early Catholics accepted The Testaments as Christian revelation. Copies of it were therefore multiplied: by the third century, however, theologians began to doubt its authenticity, and, like The Book of Enoch, its authority declined.

The interpolations of 60-50 B.C.E. are almost as distinctive as if they were printed in red ink. Three of the monologues have none; in five, they consist of only from two to seven verses; in two, they comprise from fifteen to twenty; the testaments of Judah and Levi contain the most elaborate additions, which was quite natural, since these were the only tribes which survived.

The Testaments have always been extant. The editors of the Ante-Nicene Library included the document among early Christian literature and stated confidently in 1871 that it was written in the second century of our era. R. H. Charles and other scholars, however, established that it was a Jewish composition of the second century B.C.E., but interpolated with passages written shortly after the conquest of Jerusalem by Pompey. The conclusions of Charles have now been proved, because fragments of The Testaments have been found among the Dead Sea Scrolls.

What scholars once believed could only refer to Jesus we now know to have been written about the Essene prophet....the Essene Teacher of Righteousness and not Jesus!

The citations here used are from the translation in The Lost Books of the Bible, issued by the World Publishing Company.

GLORIFICATION OF JOHN HYRCANUS

In their original form, The Testaments consisted simply of homilies in which the reader is warned against lying, resentment, hatred, jealousy, intoxication, lust, fornication, greed, covetousness, and the wiles of designing women. Their basic thesis is the primacy of Judah and Levi: from Judah is to arise the king, who is to exercise temporal sovereignty, and from Levi the priest, who is to rule over matters spiritual ("Judah," IV, 2-3).

Now we need to pay close attention!!!!

Since ancient tradition declared that the Messiah would arise from Judah and be of the stem of Jesse, a new revelation was now necessary to satisfy the Levite Hasmoneans.

Answer for yourself: So what do these power hungry Hasmoneans do in such a situation?

They create a new revelation.

We read that Levi shall be the high priest until the consummation, and that he must be obeyed ("Reuben," II, 26); the pretensions of John Hyrcanus to his triple office and authority are confirmed ("Levi," III, 23-26). Josephus, in his Antiq., XIII, x, 7, stated: "Hyrcanus…administered the government…for thirty-one years…He was esteemed by God worthy of three of the greatest privileges, the government of the nation, the dignity of the high priesthood, and prophecy: for God was with him, and enabled him to know futurities." Even Josephus records the events for us.

ALTERED ATTITUDE TOWARD THE HASMONEANS

In the interpolations, however, we find a profound change in the attitude toward the Hasmoneans. That these additions were made after the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey is established by various passages. We read that "the veil of the temple shall be rent ("Levi," III, 45), as happened for the first and only time when Pompey desecrated the sanctuary; and that "among men of another race shall my kingdom come to an end" ("Judah, IV, 12). This can refer only to the termination of Jewish independence which occurred when Pompey made Israel a tributary in 63 B.C.E. We have, however, a more detailed and decisive passage which expresses the final Essene attitude toward the Hasmoneans and which also proves that the interpolations were made immediately after 63 B. C., since this was the terminus ad quem of the author's historical knowledge ("Levi," V, 1-12)

- 1. In each Jubilee there shall be a priesthood.
- 2. And in the first jubilee, the first who is anointed to the priesthood shall be great, and shall speak to God as to a father...
- 4. In the second jubilee, he that is anointed shall be conceived in sorrow of beloved ones; and his priesthood shall be honored and shall be glorified by all.
- 5. And the third priest shall be taken hold of by sorrow.
- 6. And the fourth shall be in pain, because unrighteousness shall gather itself against him exceedingly, and all Israel shall hate each one his neighbor.
- 7. The fifth shall be taken hold of by darkness. Likewise also the sixth and the seventh.
- 8. And in the seventh shall be such pollution as I cannot express before men, for they shall know it who do those things.
- 9. Therefore they shall be taken captive and become a prey; and their land and their substance shall be destroyed.
- 10. And in the fifth week they shall return to their desolate country, and shall renew the house of the Lord.
- 11. And in the seventh week shall come priest", who are idolaters, adulterers, lovers of money, proud, lawless, lascivious, abusers of children and of beasts.
- 12. And after their punishment shall have come from the Lord, the priesthood shall fail.

The first of these seven priests is Judas Maccabaeus, 165-160 (cf. Dupont-Sommer, Jewish Sect of Qumran, III), the second, Jonathan, 160-143; the third Simon, 143-134; the fourth, Hyrcanus, 134-104; the fifth, Aristobulus I, 104-103; the sixth, Alexander Jannaeus, 103-76; and the seventh, Aristobulus II, 76-63. The whole thumbnail sketch is drawn with rare accuracy.

The estimate of the Hasmoneans here and in The Habakkuk Commentary is identical. In the time of Hyrcanus, the great sorrow and the final iniquity of Israel began: for then it was that the Jews, split into hostile factions, began to hate each other. The short reign of Aristobulus I is laconically characterized as one of darkness, and it is interesting to note that this agrees precisely with the judgment of Josephus (Antiq., XIII, xi). The reign of Alexander Jannaeus, who crucified the eight hundred Pharisees, and that of Aristobulus II, which was marked by cruelty and profligacy, are likewise condemned. The latter, Aristobulus II, is the "wicked priest" of the Habakkuk Commentary in whose reign "shall be such pollution as I cannot express." Therefore, continues our author grimly, "they shall be taken captive and become a prey, and their land and their substance shall be destroyed."

In the verses cited above, the time of each priesthood is called a jubilee; but in verse 10, it is called by the variant metaphor of a week, even though the periods were not equal nor do any of them consist of fifty or of seven years. The fifth week is the reign of Aristobulus 1, 104-103, in which "they shall return to their desolate country, and shall renew the house of the Lord." This can only refer to the establishment of the Essene monastery of Khirbet-Qumran, and the previous desolate sojourn may be a reminiscence of the Damascus exile. Verse 11 refers to the wild excesses of Aristobulus II, and verse 12 simply announces the end of the Hasmonean and the Jewish kingdom.

THE GOD-MAN SAVIOR OF THE ESSENES

In the Habakkuk Commentary, written very soon after the Essene prophet was executed, he is called the Teacher of Righteousness. He is "only a man" at this time!

Later, in The Testament interpolations, however, this Teacher has undergone a vast development; he is now regarded as God incarnate, who, appearing upon earth, had walked humbly among men, who had been slain as an atonement for sinners, and who would return in glory shortly.

Thus, almost by accident the doctrine of the Parousia was devised and engrafted upon mystery soteriology.

Answer for yourself: But could these passages be "prophetic" of Jesus?

NO! The Testament passages which embody this concept could not have been written by a Christian, because the apostolic Church never taught that Jesus was God or that He belonged to the tribe of Levi; it was, however, established among the Essenes that the ultimate judge of mankind would be both.

Let us realize again that the following passages were regarding the Essene Teacher of Righteousness who was expected to return to the Essenes. We read, therefore:

"God hath taken a body and eaten with men and saved men the Lord shall raise up from Levi as it were a High Priest, and from Judah as it were a king, God and Man; He shall save Gentiles and the race of Israel" ("Simeon," III, 9, 11).

Priority belongs to Judah and Levi:

"charge your children that they be united to Levi and Judah. . . . For through their tribes shall God appear dwelling among men on earth" ("Naphtali," II, 24-25).

This priest-king, walking as a man among men, born of Levi and Judah, was the Teacher of Righteousness; but he was also God incarnate:

"And ye shall be set at naught in the dispersion…Until the Most High shall have visited the earth, coming Himself as a man, with men eating and drinking…He shall save Israel and the Gentiles, God speaking in the person of a man" (Asher, 39-41).

Again we read:

"There shall arise unto you the Lord Himself…And ye shall see Him in Jerusalem…But again through your wickedness shall ye provoke Him to anger, and ye shall be cast away by Him unto the time of consummation" ("Zebulon, II, 32-35).

And so we find that "the Lord Himself," who was the Essene Teacher, would be seen by the Jews in Jerusalem. But they would provoke Him to anger by their wickedness and would be cast away until His second coming.

THE MURDER OF THE SAVIOR

And so the god-man savior had appeared in Jerusalem, where he had been murdered by the Jews. The patriarch Levi is made to purge himself of the crimes to be committed by Aristobulus against the Essenes:

"I am clear of all your…transgressions which ye shall do in the end of the ages against the Savior of the world…And ye shall deal lawlessly in Israel, so that Jerusalem shall not endure your wickedness; but the veil of the temple shall be rent, so as not to cover your shame. And ye shall be scattered as captives amongst the heathen, and shall be for a reproach and for a curse, and for trampling under foot" ("Levi," III, 44-47).

And Levi continues:

"And a blessing shall be given thee and to all thy seed, until the Lord shall visit all the heathen in [his] the tender mercies of His Son, even for ever. Nevertheless, thy sons shall lay hands upon Him to crucify Him; and therefore have counsel and understanding been given thee, that thou, mightest instruct thy sons concerning Him, because he that blesseth Him shall be blessed, but they that curse Him shall perish" ("Levi," II, 6-8 [version published in the Ante-Nicene Library).

The words highlighted and underlined here do not occur in the version used by R. H. Charles; and they may constitute a Christian revision in their entirety. The phrase of His Son could not have been Essene, for the cult never believed the Teacher to be the Son of God, but the Lord of Spirits Himself, incarnate! [THINK]. This is a perfect example of Christians later playing with the texts to promote their ideas as make it look as if their ideas had also been those of the Ancients. Such is simply not so!

Should future discoveries reveal the second group of words in bold type to be pre-Christian, we will know that the Teacher of Righteousness was also crucified.

Over and over we read of the crime against this Essene prophet…the Teacher of Righteousness:

"I have learned that at the end of the ages . . . the chief priests . . . shall lay their hands upon the Savior of the World." And again: "A man who reneweth the law, in the power of the Most High, ye shall call a deceiver; and at last ye shall rush upon him to slay him, not knowing his dignity, taking innocent blood through wickedness upon your heads. And your holy places shall be laid waste . . . because of him. And ye shall . . . be among the Gentiles a curse and a dispersion until He Hall again visit you, and in pity receive you through faith and water" ("Benjamin," I, 21).

The Essenes called their revolutionary reconstitution a renewal of the law; but the reigning priesthood called it a deception. The sorrows of the Jews are depicted as a punishment from God because they slew the Teacher, the "man who reneweth the law." In due course, the Christians were to call the razing of Jerusalem a divine retribution upon the Jews for crucifying Jesus.

TIME FOR A LITTLE COMMENTARY

The followers of Jesus would be influenced by this Essene Theology as later the Essenes would drift into the Jesus movement following the crucifixion of Jesus as they would make undeniable parallels following the crucifixion of Jesus. They would see in the "crucified Jesus" their Teacher of Righteousness.

Acts 6:7

7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

These Essene "rejected priests," after applying their hopes and religious ideas to Jesus following his crucifixion, in like manner as had their Teacher of Righteousness, understood that Jesus must have been the Teacher "returned" and possibly they had missed his return. They then entered the synagogue and spread their religious theology and ideas and connected them to Messianic beliefs currently held by both conservative Judaism and the followers of Jesus. We have the first attempt to fuse a Christology of a godman to the human Messiah of Israel. The only thing lacking for the reader is the origin of these god-man ideas which the Essene espoused. Reading of the prior articles in this series, as well as our websites, makes such an origin of these godman ideas very plain. If you have been keeping up then you see the influence of sun-worship within the Essene cult as they evolved since 170 B.C.E. as we saw, not only historically but chronologically in their writings, that they, as a "rejected priesthood," continually moved further and further away from Biblical Judaism because of their rejection of their rightful place as Priests since the days of John Hyrcanus.

Now, let us continue. Of utmost significance is the statement that the slain renewer of the law would return, and that only then could there be salvation for Israel in the Essene-Zoroastrian sacrament of baptism. So here we have the core of the Essene doctrine of their Savior:

- The incarnate god-man
- The dogma of the dual manifestation of the Messiah
- The proclamation of the Parousia or the return of their Savior

What we have just seen are not just the theology the Essenes connected to their crucified Teacher, but the very same three elements which constitute the core of the teachings in the New Testament concerning Jesus, two of which were first devised by the Essenes, who, about 60-50 B.C.E., were in a state of hysterical fervency, awaiting the Second Coming of their Teacher. And it is impossible that the savior here slain could be Jesus, because he is executed by a priest whose priesthood thereupon fails and who is "taken captive." Had the executed prophet been Jesus, it is simply incredible that the role of the Romans could have been ignored nor could he have been called God, or of the tribe of Levi. Furthermore, Caiaphas, Annas, and their confederates neither slew Jesus nor were they punished for their part in his death. They were neither taken captive nor did their office fail, as was the case with Aristobulus II. That the Teacher of Righteousness was judiciously murdered by Jewish priests who were the rulers of an independent state is obvious. Similar as were his execution and that of Jesus in certain fundamentals, it is clear that we are dealing with two separate events. Finally, we know that the whole group of interpolations describing the momentous event was written immediately after 63 B.C.E., because the writer's knowledge of history terminates at that point.

We have already seen, in our studies in the Book of Enoch, that, according to The Book of Enoch, the Messiah was to be known as the Lamb of God. In "Benjamin," the Teacher of Righteousness is identified with this "Lamb of God, and Savior of the world . . . a sinless one" who "shall die for ungodly men in the blood of the covenant'' (“Benjamin,” I, 21). The Christian Church would later adopt precisely the same concepts from the Book of Enoch and the Testaments of the Twelve Partriarchs concerning Jesus: in John 1:29 we read: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Again, we see how the earliest “Christians,” or should I say, the representation of a sect of the earliest followers of Jesus adopted whole-heartedly Essene beliefs about Jesus.

But we need to understand this was a "sect" and not all of Jesus' followers held such Essene beliefs!

What we must never forget is that opposed to such theological beliefs as attached to Jesus was a core conservative Jewish Messianic movement of the original apostles who were the first followers of Jesus who never accepted such “neo-pagan” beliefs about the man from Galilee which they knew best. Since the writings of the New Testament carry their names and since it is made to look as if the “followers” of Jesus believed such high Christology about Jesus, cause the New Testament says so, millions are led astray never knowing the truth that such ideas were never the core beliefs about Jesus as held by John, Peter, Levi, and the others.

The dominance of the Essene theology, along with their vast quantity of writings, would become the very cornerstone for the later “Jesus myths” which read today as if they are the truths held sacred by the Jerusalem Church. Nothing could be further from the truth!

THE APOCALYPTIC PAROUSIA

The "prophecies" in The Testaments concerning the god-man savior who would be slain had already been fulfilled when they were written and served to induce credence for predictions concerning his second manifestation. During the years following Pompey's conquest of Judaea, the Essenes, in their Dead Sea Monastery and their various thiasoi, fervently awaited the return of the Messiah (their Teacher in power, surrounded by thousands of thousands of angels. This Parousia is described in various Testament interpolations made by overzealous “Christians”. There would, as in Paul (I. Thess. 4:16), first be a resurrection of those who shall have died in the faith, as also in Revelation 20:5-6; the kingdom of God would then be established, after which the general resurrection would occur: "Then shall we also rise . . . worshipping the King of heaven, who appeared upon earth in the form of a man in humanity. And as many as believe on Him on earth shall rejoice with Him. Then also shall all men rise, some unto glory and some unto shame. And the Lord shall judge Israel first, for their unrighteousness; for when He appeared as God in the flesh to deliver them, they believed Him not. And then shall He judge all the Gentiles.... And He shall convict Israel through the chosen ones of the Gentiles" (“Benjamin, II, 18-23).

Precisely as Jesus was to do, or made to say by the Essenic influenced writers of the New Testament materials, therefore, the Essenes promised glory to those who accepted their Essene Angel-Messiah before his second manifestation and the Elect from among the Gentiles would judge the children of the promise.

Answer for yourself: Is this not the salvation message of the vast majority of Christian Churches today…believe in the returning godman before he comes?

Answer for yourself: Did you before today know this theological tenant came directly from diluted sun-worship as filtered down through Essene rejection of Biblical faith and their theological adaptation of the death of their Teacher of Righteousness?

Answer for yourself: And all along you though it was from Jesus, right? WRONG!

The Parousia, the dual resurrection, and the Last Judgment of the Essenes are identical to those of the New Testament.

There is a detailed description of the late Hasmonean period, the destruction of the Jewish nation, and the Messianic kingdom ("Judah," IV, 12-31). The prophet declares consolingly that "they who have died in grief shall arise in joy, and they who were poor for the Lord's sake shall be made rich, and they who are put to death for the Lord's sake shall awaken to life" (Ibid., IV, 31).

Let us recall the passage which describes the seven Hasmonean high priests, the enormities under Aristobulus II, and the end of the era ("Levi," V, 1-12). The author then recapitulates Jewish history a second time, and describes briefly the Essene prophet in his first manifestation (Ibid., V, 13-14). at this pain we pass from history to prophecy, from completed fact to the expected fulfillment, which never came to pass:

"he shall execute righteous judgment …and there shall be peace in all the earth.... And in his priesthood the Gentiles shall be enlightened…through the grace of our Lord. In his priesthood shall sin come to an end, and the lawless shall cease to do evil. And he shall open the gates of paradise and…give to the saints to eat from the tree of life…And Belial shall be bound by him, and he shall give power to His children to tread upon evil spirits" (Ibid., V, 14-27).

Since Jesus, for over 2000 years, there has not been peace in all the earth, and for sure the Gentiles have not been enlightened, sin has not ended, and the lawless has sure not ceased to do evil.

The Essene Theology is a Lie! And 2.5 Billions Gentile "Christians" in the world today sadly still believe it!

Thus would the Teacher of Righteousness establish the kingdom of heaven upon earth. The entire concept is parallel to that which Jesus entertained concerning himself, or should I say the writes of the New Testament entertained for him. Immediately upon returning to the earth in power, the Teacher was to conduct the Last Judgment and become the head and ruler of the new kingdom; the Gentiles would be enlightened by him, accept the Essene gospel, and become regenerate; the heavenly mansions would also be opened to the saints, where eternal life would be conferred upon them through the mystical Eucharist of which we have already heard in Zoroastrianism and The Book of Enoch; the Son of Man would bind Satan or Belial and cast him into the everlasting flames; and would give his children power over the evil spirits. as in Mark 16:17.

Here is further proof that the soter or Savior of The Testaments is not Jesus but the Essene Teacher; for the ultimate Zoroastrian Eucharist of Enoch is unknown in the New Testament.

Answer for yourself: Now, knowing this, don't you think it is about time you begin a serious study with Bet Emet Ministries as we recover the truth about Jesus before we meet HaShem face to face? I hope you do. We stand ready to help you in this regard. Blessings……

THE ESSENES: OUR SUMMARY OF OUR ANALYSIS OF THE ESSENE DOCTRINES AND TRADITION

IMPLIED DOCTRINES FOUND WITHIN THE ESSENE WRITINGS

THE RISEN SAVIOR

In the Essene documents at our disposal, we find no "specific" statement that the Teacher had risen from the grave and ascended to heaven; however, the doctrine of his Parousia implies the resurrection of the Teacher of Righteousness!

THE SACRIFICIAL GOD-MAN

We have traced from its source (see the evolution of Essene doctrine in the Enoch articles) the evolution of the central doctrine of Christianity, which is that the savior-god who dies that men may live and become immortal who is himself the eucharistic bread and wine by which this miraculous transformation occurs (eat the god).

Answer for yourself: Now, where did the Essenes and the New Testament derive this concept?

Among the Jews, no one but the Essences practiced this sacrament before the advent of Christianity; and Buddhism, which could have provided the only discernible elements in the Gospel not derived from Essenism, had no soter (SAVIOR) whatever. While they were appropriating so much else from the Pythagoreans about 105 B. C., it is unreasonable to believe that the Essenes should have failed to adopt the heart of the mystery. In some way, they must have identified their food with a concept of the sacrificed deity (began with Osiris).

THE SACRAMENTS

However, the Eucharist among the early Essenes must have been of an impersonal nature; for we can find no evidence that before 63 B. C. they had any specific savior-god; and this would indeed have been conflicting in a cult established upon Jewish tradition. Nothing could be more difficult than to engraft the soter upon Judaism. Before that date, the bread and wine they took so reverently must have been considered primarily as a consecrated gift.

THE NEW SALVATION MESSAGE OF THE ESSENES

The death of the Essene Teacher of Righteousness at Passover when crucified long before Jesus, however, must have effected an almost immediate revolution in their soteriology. We learn specifically that he became in Essene eyes and literature "the Savior of the World . . . the sinless one who shall die for ungodly men in the blood of the covenant." We must remember that in the writings of the Essenes such comments as that above were written about their "Teacher" and was never intended to be prophetic about Jesus; but was only applied to Jesus much later following his crucifixion as well!

To the Essenes their "Teacher" was God, the King of Heaven, appearing in the form of a man, who walked humbly among men and was seen in Jerusalem.

The electrifying effect of this doctrine cannot be overstated:

...for instantly the age-old concepts which had grown up around Osiris-Adonis-Dionysus and the Persian Saoshyant crystallized themselves about this new god man who had also suffered the very fate of his divine predecessors.

There is even a cryptic passage in which a virgin-birth seems attributed to him:

"And I saw that from Judah was born a virgin wearing a linen garment, and from her was born a Lamb, without spot.''

We believe that after the death of the Teacher; the sacramental meal of the Essenes took on a new and more potent symbolism and became for them mystically the blood and the body of their savior-god. He became their heavenly bread and the gift of everlasting life

7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests [the Essenes] were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

Is is these concepts that were also later applied to Jesus as these "Priests" would, following the crucifixion of Jesus, become part of his followers in Palestine.

Answer for yourself: Having studied this far in the website, now can you honestly say such religious doctrines attached to the "Teacher" or later to Jesus were Divine or unique in any way, or do you have to admit that they are nothing more than the replaying of the personifications of solar godmen since time began?

I am not wanting to beat a dead horse, but we must never forget that our worship of the Creator is most important thing in our relationship with Him, and to soil it by our ignorance of such Essene apostasy or imposed deception upon us steals from Him the love He deserves and the worship only He is to receive. Jesus, if alive today, would be appalled at what has been taught in his name!

Shalom.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF A JEWISH MESSIAH TO A CHRISTIAN CHRIST...THE PAGANIZATION OF THE JEWISH MESSIAH

Belief in the coming of the Messiah has always been a fundamental part of Judaism. Thus, for example, Maimonides counts the belief in the Messiah as one of the thirteen cardinal principles of Judaism. It is a concept that is repeated again and again throughout the length and breadth of Jewish literature.

There have been many people in Jewish history who have claimed to be this Messiah. The most famous, of course, was Jesus. His followers therefore gave him the title Christ. Mashiach — the Hebrew word for Messiah —literally means the "anointed." The Greek word for "anointed" is Christos, and thus, Christ is really just another word for Messiah.

Although Christians claim that Jesus was the Messiah of the Jews, there are a number of important differences between the way the Jew looks at the Messiah, and the way the Christian does. It is most important to know these differences.

THE JEWISH MESSIAH

The Jewish concept of the Messiah is that which is clearly developed by the prophets of the Bible. He is a leader of the Jews, strong in wisdom, power and spirit. It is he who will bring complete redemption to the Jewish people, both spiritually and physically. Along with this, he will bring eternal peace, love, prosperity, and moral perfection to the entire world.

The Jewish Messiah is to be a mortal human being born to two mortal parents. He is neither to be a god, nor a man born of supernatural or virgin birth. There is nothing in the Bible that states that the Messiah would be a god or God-like, or that he would be born to a virgin. The concept of the former contradicts the Jewish concept of God being above and beyond taking human form and limitations. Jews believe that only God should be worshipped, not a being of His creation, not even the Messiah himself. Besides, nowhere in the Bible is there any virgins giving birth. This idea is only found in pagan mythology, where virgins often bare offsping of gods. The only purpose of the concept of virgin birth is to attract pagans to Christianity.

The Jewish Messiah is truly human in origin. He is born of ordinary human parents, and is of flesh and blood like all mortals.

As described by the Prophet (Isaiah 11:2), the Messiah is "full of wisdom and understanding, counsel and might, knowledge and the fear of God." He has a special feeling for justice, or, as the Talmud put it (Sanhedrin 93b), he "smells and judges." He can virtually sense a man's innocence or guilt.

The Prophet (Isaiah 11:4*)* goes on to say that the Messiah will "smite the tyrant with the rod of his mouth, and slay the wicked with the breath of his lips." Evil and tyranny will not be able to stand up before the Messiah.

Still, the Messiah is primarily a king of peace. Jewish Sages therefore teach (Derech Eretz Zuta : 1): "When the Messiah is revealed to Israel, he will only open his mouth for peace. It is thus written (Isaiah 52:7), 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger who announces peace.' "

The first task of the Messiah is to redeem Israel from exile and servitude. In doing so, he will also redeem the entire world from evil. Oppression, suffering, war and all forms of godlessness will be abolished. Mankind will thus be perfected, and man's sins against God, as well as his transgression against fellow man, will be eliminated. All forms of warfare and strife between nations will also vanish in the Messianic age.

Most important, the Jewish Messiah will bring all peoples to God. This is expressed most clearly in the Alenu prayer, which concludes all three daily services:

> "May the world be perfected under the kingdom of the Almighty. Let all humans call upon Your Name and turn all the world's evildoers to You. Let everyone on earth know that every knee must bow to You . . . and let them all accept the yoke of Your kingdom."

We find a very similar thought in the High Holy Day Amidah, where we pray, "Let all creatures bow before You. May they form a single band and do Your will with a perfect heart."

The Jewish Messiah will thus have the task of perfecting the world. He will redeem man from servitude, oppression and his own evil. There will be great material prosperity in the world, and man will be restored to an Eden-like existence, where he can enjoy the fruits of the earth without toil.

In the Messianic age, the Jewish people will dwell freely in their land. There will be an "ingathering of the exiles," when all Jews return to Israel. This will eventually bring all nations to acknowledge the God of Israel and accept the truth of His teachings. The Messiah will thus not only be king over Israel, but, in a sense, ruler over all nations.

Ultimately, redemption comes from God alone, and the Messiah is only an instrument in His hands. He is a human being, consisting of flesh and blood like all mortals. He is, however, the finest of the human race, and as such, must be crowned with the highest virtues that mortal man can attain.

Although the Messiah may achieve the upper limit of human perfection, he is still human. The kingdom of the Jewish Messiah is definitely "of this world."

Judaism is a religion based on a people serving God. It is from the Jew that God's teachings emanate to all humanity. The redemption of Israel must therefore precede that of the rest of mankind. Before God redeems the world, He must redeem His oppressed, suffering, exiled and persecuted people, returning them to their own land and restoring their status.

The ultimate promise, however, is not limited to Israel alone. The redemption of the Jew is closely linked to the emancipation of all humanity as well as the destruction of evil and tyranny. It is the first step in man's return to God, where all mankind will be united into a "single band" to fulfill God's purpose. This is the "Kingdom of the Almighty" in the Messianic Age.

Although the Messiah may occupy a central place in this "Kingdom of Heaven," he is still not the primary figure. This position can only belong to God Himself.

This, in brief, is the concept of the Jewish Messiah.

THE CHRISTIAN CHRIST

The primary figure in Christianity is its Messiah. Its very name indicates that Christianity is completely based on the personality of the Messiah. As mentioned in earlier articles, the name "Christ" comes from Christos, the Greek word for Messiah. The Christians are thus those who make the person of the Messiah central to their teachings.

The first major difference between the Jews and the early Christians was that the Christians believed that the Messiah had already come, while the Jews believed that he was yet to come. At first, this was the main point of controversy.

The Jews had one minor objection to the Christian Messiah, and that was the fact that he had been unsuccessful. Judaism had always taught that the Messiah would redeem Israel in a political sense, and Yeshua had failed to accomplish this. Instead, he had been scourged and humiliated like a common rebel, and finally crucified along with two ordinary thieves.

Answer for yourself: How could the career of Yeshua be reconciled with the glorious picture of the Messiah as taught by the Prophets of Israel?

The early Christians faced this dilemma, and, in justifying Yeshua as the Messiah, readily altered the entire concept. These new Messianic ideas were developed in by the writer of the Gospel of John, and even more so in the Epistles of Paul.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF A JEWISH MESSIAH INTO A CHRISTIAN CHRIST

If we look in these sources, we find a gradual transition. The Messiah of the Jew progressively becomes transformed into the Christ of the Christian. This can be traced in a series of logical steps.

- Yeshua was totally unsuccessful in redeeming the Jews politically, and therefore the early Christians could no longer look upon this as the task of the Messiah. His redemption had to be given a new meaning. They therefore taught that his mission was not to redeem man from political oppression, but only to redeem him from spiritual evil.

- Once the Messiah's mission was redefined, it could also be expanded. Political oppression was a special problem of the Jews, but spiritual evil is worldwide. The early Christians therefore began to teach that Yeshua had come to redeem the whole world (universal perspective). They rejected the view that he would come to redeem the Jewish people and their land first, and only then redeem the rest of the world. The Messiah's reign is therefore universal, but only spiritual. The kingdom of Yeshua is thus "not of this world."

- Yeshua had been scourged and humiliated like a common rebel. His followers felt, however, that he had only preached repentance and good works, and therefore could not be a common rebel. They were then faced with an important and difficult question. If Yeshua was the true Messiah, then why did God allow him to undergo such frightful suffering? Why was he subjected to crucifixion, the most painful and shameful death of all? Why did God not save him from all this?

For his followers, there could only be one answer. The fact that Yeshua was scourged, humiliated and crucified had to be the will of God. But still, another question remained. If Yeshua did not sin, what purpose could there be in his suffering and death?

For this, the early Christians found a most ingenious solution. The only answer could be that he suffered and died because of the sins of mankind.

Answer for yourself: But the question was still not completely answered. Had there not been suffering and death before this? Why did Christ himself have to suffer and die? What sin was so great that it required his sacrifice?

- The early Christians answered that this was required to atone for the sin of Adam. All mankind is descended from Adam, and therefore, all inherit his sin. This "original sin" cannot be erased with good works, or even with ordinary human suffering. The only thing that could eliminate it was the death of Yeshua.

The Messiah of the Christians therefore willingly went to a disgraceful and painful death in order that humanity might be redeemed from this "original sin." Mankind is therefore redeemed from evil, sin, suffering, death and the powers of Satan only by the blood of Christ.

Support for this belief was found in the 53rd chapter of Isaiah, where the Prophet speaks of God's suffering servant, who "bore the sin of many." But take special note of what I say next. Such concepts cannot be found in the Jewish Tanakh but only in the altered Greek translations of it! Those who taught such concepts had to look outside the Jewish Bible to find such "twisted Scriptures" that would allow such a belief. Instead of interpreting it to refer to the persecuted people, Israel, the early Christians claimed that it referred to Yeshua (read our articles on Essene corruption of the Jewish Scriptures when they were translated as well as our series on Isaiah 53 for proof of what I say).

Answer for yourself: But still the question remained, how could the career of the Redeemer end in such a shameful death?

The story had to be given a sequel. Such an epilogue was found in another traditional Jewish belief, namely, that of the Resurrection of the Dead. The early Christians therefore taught that Yeshua had risen from the dead, and furthermore, that he was the first one to do so. Therefore Yeshua was not mortal like other men.

- Yeshua' followers could not bring themselves to say that God had forced this suffering and death upon His Messiah. Therefore, they had to say that the will of the Messiah was exactly the same as the will of God, even when it came to his crucifixion. But how could a mere mortal undertake such suffering? The early Christians replied that Yeshua was not a mere mortal. Since his will was so uniquely related to that of God, he had to be related to God in some special way.

- During his lifetime, Yeshua often spoke of God as "my Father in Heaven." For the Jews, this was a common poetic expression, and one that is still used in Jewish prayers. For the pagan gentiles, however, it had a much more literal connotation.

- The Greeks already had legends about men who had been fathered by gods who had visited mortal human women. Legends like these had even sprung up about such eminent men as Plato, Pythagoras, and Alexander the Great. Why should Yeshua be any less? They therefore interpreted his poetic expression quite literally, to mean that he had an actual genetic relationship with God. Yeshua therefore became the "son of God," conceived when the Holy Ghost visited Mary. As the "son of God," Yeshua was not susceptible to sin or even death.

The death of Yeshua was therefore only temporary. The only reason why it was needed at all was to atone for the sin of Adam. His followers taught that Yeshua was resurrected for eternity and ascended to heaven. There he sits at the "right hand of God," even higher that the angels.

This was the first step toward the deification of Yeshua, and it was not very difficult for the pagan world to take the second step. Yeshua was credited with such statements as (John 10:30), "I and the Father are one." He had also spoken of (Matthew 28:19), "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." It was easy for the paganized Christians to identify Yeshua with the "Son."

Yeshua therefore became God-man—one person with two natures. He is God and man at the same time. This is the Essene's Messiah but not the Messiah of the traditional Jews! Christians therefore soon found themselves speaking of Mary as the "mother of God."

- Still, there were many Messianic prophecies that Yeshua had failed to fulfill. The early Christians therefore taught that he would return to the world again in a "second coming." The Day of Judgment will then occur, and Yeshua, having taken his seat at the "right hand of his Father," will judge every man who has ever lived. Those who believed in him will be delivered, while those who did not will be eternally damned to hell.

It is only after this judgment that Satan will be conquered. Evil will then end, sin will vanish, and death will pass away. The powers of darkness will thus be eliminated, and the kingdom of heaven established.

- In this world, meanwhile, all prayer must be addressed to Yeshua. The Christian therefore concludes every prayer "in the name of Yeshua Christ our Lord." In this sense, Yeshua is the mediator between God and man.

This, in essence, is what the early Christians did to the Jewish concept of the Messiah.

The Messiah ceased to be a mere man, and passed beyond the limits of mortality. They taught that man cannot redeem himself from sin, and therefore God, clothed in the form of the Messiah, had to freely shed his own blood to redeem mankind. Since Yeshua did not fulfill the most important Messianic prophecies, they expected him to return to complete this task in a "second coming."

At first, Christians expected that this "second coming" would come very shortly, and prayed that they would see it in their lifetime. When their prayer was not answered, they began to hope that it would come a thousand years after Yeshua' death. This was the millennium or "thousand year kingdom." Finally, after a thousand years passed and Yeshua still had not returned, they postponed his "second coming" to an indefinite time.

We therefore see that the early Christians were forced to radically alter the Jewish concept of the Messiah in order to explain Yeshua' failure. This, compounded with the pagan influence in the early church, gave birth to a Messianic concept totally alien to Judaism.

NO WONDER THE JEWS REJECTED A PAGANIZED MESSIAH

Therefore it is not very difficult to understand why the Jews totally rejected the contentions of Christianity.

First of all, the Jews had a tradition, well supported in the teachings of the Prophets, that the Messiah would bring about major changes in the world. The "spiritual kingdom" did not in any way fulfill these prophecies. The Jews were furthermore unconvinced by the answer of the "second coming" since it was not even hinted at in Biblical literature, but was later written "backwards" into the Gentile Church's New Testament as an attempt to explain the failure of Yeshua to manifest himself as the Messiah of the Jewish Bible.

Thus, first of all, the Jew found absolutely no evidence to support Yeshua' claim to having been the Messiah. On the other hand, Yeshua's lack of success in his ministry appeared to repudiate it and the failure of the Hebrew Scriptures and the true Messianic prophecies to be fulfilled stand today as fact to the lack of appearance of the Jewish Messiah.

Even more important, however, was the fact that the Christians had logically developed their belief in Yeshua in such a manner that they radically altered many of the most basic Jewish beliefs. This goes unnoticed today by most Christians because they have never read a Hebrew Bible and compared the altered Messianic passages when compared with their Greek and English Versions. We have a completely different theology surrounding the Christian Messiah and the Jewish Messiah and do not know it. Even such a basic concept as God's unity was threatened by their teachings. Even if the evidence of Yeshua's Messiahship was more concrete, its logical consequences would have to be rejected.

THE ALTERATION OF G-D'S WORD AS CONTAINED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT...AN ATTEMPT TO TRY TO SUBSTANTIATE CHRISTIAN BELIEFS THAT OPPOSED WHAT THE PROPHETS TAUGHT

The early Christians tried to justify their contention by finding hints of it in the Jewish scriptures. They went over the entire Bible with a fine tooth comb, looking for any evidence, however flimsy, to prove that Yeshua was the Messiah, and that their entire logical structure was in accord with ancient Jewish teachings. In many cases, they were not above using verses out of context, changing texts, and even purposely mistranslating and misquoting them or even inventing Scriptures to suit their theology, in order to prove their point and their "unique" interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. These aberrations of the Hebrew Scriptures find their way into our New Testaments and distort the truth concerning Yeshua. One today would call such actions by this group a "cult." One needs no further evidence than the fact that most modern Christian Bible scholars totally reject almost all the "proofs" of the early Christians. Indeed, some of the best refutations of these "proofs" may be found in contemporary Christian Bible commentaries let alone our websites.

Most important, Christianity tried to set itself up as the new "Israel," and looked upon the Jews as utterly rejected by God. It therefore taught that Judaism was a corrupt and dying religion, with little hope of growth or success.

The Jews, on the other hand, did much more than argue this point with words. They refuted it by embarking upon one of the most creative periods in their history. The entire scope of Talmudic literature was developed essentially during early post-Christian times.

Thus, to the Jews, the strongest refutation of Christianity was the fact that Judaism itself remained alive and vital. The Jew has found that he can both exist and flourish without accepting Christian beliefs. He believes that the Messiah is yet to come, and that at that time, the truth will become known and the Jew will be justified before all the world. To this I concur wholeheartedly. Shalom

JESUS AND THE ESSENES

THE EARLIEST HYPOTHESES

It may be interesting to note that the Essene-Christian relationship has long fascinated New Testament scholars, among whom several Germans developed intriguing rationalist theories. Bahrdt, 1784-1792, Venturini, 1800, Gforer, 1831-38, Hennel, 1840, and van der Alm, 1863, published disquisitions in which Jesus was represented as trained or controlled by the Essenes, who, in several of the hypotheses, staged his crucifixion with or without the co-operation of the Romans, revived him after the ordeal, and so created the myth that he had risen from the grave.

About 1830, Thomas de Quincey wrote an essays in which he contends that no such group as Essenes ever existed, that Josephus merely mistook the Christians— whom he never mentions even once!—for these strange persons, who were certainly not then known by that name. He argues that to assume the prior existence of a large and tightly organized group of men with teachings identical to those of the Christians would be a deadly offense against the faith: "If the Essenes were not the early Christians in disguise, then was Christianity, as a knowledge, taught independently of Christ; nay, in opposition to Christ" (Coleridge, Works, VIII, p. 136), which, he implies, is impossible and therefore a blasphemous opinion.

The significant fact is that all these and many others recognized the substantial identity of Essenism with the theology of the New Testament long before the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Since 1947, more realistic theories have appeared. Mr. Dupont-Sommer declares: "The Galilean Master, as he is represented to us in the writings of the New Testament, appears in many respects as an astonishing reincarnation of the Master of Justice" (The Dead Sea Scrolls, p. 99). Mr. Edmund Wilson says, concerning the monastery at Kirbet-Qumran: "this structure that endures, between the bitter waters and precipitous cliffs, with its oven and its inkwell, its mill and its cesspool, its constellations of sacred fonts and unadorned graves of its dead, is perhaps, more than Bethlehem or Nazareth, the cradle of Christianity" (The Scrolls from the Dead Sea, pp. 97-98).

JESUS NOT ENDORSED BY THE ESSENES

In spite of the detailed parallelism existing between Essenism and the New Testament's depiction of Jesus, it would be a serious error to believe that he could have been a commissioned spokesman for the Order, a mistake which various German scholars made for his divergencies were quite drastic. The revelation of himself as the Messiah without the evidence of the fulfilled prophecies would necessarily have been a monstrous blasphemy in Essene eyes, probably as much as in Pharisaic. Understand despite what is recoreded in the New Testament which are grossly mistranslated and misquoated passages from the forged Greek texts of the Hebrew Scriptures the true and expected Messianic Prophecies given to the Hebrew peoples were not fulfilled by Jesus. And the greatest treason of all would have consisted in the simple publication of their esoteric doctrines, and the application of them to himself. Jesus never did this;

however it has been done by some of his followers following his death and the Christian Church will come along and accept these solar/astral doctrines as apply to Jesus as their "cosmic godman."

BUDDHIST ELEMENTS TO THE TEACHINGS OF JESUS

And beyond all this we must note again that certain elements in the Gospel are Buddhist and not Essene-Pythagorean at all, of which the most important was the substitution of a form of communism for the self-dependent community. We know that Asia Minor teemed with Buddhist proselytizers in the first century; and that almost no one could have been immune from their propaganda. We know also that the Pythagorean societies differed from the Buddhist primarily in that the former were organizations of working and self-reliant communists while the latter, living in idleness, depended upon gifts and beggary. The Buddhists therefore emphasized the importance of charity, of giving to the poor, whose rights and virtues they always proclaimed. In all this, the New Testament Jesus is far more Buddhist than Essene.

Once we admit that this element in the Gospel is Buddhist, other problems are also solved. Whereas the Essenes were a secret order with a tightly knit membership, regimented into classes, who imparted their doctrines to initiates only after prolonged discipline, the Buddhists broadcast theirs to all who would listen: and they offered to heal the sick, the halt, the lame, and the blind, and to establish a universal kingdom in which private wealth, poverty, and exploitation would be abolished forever. Christians, like Buddhists, had no barriers to membership, no oaths, no novitiates, no distinct orders among themselves, and no rule against divulging their doctrines. In all this also the New Testament was patterned upon Buddhist rather than Essene antecedents.

However, it is also indisputable that the Gospel, by and large, is not Buddhist, but Essene; that many aspects of Buddhism were present in Pythagoreanism from the beginning and could thus have been transmitted to the Essenes indirectly; and that, finally, many elements are therefore common to Buddhism, Pythagoreanism, Essenism, and the New Testament such as communism, rejection of marriage and family, and the glorification of personal poverty.

A REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT

We must realize that Essenism as well as the New Testament belong among those movements of social revolt which have agitated mankind some three thousand years, the appeal of which has been to the poor and the unsuccessful and which were designed to ameliorate the sufferings of, and supply consolation to, the exploited and the downtrodden. Their ultimate source was Buddhism, which sanctified idleness and mendicancy as the holy pathway to Nirvana, and which renounced labor, property, sex, and family as the only practical means by which to escape the frustration of unrequited toil. All such movements tend to repudiate the nationalist ideal in favor of a classless, international communion of the poor and the exploited. The philosophy proclaimed by Gautama, however, was so altered by the Pythagoreans as to make themselves self-supporting; but they still refused to surrender any of their labor to parents, brothers, sisters, wives, children, or relatives, and very little, if any, to the state. Such movements have always been distinguished by a fervently proclaimed brotherhood among the oppressed and a violent hatred for the wealthy and the powerful.

ESSENE DOCTRINES PARALLEL WITH CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES TODAY

Bet Emet Ministries has in prior articles abundantly demonstrated that The Book of Enoch, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and other Essene documents written before or immediately after the death of the last Teacher contain a whole galaxy of concepts central to the Synoptics Gospels as applied to Jesus.

Among these we may list:

- the doctrines of everlasting torture in hell for the damned and eternal bliss in heaven for the saints, a dogma previously unknown in that precise form;
- the doctrine of the Last Judgment;
- the concept of the god-man prophet who appears as a man in the flesh, who has been resurrected from the grave, and who combines the functions of the Greek soter/Savior with those of the Persian Saoshyant;
- the concept of the Son of Man as the universal Messiah of Moral Judgment;
- the conviction that the possession of property is incompatible with righteousness;
- the certainty that those who seek material wealth or who profit by the labor of others must spend eternity in hell fire;
- the persuasion that only by practicing communal brotherhood on earth is it possible for human beings to achieve eternal salvation;
- the principle of non-violence even under the most extreme provocation since we know that sinners will be punished amply in the hereafter;
- the teaching that the righteous will come into possession of the lands and houses of the wicked when these are dragged away to the everlasting flames,
- and the belief that the kingdom of the saints is to be established in a renewed and renovated earthly and heavenly kingdom by the savior at his second and imminent appearance.

Before 63 B.C.E., the Essenes had no savior-god; but the execution of their most celebrated Teacher, as demonstrated in prior articles, provided them with this crucial necessity, precisely as the crucifixion of Jesus served the same purpose in the Christian Church. After 60 B.C.E. therefore, the Essenes projected their second basic and original doctrine which would later reappear in the Gospels and writings of the New Testament: that of the incarnate god-man who dies sacrificially for the sins of the world, is resurrected from the dead, ascends to heaven, where he sits at the right hand of God, whence he is to return in a final parousia to judge the quick and the dead and establish the kingdom of heaven.

WORLD SIGNIFICANCE

The importance of the Essenes in the history of the occident can scarcely be overstated. Had they never existed, there would have been no Christianity and therefore no Catholic Church. In that event one of the rationalistic, scientific, and exclusive cults of Persia would have become dominant in the Graeco-Roman world: possibly Mithraism, but much more probably Manichaeism. Many scholars contend and are convinced that had either of these defeated all its rivals, Greek enlightenment would have prevailed after a bitter struggle and the civilization of the ensuing centuries as well as the life of every human being in the western world would have been totally different from what it has been during the last sixteen hundred years.

BET EMET'S POSITION

Our conclusions after examining the existinge evidences concerning Jesus, is, then, that he had for some years been a member of the Essene community, but had developed serious doubts concerning the validity of its Judaic discipline, and, even more significantly, had become convinced that he, instead of the long overdue Teacher, was the true incarnate Messiah in his human manifestation. During this period of reorientation, he may well have come under the influence of a Buddhist proselytizer, from whom he could have adopted the missionary methods of Gautama. But since he had no following and probably no preeminence among the Essenes, he could not possibly reorganize the Community, which had become thoroughly fixed in its doctrines. His only alternative was, therefore, either to live and die in complete obscurity as an obedient member of the Order, or, combining the Essene synthesis with certain Buddhist concepts, to go forth as an individual, broadcasting the seditious tenets of the sect, proclaiming the acceptable year of the Lord, and hinting broadly that he was himself the Messiah and that God was uniquely working through him. In doing this, he would, of course, be repudiated by the Order; he would place his life in constant jeopardy, and his very survival from day to day would depend upon the utmost caution. In any event, he could not long continue in such a perilous undertaking. We believe, as do many scholars today, that he consciously re-created or decided to mimick the career of the Teacher of Righteousness and pursued by design a course of action which would lead inevitably to his sacrificial and spectacular death as an atonement for the sins of mankind, persuaded that in this way but in no other could he establish the kingdom of heaven. Prior to the time of Jesus, and since the time of the Maccabees, the martyrdom of Jewish heroes of the faith has been given spectacular meaning and many had ascribed even atonement to the death of Jewish martyrs (although a minority at best). It would be only after Jesus' death that the Essene community, who disagreed with some of Jesus' teachings, would recognize in Jesus' crucifixion the re-playing of the prior death of the beloved Teacher. It is at this time, only after Jesus' crucifixion, were such parallels made by these Essenes and then we find a wide movement of conversion to the Jesus movement by the Essenes

7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests [the Essenes] were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

Once dead, many teachings were ascribed to Jesus. Today we find a complex mix of often competing and contradicting teachings which have been put into the mouth of Jesus as seen on the pages of the New Testament. Oral traditions from this sect and that sect began to abound and many later found their way into established and cherished teachings about Jesus today. Some are simply untrue. In fact, when one examines the New Testament having this understanding from the varied sources that exist, it is easy to see within the New Testament a closely-knit synthesis of already-established pagan doctrine. It would be only a short time, under the influence of the Gentile church, that these pagan doctrines, not espoused but yet credited to Jesus, began to take hold; simply said, Jesus is made to repudiate Judaism (hand washing problem, healing or eating grain on sabbath where Jewish leaders object to Jesus' behavior...yet there was never a problem in Judaism with these actions when one studies he sees this but yet Jesus was made to be at "odds" with Judaism and its spiritual leaders...thus rejection of Jesus and Jesus rejection of Judaism, etc.).

History shows us that Jesus possessed an immense advantage among the Greeks over his predecessor, the Essene Teacher; through Jesus' absorption of Buddhist techniques and appeal, he laid the foundations for a mass-movement. And when a few zealous missionaries began proclaiming the Risen Christ, Jesus' teachings and his Gospel spread like wildfire in the Graeco-Roman world, which, having tired of the mystery religions, was ready for a message that elevated the soul of man. The rest is history.

THE JEWISH LEGEND OF PANDERA AND YESHU

Throughout the middle ages, the legend of Pandera and Yeshu, considered by most scholars a Jewish invention, continued to persist. The tale, however, is extremely ancient, for it was known, long before the Christians had the power to persecute, to the Greek Neo-Platonist Celsus, who flourished 175-180. Origen, 185-254, quotes the Greek as having said, concerning the mother of Jesus, that "when she was pregnant she was turned out of doors by the carpenter to whom she had been betrothed, as having been guilty of adultery, and that she bore a child to a certain soldier named Panthera" (Contra Celsum, VII, ix).

Knowledge now available concerning the Teacher of Righteousness has thrown an entirely new light on this Pandera-legend, which is related in detail by Morris Goldstein and which, in brief, runs as follows (Jesus in Jewish Tradition, pp. 148-154):

There lived in the days of King Jannaeus, 103-76 B.C.E., in Bethlehem, a certain disreputable young man whose name was Joseph Pandera. He seduced the chaste and lovely Miriam by pretending to be her betrothed husband, Johanan; and the result was a son, Yeshoshua, or Yeshu. When it became known that Yeshu was illegitimate, he fled to Galilee, where he practiced magic by learning the letters of the Ineffable Name and where he declared that he was born miraculously of a virgin, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, 7: 14. Yeshu, thereupon, declared himself the Messiah, and produced various texts from the prophets, which he said applied to him. The Jewish sages then brought Yeshu before Queen Helene (probably the wife of Aristobulus II) and accused him of sorcery. A corpse was brought in, and when Yeshu restored it to life, the queen became his devotee. The sages now selected a man called Judah Iskarito and taught him also the letters of the Ineffable Name, by which he too could practice magic. In a trial before the queen, both Yeshu and Iskarito lost their memory of the Name and fell down powerless.

Yeshu was now seized and beaten, was given vinegar to drink, and a crown of thorns was placed upon his head at Tiberias. There was a struggle among the people, and Yeshu escaped with some of his fellow-conspirators to Antioch or Egypt, where they remained until the Passover, at which time Yeshu went to Jerusalem to relearn the letters of the Ineffable Name in the Temple. Riding into Jerusalem on an ass, he fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah. Identified by Iskarito as the false prophet, Yeshu was seized, and put to death on the eve of the Passover Sabbath. If Yeshu was born near the beginning of Alexander Jannaeus' reign, he would have been in his thirties at the time of his execution.

The bold followers of Yeshu now came to Queen Helene with the report that he was not in his tomb, but had ascended to heaven as he had prophesied. Since his body could not be found, she demanded of the sages that they produce it within three days. It so happened, however, that the gardener, foreseeing conspiracies by the followers of Yeshu, had taken the body from the tomb and buried it in the garden; and when he learned of the queen's ultimatum, he told the sages where it lay. They seized it, tied it to the tail of a horse, and dragged it before Helene, who thereupon renounced the false prophet, commended the sages for their wisdom, and derided those who had been deluded by the sorcerer.

The story concludes with a resume of how the followers of Yeshu sought to overthrow Judaism by re-dating their feast days and their holy celebrations and by repudiating their rituals and their dietary laws; and how they caused a great commotion among the Jews for thirty years by declaring that their prophet was now sitting at the right hand of God and would return as the almighty Messiah to condemn all unbelievers to the eternal fires of hell.

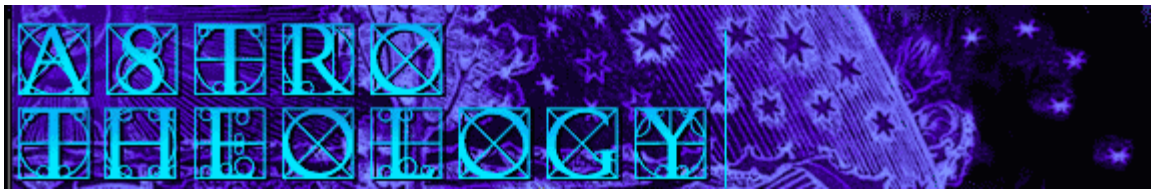
IS THE JEWISH ACCOUNT ABOUT JESUS OR THE TEACHER OF RIGHTEOUSNESS?

This ancient legend prompts theories which, to say the least, are quite fascinating. We know that the Essenes made a fundamental issue over their divergent calendar (adopted the solar over the lunar calendar of Israel), which placed their feasts and celebrations on days other than those observed by the orthodox; and we have seen that it was a dispute over this which precipitated the trial and execution of the Teacher. This squares with the Pandera story but could have no reference to Jesus.



There are other reasons for believing this an authentic tradition concerning the Teacher rather than of Jesus: for we are told that the "bold" followers of Yeshu came to Queen Helene declaring that he had ascended to heaven; this was an act quite understandable on the part of well established Essenes whose leader had already been accepted by the reigning queen, but quite impossible for the cowering disciples of Jesus, who had not the slightest expectation of any resurrection and who had gone into concealment to hide their terrible humiliation.

Even more decisive is the fact that the Romans are totally absent from the traditions concerning both Yeshu and the Teacher. And certainly there was no Queen Helene in the days of Pontius Pilate. Furthermore, the thirty year commotion caused by the followers of Yeshu is entirely agreeable with The Testament interpolations. Faced with evidence, one must conclude, therefore, that the Pandera-story was the popular-orthodox Jewish version of the life and death of the Essene prophet and Teacher of Righteousness and had nothing to do with Jesus. If their careers seem parallel in tradition, this fact stems from their historical similarity. The Christian Judas Iscariot was perhaps a purely ideological re-creation of an historical namesake. We consider it likely that Jesus designed his course of action so that he would die in Jerusalem at the time of the Passover, not only because great crowds would be present, but also because the Teacher had died there during that festival; and that he rode into Jerusalem on an ass partly for the same reason. Even the gardener appears in the fourth canonical Gospel in an enigmatic role. And who can fail to notice the similarity of the empty tombs! Finally, it is entirely possible that a virgin-birth was attributed to Jesus in the second century, partly because this too was an element of the Yeshu-story.

I NEED TO PREPARE YOU FOR WHAT YOU STUDY NEXT

Now we come to a most fascinating study as it relates to the Essenes; namely Astro-Theology. This might be a new term for most but simply said Astro-Theology will entail for us the study of much of today's Judeo-Christian religious theology and beliefs because their origins we will come to find had beginnings in the ancient's observations of the the cycles and patterns of objects seen in the Heavens; the Stars, the path of the Sun as well as the Constellations and their influence upon Mother Nature as well as Mankind (his behavior and his beliefs about God). It might be hard to fathom right now but most of our beliefs about God as Christians have come from observations of the Heavens and their influence upon nature. What we find when doing such an exhaustive study is that the very core religious doctrines of the Essenes and later Christianity which they so heavily influenced by them find their true origin in Astro-Theology whereby personification of forces and events observed in the Heavens became legends and myths later applied to men (either real or fictitious).

The next statement is most important so please pay close attention.

These myths and legends, originally intended to be understood only allegorically and metaphorically as they expressed Divine truths, over time tragically become LITERALIZED and in so doing what was to be understood as general Divine truths of the Universe as God's untainted message to mankind becomes later personified into a host of religious doctrines which come to be applied to men as if literal (pagan godmen and goddesses - even Jesus for that matter). What concerns us as Christians and followers of Jesus is that these allegories, metaphors, and myths become LITERALIZED as applied by these many world religions to their cosmic "saviors" and a pattern is created which finds expression by the Essenes later in the lives of their Teacher of Righteousness and even later to Jesus. Of concern and focus for us in this website will primarily be these Essenes as they applied these solar myths and legends literally to their Teacher of Righteousness following his crucifixion and some 180 years later to Jesus following his crucifixion as well (Acts 6:7). Coupled with this is the forgery of the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures by these same Essenes in Alexandria, Egypt, as well as elsewhere (Qumran), whereby these allegories and myths are written into the Greek translations of the Hebrew Scriptures by these same Essenes to bolster their unique "theology" and such forged religious concepts end up over time being applied to a man named Jesus of Galilee. We end up with a Essene invention and tragic departure from the Hebrew Scriptures in our Christian Bibles which, upon study in such areas, can be seen to be full of such purposely forged translations and misapplications of Hebrew Scripture.

and pure Scriptural invention when compared with the true Hebrew Scriptures and the Hebrew Bible and we never know it. The Essenes basically write their own "Bible" that incorporates their own rather "unique" theology concerning their "cosmic redeemer/angel-messiah" into their own Bible which tells their religious opponents in Alexandria, Egypt, that "they win theologically" and enforce their own brand of religious doctrine upon the Greek speaking world through the spread of these Greek translations of the Hebrew Scriptures. Sadly today few know of this let alone know of the need to study such departures from tradition Biblical Judaism which we find in the Christian faith.

Now we can know these things and no longer be taught lies and idolatry in the name of God as Christians and followers of Jesus. Following is:

- First a detailed study of Astro-Theology and the Myths associated with it
- Second a detailed expose of the Essene's forgery and alteration of the Hebrew Bible when translated into the Greek where we take notice of the inclusion of such Astro-Theology into the Greek translation of the Bible at the hands of these Essenes along with the later influence upon both the Christian's Old and New Testaments and the theology surrounding Jesus as these concepts find their way into our English Bibles today.

When you come to see these Heavenly observations of the Sun, planets, and stars and their influence upon Mother Nature for what they really are (intended only as allegory and metaphors expressing Divine truth and never meant to be literalized) and then follow their inclusion into the religious documents of the Essenes and later Christian Bibles as they are personified and applied to men who become cosmic godmen then you will be startled at what you see let alone realize what you have accepted as Divine truth concerning the Jesus of the New Testament. This information is offered by Bet Emet Ministries in the hope that such education will lead to repentance in one's life whereby he casts out the leaven of such idolatrous teachings which we accept without question. The Essenes were apostate Hellenized Jews; let us never forget this since this explains their departure from Normative Judaism.

In closing there is a lot to learn but as you read and re-read these concepts will become clearer to you and your understanding will flourish as you see the creation and evolution of the Cosmic godman that these Essenes accepted and taught (the chronology of the evolution of the cosmic godman in the Book of Enoch is astounding). Likewise you will see that such Essene and New Testament concepts that were made to apply to Jesus all came originally from the observations of the stars!!!

EGYPT GETS A BUM RAP IT DOES NOT DESERVE

We find upon study that it all began with the Egyptians and we find such understanding of the Heavens as the Egyptians understood it as taught in their myths concerning Osiris and the Constellation Orion as well as others. At first sight you might be taken to label all of Egyptian religion and religious beliefs as polytheism and idolatry as others do. But I caution you that when you begin your own study of Egyptian Religion you will be amazed at what you see:

- The Egyptians were the first monotheists and believed in ONLY ONE True God
- The Patriarchs we find in Genesis were actually Egyptian Pharaohs
- Their host of gods and goddesses, represented in different figures, are nothing more than allegories and metaphors for the different attributes, functions, and actions of the One True God
- The Egyptians observed the God of the Heavens, Nature, and Mankind; and in so doing understood His Divine Order (Ma'at) and God's Divine Mandate this Divine Order "Above" was to be reproduced "Below" on Earth
- This Divine Order was captured for Eternity by Egyptian Priests in various myths and legends and allegories found in Egyptian religious writings where they are only to be understood as "pictures" of Divine Truth..never to be taken literally as we have many doing today

- This Divine Order was best understood and reproduced by adhering to and observing these Divine Laws of Order; thus they had their own "Torah" and were a Law-Centered people since to them God's Laws were the ordering principles of the Universe and the pattern for the World and Society
- Egypt was consumed with the after life and ordered their lives according to God's Laws here on earth to ensure that when they die they go to Heaven.

One more word about the corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures where by such "literalization" of many of these Egyptian myths have been inserted into the Greek translation of the Hebrew passages. In order to make accurate comparisons of the Hebrew Scriptures which are devoid of this cosmic godman of the Essenes and trace the theological evolution of the Essene "Godman concept" it is necessary to acquaint ourselves with the fundamental tenants of such "Astro-Theology" and beliefs in order to recognize them when we encounter them and read them in our Christian Old Testaments and New Testaments. Only when you have become familiar with each individual religious tenant connected with the "Cosmic Godman Redeemer" and how such "beliefs" began from the observations of the Heavens can one fully understand and recognize them accurately as they were later literalized and applied and written about Jesus in the New Testament. This is not an easy nor a quick study but if you want to understand where the many stories and religious doctrines connected with Jesus in the New Testament found their origin then we have to begin at the beginning. To the Heavens we not turn our attention.

EGYPTIAN RELIGION AND ITS REALTIONSHIP TO JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY

"A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change"...Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

We have all heard that "all roads lead to Rome" but in reality all roads lead to Egypt. This is especially true when one studies Christianity and Judaism and finds that these sister-faiths are nothing more than evolutionary developments of the Egyptian Religion. Understand from the beginning that Judaism is a much more faithful picture of this Planet's original understanding of the Divine than Christianity. As a Pastor I am amazed where my studies have taken me and the things I have learned over these last twenty years in my pursuit of Jewish Roots of the Christian Faith. Never did I expect to find what I have uncovered and consider myself fortunate to live in an age where archeology and other such disciplines are giving back to mankind what Rome destroyed, covered up, and took from us over the last two thousand years. The study of error is often a litttle less important than the study of truth. The history of the human mind, in its progress from ignorance towards knowledge should tell us the mistakes into which it has sometimes wandered, as well as its steps in the right path. This is the goal of this website: to re-examine Gentile Chrisianity as to its earliest roots and determine if what is considered "Christian orthodoxy" today is a faithful representation of the earliest understading of God by the Ancients since it is they who coined the religious concepts which we are told that we adhere to today in the primarily Christian Western Hemisphere.

When Christians shall at length acknowledge that many of their Religions doctrines, which together now make up this Christian orthodoxy, or the religion of the majority, as distinguised from the simple religion which Jesus/Yeshua taught and practiced; when they shall acknowledge that many of them are so many sad and lamentable errors; then, and not till then, will they seek to know their origin, and enquire from which of the several branches of Paganism they sprung. They will then see that most of the so-called Christian doctrines, that have no place in the New Testament, reached Europe from Egypt, through Alexandria. To elaborate a little more fully and in summary fashion: when allegory, metaphor, simile, and myth which expressed both the identity and actions of the Creator as understood by the Ancients in grasping for understanding of God and His workings in the Cosmos, was altered and stripped of its symbolism and rendered for all time as if "literal," then not only is Divine Truth lost forever but it plunges its recipients into abject idolatry. Such is the plight of the primarily Christian Western Hemisphere as these allegories and metaphors that once expressed Divine Truth were altered by Rome and "literalized" and applied to men's lives; in this case Jesus.

All nations borrow from others; at least, from those who are before them in the race of civilization. They borrow from each of their neighbors in those branches of knowledge in which they think they can do so wisely, and what they have taken often shows itself in the language. I can remember my amazement when I discovered that the Hebrew word "Yahweh" finds its origin in Egypt; taken from one of the names for the sons of Putah (one of the many Names given the Creator). This is only the beginning of knowledge and what you can learn if your studies progress far and deep enought to look at Egypt as the source for Judaism and Christiaity. Sadly much of the beauty of this first Divine Revelation given to mankind through Egypt by the Creator is altered almost beyond recognition by Alexandrian Essenes and later Rome as we find in the Christain faith today which is but at best a blurred photograph of the earliest understanding of God on this planet by those who knew Him best. The aim of Bet Emet Ministries and our websites is to show the extraordinary readiness with which these earliest religious beliefs and understanding of God were copied by neighboring nations and then altered, particularly by the Greeks and Romans. In matters of religion, the more ignorant part of those two nations bowed in reverence to the greater earnestness and seriousness of the Egyptians, who were at the same time so remarbably rich in understanding of the Divine and His message to them as seen in operation of His Divine Law in Heaven above, Divine Law operating in Nature all around, and these same Divine Laws operating in their own bodies as well. Egypt understood these Laws of the Divine as the recurrent message of the God of all creation speaking Order to them through Law and understood their responsibility to manifest that order in their lives since being created in the image of the only God they could see who operated these same Laws in their own species.

Pagan Greece received from Egypt all that part of its religion which related to a future state of rewards and punishments, yet Chrisian Rome, from which our religious belief systems were chiefly learned in this Western Hemisphere, would take and alter almost beyond recognition the simple Divine message of the Creator given orignally to Egypt; allegory and metaphor became "literal" and coupled with that was an exclusive religious belief system imposed by Rome upon all promised damnation if one failed to accept Roman Orthodoxy.

The children of Egypt, the Jewish people and nation, have protected and safeguared this same Divine message in the absence of their Egyptian parents since their destruction and Hellinization by Alexander the Great, but Rome in conquering Greece and owing to their own Sun Worship only further removed us understanding this earliest message of the Divine entrusted to Egypt. Egypt today gets a bad rap by those who misunderstand its religion and many lacking such knowlege interpret Egyptian faith as idolatrous Sun Worship in its own right. Nothing could be further from the truth once you look into it for yourself and remember that allegory, myth, simile, and metaphor was only used to communicate these Divine Truths and NEVER was it to be understood in a "literal" sense.

Almost all Egyptologists interpreted, and continue to interpret, the ancient Egyptian writings and other modes of expression (art, architecture, ...etc.) without trying to understand the thoughts and beliefs expressed in them. Their explanations continue to be shallow, which reflects their pre-conceived notions of the ancient Egyptians, as being primitive and inferior to the modern western world.

However, the Greek historian Herodotus (500 B.C.) stated:

Of all the nations of the world, the Egyptians are the happiest, healthiest and most religious.

His statement reflects the excellent conditions of people who didn't just theorize about metaphysics, but who practiced it to the fullest. Ancient Egyptians had a very sophisticated understanding of metaphysics and the laws which govern man and his universe.

The Egyptian thinking was simple, coherent, consistent, logical, analytical and rational. Their main premise that one is all, and all is one, reflects their total cosmic consciousness, which Herodotus called most religious. Egyptians did not have a word for religion in their language. For them, there was no perceived difference between sacred and mundane. They understood that man is a model of the universe. If man understands himself perfectly, he also understands the universe: astronomy, astrology, geography, rhythm, proportion, mathematics, magic, medicine, anatomy, art - all are linked in a grand dynamic scheme. No aspect can be isolated from another and treated as a separate specialty or field without distortion and destruction. You should find it rather interesting that this concept is embodied within Biblical Judaism but not Christianity.

Our societies which deal with the different aspects of life, separately, are on the wrong track of thinking. We are always in awe of the mastery of the ancient Egyptians. In many ways, we feel that we are catching up to their achievements, in science, medicine, astronomy, etc. When Kepler discovered his planetary laws he boasted in print, that he had rediscovered the lost laws of Egypt.

It is our hope in presenting this new website, and most likely our last, we arrive at the culmination of twenty years of study. All roads lead to Egypt as you will see and it this is an exciting time of "rediscovery" of long lost Divine Truth that helps us in our understanding of Whom God is and What His message originally was to this Planet. The Egptian race has ceased to be a leading nation and its history has been neglected, and its very essencs forgotten or misunderstood at best. Yet the Egptian mind still has a most important influence upon our modern civilization and we fail to understand or recognize it. The shadow of Egyptian truth can be found today in Biblical and Rabbinical Judaism and to a lesser extent in Christianity and this will become very apparent if you study this website and the knowledge that it contains.

In prepartion for what will follow I would like to say that a quest into the fountainhead of modern man's religious beliefs and practices inevitably leads back BEFORE the path of the Judaic-Christian heritage and the Greek classic tradition, to the very dawn of civilization. Myths, symbols, and ideas cherished as our own in this primarily Christian nation will be found to have been fashioned many thousands of years ago by cultures sometimes labeled as primitive, crude, heathen or even pagan by Roman Christianity. I will let you decide once you see such evidence if such labels are correct. Ancient Egypt, often called the cradle of manind, represents a terminal point in this search for the origin of modern concepts. This ancient civilization, perhaps more than any other, can supply us with the clues to as understanding of many of the beiefs which have found their way into modern times. Much like the ageless pyramids, ancient Egptian thought has withstood the assault of the ages and, merged with elements of other cultures, becomes absorbed by the mainstream of Western thought.

For the Christian more than the Jew, who is closer to this original thought and understanding of the Divine and God, this can be the most important study of one's life. The Egptians, the parents of the Judaic-Christian faiths, were essentially a religious people. Their religion was composed of elements uniquely Egyptian, and those it shared with others ancient religions. But amazingly, ancient Egypt was familiar with such relatively modern concepts as the Big Bang, Immortality of the Soul, the Last Judgment, Messiah, Ressurection of the Dead, Hades, Heaven, the Unity of God, Prayer, Sacrifices, Logos, Millennium, Sabbath, Circumcision, Immersion, and the Supper with God. These religious concepts have been tragically altered down through history from their original meanings as understood by those who first received them from God and left such teaching for mankind throughout history in their writings. It would do us good to understand these religious concepts that the ancients received from God and compare them to the meanings of these same things and dogmas we as Christains and followers of Jesus have inherited down through time with the suceeding conqering nations culminating with Rome to see if these dogmas contain the same ideas of their founders or if they differ appreciably and ask ourselves: "If so, then why?" This is for you to decide upon examining the evidence if we as Christians and followers of the "Christ" are really following in the concpets of God as the Ancients knew him and recorded His works or if we are following the agendas of men who various reasons departed from these earliest understandings of God.

It is my hope to not over complicate this for our readers as I try to construct the ancient past. I will endeavor to present this information in an unbiased manner as possible as we draw together on the facts concerning the ancient Egpytian religion. I will point to the parallels between ancient Egyptian beliefs on the one hand, and the Christian, Hebrew, Buddhist, and Islamic thoughts on the other. By relating ancient Egyptian civilization to modern Western thought, I hope to supply important keys to the reader to help in his understanding of our modern times and its the proper application of these Divine principles to our lives today outside of the Roman brainswashing and the forgery of religious documents from them that go almost unnoticed today except for the Scholar. Blessings. Craig Lyons M.Div.

BECOMING MORE AWARE OF EGYPT AND ITS INFLUENCE UPON JUDAISM & CHRISTIANITY

Over the years of my Bible Study I have seen that basically views about the Bible fall into three basic categories:

- That despite its many contradictions, every word it contains is to be taken literally
- The the Bible is basically a historical work which became distorted as a result of its initial long oral tradition and also to some extent at the hands of the biblical editors who eventually set it down in writing
- That the Bible is simply a collection of fanciful fairy tales couched in extravagant language

I personally believe, having done intense study for almost 20 years on the Bible and its origin, that the Bible is fundamentally a historical work. But it is not as easy as this as you will soon come to see.

When one approaches the Old Testament one quickly is instructed that the Old Testament contains the story of the Jewish people. Yet behind the scenes of study one finds that when Ezra rewrote the Torah after the Persian captivity that certain "identities" of very important characters were changed in order to cover up who these individuals truly were and the religion that they practiced. We end up with a Jewish book with Jewish origins; I found that such "origins" need to be reexamined in the light of current archeology and Egyptology. I cannot stress enought the importance of these alterations and changes made by Ezra to the Jewish people's history and their original faith. The result of such alterations has obsucred the truth concerning the Jewish Nation and their original faith to this day. The legacy of such deception rests with us today in many of the religious doctrines cherished by Gentile Christianity which never found their origin with God.

Simply said we have failed to understand the Old Testament correctly in many places because we have tried to fit Egyptian history into the Bible rather than fit the Bible into Egyptian history. As if that is not enough for failing to obtain a clear picture of the Old Testament is the fact that the length of the Israelite Sojourn in Egypt is accurately four generations and not four hundred years. Failure to understand the correct time period of the sojourn in Egypt by the Israelites means that scholars had been trying to piece together the Israelite picture at the wrong time and in the wrong place.

Answer for yourself: When was the last time you read the the Book of Genesis and the story of Joseph the Patriarch, the favorite son of Jacob, who was sold into slavery in Egypt by his jealous half-brothers and was appointed the virtual ruler of the country under an unnamed Pharaoh after, according to the Bible, foretelling the seven lean years that would follow seven good years?

I find especially moving to my spirit the account of how Joseph revealed his identity to his half-brothers when they made the second of two visits to Egypt from Canaan at a time of famine. He told them that they should not reproach themselves for what they had done for "it was not you that sent me hither, but God: and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt." Joseph then obtained Pharaoh's permission for his father, half-brothers and the tribe of Israel to join him in Egypt.

Archeologist and Egyptologists today reveal to us today the connection between Yuya, a minister of the Pharaohs Tuthmosis IV (c. 1413-1405 B.C.) and his son Amenhotep III [Solomon] (c. 1405-1367 B.C.). Although he was not apparently of royal blood, the tomb of Yuya was surprisingly found in the Valley of the Kings in 1905 and, more significantly, he is the only person we know of in Egyptian history to have the title "it ntr n nb tawi," holy father of the Lord of the Two Lands (Pharaoh's formal title). It occurs once on one of his ushabti (royal funeral statuette No. 51028 in the Cairo Museum catalogue) and more than twenty times on his funerary papyrus.

Answer for yourself: Could Joseph and Yuya be the same person?

Archeology is our friend for as Yeshua is recorded as saying "the rocks are crying out" like never before. The argument that Yuya is the Biblical Joseph received support with the discovery late in 1989 of the tomb, almost intact, of Aper-el, the hitherto unknown vizier of the Pharaoh Akhenaten, the son of Amenhotep III. Notice his name end in "el." The name "Aper-el" provides a semantic link between the Israelites and the Amarna regime, of which Akhenaten was the first of four rulers. Similar names are known to have existed in Egypt at this time, but never in the case of high officials. The name "Aper" corresponds to the Egyptian word for "Hebrew," which meant to ancient Egyptians a nomad, and the final "el" is the short form of "Elohim," one of the words used in the Bible as the name of "the Lord".

The fact that Akhenaten's vizier was a Hebrew worshipper of El confirms the link between the Egyptian king and Israelites living in Egypt at the time. Furthermore, the fact that Queen Tiye, the mother of Akhenaten, was associated with her husband, Amenhotep III, in donating a box to the funerary furniture of Aper.-el indicates the possibility that the vizier was a relation of the queen's, most probably through her Israelite father, Yuya (Joseph).

Once Yuya was identified as Joseph, a number of other aspects of the Israelite story fall into place - that the arrival of the Israelites in Egypt occurred more than two centuries later than had been thought; that their Sojourn lasted for four generations, not four centuries, and that the four Amarna kings - Akhenaten, Semenkhkare, Tutankhamun and Aye - who ruled during the tumultuous period in Egyptian history when an attempt was made to replace the country's multitude of ancient gods with a monotheistic God, were all descendants of Joseph the Patriarch (WOW)!

The prime mover in this Egyptian religious upheaval was Akhenaten in the years (c. 1367-1361 B.C.) when, following a period as co-regent, he became sole ruler upon the death of his father, Amenhotep III [the Biblical David]. Today many Egyptologist and archeologist agree that Akhenaten is to be identified as the biblical Moses and the "monotheistic Pharoah of Egypt" which tried to end Osiris worship.

I remember in Seminary when taking a class on Proverbs reading in the Anchor Bible Commentary on Proverbs that man of the Proverbs were written by Amenhotep. I wonder to myself why an Egyptian was writing these Proverbs when I had previously thought that Solomon was the writer of them. Little did I know then that Solomon was a Pharoah portrayed as a Jew in the Hebrew Scriptures. Little did I know then that the Patriarchs were to be "uncovered" as Pharaohs as well; including the David of the Bible.

Man, have we swallowed this Bible hook-line and sinker? So what is the truth? Does it matter? Why were the identities of these men changed? Could Egypt have been monotheistic and we led to misunderstand their religion today due to the influence of Rome?

Sure, I want to stimulate your thinking and turn you on to study; the highest form of worship in the first century. To know God and His revelation and message to us is paramount to mankind but as you are beginning to see in prior studies with Bet Emet that we have not been told the truth and now we come to the Old Testament and there problems there as well.

Normally I don't get into Egypt much because I have not mastered it as I have other disciplines of study but the information that is available today is astounding as we collect again the primary revelations of God to mankind that Egypt was given. Let us never forget that the first Messianic promise in Isaiah is given to Egypt before later ones given to their children...the Jews.

After nearly five thousand years of prohibition against the Greeks, they were permitted to enter Egypt for the purpose of their education. First through the Persian invasion and secondly through the invasion of Alexander the Great. From the sixth century B.C. therefore to the death of Aristotle (322 B. C.) the Greeks made the best of their chance to learn all they could about Egyptian culture; most students received instructions directly from the Egyptian Priests, but after the invasion by Alexander the Great, the Royal temples and libraries were plundered and pillaged, and Aristotle's school converted the library at Alexandria into a research centre. There is no wonder then, that the production of the unusually large number of books ascribed to Aristotle has proved a physical impossibility, for any single man within a life time. Again the truths of the Egyptian civilization and their understanding of God were destroyed by Alexander the Great.

Let me say in closing that Alexander the Great would conquer Egypt and destroy the nation and its religion and Hellenize it beyond recognition almost but no one was ever able to conquer and change the religion of their children..the Jewish people. That's right; the Egyptian and Semites had children...we call them the Jews today. Sure, attempts have been made to destroy the Jewish people just like their parents...the Egyptians; some more successful that others but it refreshing to see that the true Egyptian faith and religion the Jewish faith continue today. We only have to recognize it for what it really is. No wonder great men who themselves were sons of God [Son of Ra...the Pharoahs] knew God and His truth that we only grasp at today. This you might find hard to believe because of your conditioning as Gentile Christians today but the very basic religious doctrines of the Jews can be shown to originate with the Egyptians; even the concept of the Messiah. That's right; I said "the Messiah is first taught in Egypt." That should be alarming to you considering what you have been taught by Rome and our New Testaments that only Gentile Christianity has the truth. The irony of the whole matter is that I found over twenty years that I had very little truth at the hands of Rome and it's Protestant daughter.

Well....time to go...but the "truth if out there Mulder" and I hope you love God enough to recover it and seek it with all your heart and your heart will skip with joy when reading things like the "Negative Confessions" of Egypt which are nothing more than the foundation for the later Ten Commandments [categories of laws...and remember the Moshe/Akhenaton was a Pharoah] which Jewish their children would receive and teach to the world until Rome will destroy such truth and "faith" in the 4th century. The Egyptians knew what we as Christians don't today; that our relationship with God is only as good as the Laws of our Covenant which we obey. Such is love for God and Egypt knew that because they were a holy nation regardless how Roman history paints them and recreates and distorts their history. Pagans? Not on your life but Ethical Monotheists which understood the many attributes of God and portrayed them individually in figures that capture the nuance of each attribute of the Creator. But we look at those icons as if they Egyptian were crude idolators. We know nothing today it seem since the brainwashing of Rome has been so effective down through history. Rome would even go to such lengths of burning and destroying the Alexandrian library in Egypt in the early 4th century in order to destroy all evidence of such truths given to the Egyptians by God. They knew God is Creator, Sustainer, Destroyer. What they saw in the Heavens they saw in Nature and within their own bodies as well. From this comes allegory and methaphors taught as stories and myths to teach these truths. Christianity will later adopt these "truths" as if literal. That is where we get off. If you thing I am fooling you I challenge to read The Stolen Legacy by Georege G.M. James and you will see how when Alexander the Great destroyed Egypt and their religion and how the Greeks will take credit for all the wisdom and culture of Egypt and Rome, when they conquer Greece, continues that legacy until this very day. These Egyptians were not polytheistic as you have might of thought but truly understood the invisible Spirit of the Creator which judges mankind following our death based on our righteous deeds or the lack thereof. In fact the Egyptians taught and understood the "Big Bang" when we only in this century have come to understand. It is truly amazing how much knowledge we have lost and Rome destroyed. The Dark Ages came upon the world after the destruction of these 700,000 volumes in the Alexandrian Library by Bishop Theophilus. And we struggle today guided by the light of archeology and our thirst for truth to reacquire long lost truths about God as we separate "truth" from "fiction." Truly the rocks are crying out.

May God make you hungry for truth and you seek it with all your heart! Shalom.

THE EGYPTIAN RELIGION....COULD IT BE THE FATHER OF JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY?

I hope you like a challenge for your surely are in for one if you begin to study the link between Egypt, Judaism, and Christianity.

I never dreamed years ago in Seminary that my studies into the origin of Christianity and its Hebrew roots would later prove to me that the Bible that I carried is a book about astrology, astronomy, and the harmony of the Universe which is later personified into events in the lives of Patriarchs and even Jesus. You might say that I was at that time in my life unawakened to the Cosmic Consciousness that lies beneath many of the stories in my Bible let alone the stories concerning the depiction of Jesus in the New Testament. I quickly found over the years of intense study that all roads do not lead to Rome, although many do, but truly all roads lead to Egypt for it is there we find the world's First Monotheism in it's purest state. That's right; I said Egypt and not Jerusalem nor Rome. This might come as a shock to you as it did me but when you become familiar with how the texts of the Bible were written as well as archeology and ancient historical records you find that the Jews are the "children of the Egyptians" in the first place. We will get to that later in this websire but for now let us remain on tract. The things said above might seem shocking to you considering what you have been taught by your Christian Church and its traditions which we inherited in this Western Hemisphere. Even the Old School of Egyptology goes out of it's way to make sure that the truth concerning Moses, the Jews, and Israel is hidden because of its ramifications upon three world religions today. To say that such information is earth-shaking is a gross understatement.

When one surveys the development of Egytology as a discipline during the course of the 19th century, one is struck by the single-mindedness of purpose to which many of the great names of the day adhered. That sole purpose sought to discover in the ancient Egyptian cultural record evidence which would document, and thereby confirm, the events recorded in the Old Testament. These efforts have failed for several reasons. The biggest reason is that most scholars have been trying to fit Egyptian history into the Bible rather than the Bible into Egyptian history. However, archeological finds in the last 150 years have been monumental and such discoveries are of such an astounding nature that one realizes that the above approach of trying to put Egypt into the Bible is utter nonsense. Rather today we know for certain that we need to put the Bible into Egypt history in order to understand correctly the events and identies of the famous men and women of the Jewish Old Testament. Never forget that winners of wars write history as well as change it accprding to their veiws and agendas. Along with this comes their "version" of the story given as their legacy to all mankind. This has been done to where the truth concering the origin of Christianity is almost totally lost today without a good deal of hard work and diligent study. Had it not been for great discoveries in archeology in the last 150 years we would today remain in the darkness of Roman Church tradition which obscures the truth about God and His Revelation to all mankind which was first given to Egypt long before the Jews came from their loins.

This brings me to the purpose of this website and the information and articles that will follow. Having devoted myself to serious study these last 20 years my travels in scholarship have taken many paths and learning and knowledge has become my best friends. Today I as well as many other scholars realize that the roots of Christainity do not lie in Rome or Jerusalem but in Egypt. In fact the purest doctrine of Monotheism is to be found in Egypt when their religion is properly understood. Truly this gives cause to not only rethink Egyptian religion which has sadly been misrepresented to the world by the Old School of Egytology for hundreds of years but brings a correction to its daughter religions which have stayed from the path of its parent. We are dealing here with Divine Revelation on a magnatude that few since Moses, himself a Pharoah, has received and the failure of succeeding nations to understand and convey it properly. Sadly humanity has lost much of this knowledge through war and conquest but archeology is brining this history and information to the surface once again. In so doing we have now the ability to trace God's earliest Revelation of Himself on this planet through successive nations and as we do we can follow the changes, alterations, corruptions, as well as those who did not yield to such changes but chose rather to adhere to this original Divine Revelation. What we find upon such study is both disconcerting as well as comforting; disconcerting because we see the abberations and altertions of such original Divine truth once held by the Egyptians as we trace these doctrines chronologically down through history though successive Gentile sun worshipping nations as well as the rigorous and tenacious fighting by the Egyptian's children, the Jews, to maintain and preserver this "original truth" of its parents.

SO WHY IS THIS IMPORTANT TO TODAY'S CHRISTIAN?

This is important for us today because until we truly learn the origin of our Christian Faith and it's earliest doctrines and dogmas and what was believed way back then by the earliest believes in God on this planet to whom this Revelation was given and who are called "Holy men of old" and then compare their "religious beliefs" to those we have inherited today which are likewise touted as "Divine, infallible, and inerrant" then we see major changes and alterations have been made to this simple faith of the ancient Godfearers. Without such investigation on our parts we have no way to knowing for certain if what we have been taught and inherited down through history by successive Gentile sun worshipping nations is accurate and and a faithful representation of these original religious beiefs held by those who first received God's Divine Revelation in this world.

Sadly few if any Christians have ever studied the origins of their faith and have been instructed to accept without question their inherited faith as if this is an accurate representation of this prior Divine Revelation. Without such personal and individual study then we are relegated to having "faith" in what has been handed down to us by Rome in this ONE BOOK we call the Christian Bible and which is passed off as being an accurate representation of God's earliest revelation of Himself to "holy men of old." You will quicky come to see that this position of implitic faith in our inherited Christian religious belief system and this ONE BOOK more than a little problematic upon just a few hours of serious reading and study into the true origins of the Christian faith let alone into serious study into the textual integrity with the texts within the Christian Bible.

BECOMING EQUIPPED TO STUDY THE BIBLE AND ONE'S FAITH IN DEPTH

After Seminary, as well as during my three year course of instruction, I realized beyond any doubt that there are many problems within my Christian Bible and my Christian religious beliefs system and I wanted answers to why things just did not add up so much of the time since supposedly coming from a God who is not the author of confusion. But time restraints required that I wait until after graduation and during the years of my Pastorate in order to investigate such irregularities. As God would have it by Divine Providence I had read a very good Jewish book on the Jewish Jesus before entering my course of study at Southwestern Theological Seminary entiteld Understanding The Difficult Words of Jesus by David Blivin and Roy Blizzard. This book agitated me beyond belief because it revealed to me that behind the English words of my New Testament were Hebraic doctrines and meanings that the English and the context of the passage failed to bring out. I quickly realized that I did not have the meaning Jesus intended but yet I read the passage and arrived at an alternate understanding either from my ignorance of Hebrew or my prior conditioning by hearing sermons that allegorized the passages in question. Said bluntly I did not have words of Jesus nor the understanding intended for the hearers who once set before him when he instructed them. Likewise I realized that I had often a completely different meaning and I reasoned that if I had another completely different meaning than what Jesus intended from inherited sermons frim the Gentile Church than what the Hebrew behind the Greek and English intended then I had the wrong understandingand. It was not Jesus who did not "believe as me" but I who "did not believe as Jesus."

I began to ponder such a senario. I had just finished taking Systematic Theology in Seminary where I was taught the Baptist viewpoints on such religious doctrines such as sin, repentance, judgment, resurrection, prayer, atonement, life after death, tithing, etc. Then it dawned on me to question if I really had the "mind of Christ" on these religious beliefs. I asked myself some very difficult questions the last day at Seminary as I set on a bench before the beautiful gardens on the campus:

- What did Jesus the Jew believe concenring various theologies and Biblical doctrines that make up his faith and his religion?
- What have I been taught to believe about these same doctrines?
- It is possible that Jesus believes different from me in these areas of Biblical doctrine?
- If it can be shown that my religious belief system is different from Jesus' then is Jesus wrong or am I wrong?
- If it can be shown that I believe different than Jesus did on these religious doctrines then is Jesus wrong and me right?
- If it can be shown that I believe different from Jesus on these religious doctrines then does it not stand to reason that I have the WRONG religious belief system and that I need to repent and change my religious beliefs and bring them in line with what the historical Jesus believed?
- Can I really call myself a follower of Jesus if it can be shown that my Christian religious belief system is oppossed and is opposite to what can be shown that Jesus believed?

I had to have the answers to these questions. I knew what the Baptists believed and wanted me to believe but I was haunted by these above questions and the answers could not come quick enought but yet I realized that it might take months and even years to satisfactory get the answers that I needed. I wanted no room to doubt so my determined to approach such investigation and study n a methodical way. Since being a full blown zealous Christian at that time in my life I began my studies in Fourth Century following the Counil of Nicea since this is the high water mark of organizational Christianity. I began to work backwards down through history with the desire to sift through as much information as possible to understand the intricacies of what really happened that shaped and gave momentum to Gentile Christianity all the while comparing what I had been taught to believe with what a Jew like Jesus in the first century believed. But there was one problem; I did not know what a Jew like Jesus believed in these areas so I had to undertake a serious and indepth study of Biblical Judaism which took over 4 years to where I was satisfied that I knew the Jewish faith inside and outside. That was an eye opening experience to say the least as I saw daily in my studies that I had very little in common with a Jewish Jesus and his faith of Judaism. I wondered how my faith and Christian religious beliefs and doctrines which is supposed to be the fulfillment of Judaism could conflict and contradict so often what Jesus the Jew believed. I wondered who was responsible for such a misrepresentation of the historical Jesus the Jew as found in the New Testament and Gentile Church dogma which my ONE BOOK taught as the faith of Jesus when serious investigation into Judaism shows that the Jesus of the New Testament has more in commen with sun godmen and cosmic saviors than the Messiah of Judaism and what Judaism teaches.

During the years of my studies having now learned what Jesus the Jew believed about these various doctrines I quickly saw that Gentile Christianity had little in common with the faith of Jesus. In fact it seemed I had inherited a belief in the "Jesus of faith" given to me by Rome as depicted in Rome's canon of passages called the New Testament instead of the "Jesus of history" whose Bible was the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings [sadly called the Old Testament today....rightly known as the Tanakh]. As I began to isolate these divergent religious doctrines in Gentile Christianity that deviated from Biblical Judaism then I wanted to know "why" my Christian religious doctrines were different and "when" these doctrines were changed and where they found their ultimate origin. That began for me a quest to trace these Gentile religious beliefs back down through history through each successive conquering nation until I arrived eventually at the beginning of recorded time. I began as my fixed point Roman Catholicsm in the middle ages and began to work backward. It was amazing at what I saw and uncovered. Along with such discovery of altered religious doctrines by Rome I was introducted into the corruption of New Testament documents themselves as history and archeology records for us the almost constant alteration, change, and continued manipulation of these documents as successive Roman Church Councils decided upon and created theology. The further I ventured back into the influence of Gentile religious beliefs upon the Christian Bible I ran into the earlier corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures by the Hellenized Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt in 220 B.C.E. Now we have the corruption of both the Hebrew Scritptures known as the Old Testament as well as the New Testament and these mind you become the Bible of the Christian Church for the last 1600 years.

As I continued to trace backwards in time Christian beliefs to find the orign for their deviation from what the Jews believed as recorded in their Hebrew Scriptures I found that all roads lead to Egypt. Along the way I discovered that Ezra rewrote the Hebrew Scriptures following the Persian captivity and at that time the history of the Jewish people was altered to cover up their "Egyptian Roots." This opened a whole can of worms that intriges and motivates my study even to this day. Important for our study and this website is the marvelous facts I found concering the Egyptian Religion which are sadly so tragically misrepresented today to all but those who study the New School of Egyptoloy. In Egypt we find the world's first recorded religion and when properly understood the similarity with Biblical Judaism is overwhelming. But we should expect such once we learn the true origin of the Jewish people which can be shown to have sprung from the intermarriages of Egyptians and Caaninites. This information now becomes startling because not only do we learn the true identity of the Biblical Patriarch who are Pharoahs but reorients the dating of the Exodus to a period where few if any scholars look for evidence. Not finding any this period they dismiss the Exodus as myth but when dated to the period to when it actually occurred the evidence for the Exodus is plentiful.

As if that is not enought I was overwhelmed with what I found concerning Egyptian religion. Properly understood the beauty and simplicity of God's Revelation to earliest mankind is breathtaking as God revealed Himself to these people though the Universe, Nature, and within Humanity. Observations in the Heavens, in Nature, and in mankind himself expressed truths that found their expression through allegories and metaphors that took the form of stories and events that were never literal but yet expressed "literal" truths about the Creator. These personifications of Divine truth were woven into the Egyptian civilization and when PROPERLY understood reveal the Glory of God and His message to mankind. It would be these "religious beliefs" that would provide the substrate for Egypt's Ethical Monotheism which was to be imparted to the world. In time the children of the Egyptians emerge throught the marriage of Egytians and Semites and we recognize them today as the Jewish race. These Egyptian children, the Jews, learned the religion of their parents and cleave to it today as well. Alexander the Great will come and destroy and Hellinize Egypt and in his wake the religion of the parent will be destroyed but try as they may the childen of the Egyptians have withstood down through history assimiliation and repeated attempts to subjugate and destroy their faith by successive Gentile conquerers. Biblical and Rabbinical Judaism is the closest representation of God's original Divine Revelation to mankind that can be found in the world today. Sadly Gentile Christianity refused this Revelation and did all that could to change it and pass it off as "orthodoxy" to the unsuspecting Gentiles who lack the knowledge to spot the counterfeit.

Sadly in time such Divine truths of the Kosmos woule be perverted and the allegories and metaphors expressing these Divine truths would become "literalized" and debauchered by successive Gentile nations and this deviation from truth becomes the cornerstone of world paganism in their deviate solar and nature festivals. Rome, in its combat against Judaism as a world religion in the earliest centuries, assimilates just enough Judaism in order to remake Jesus of the New Testament and then Jesus of the New Testament is transformed into a hybrid representing a Cosmic Godman crossed with just enough Judaism to appear Jewish to those who know no better. That once was me. Simply said religious doctrines of Egypt expression Divine truth in the form of allegory and metaphor are literaziled by the Greeks and Romans and taught in a literal manner which was never to be understood in such a way nor taught in such a way. Of what I am referring are the majority of the New Testament accounts of Jesus in the New Testament which simply are little more than personifications of Stellar and Cosmic events originally undestood allegorically that reveal God and His attributes to mankind which have under the influence of the Essenes and later Rome been personified and deified as applied to the historical Jesus. In so doing the simple truths, the original Revelation of God, and the simple Gospel of God originally given and understood by the Egyptans and their Jewish children has been tragically altered and destroyed and the Roman depiction of Jesus the Jew in the New Testament is nothing more than the literalization of these Divien truths understood originally as allegory. Said another way the Jewish Jesus of history has been transformed from a man into a God along with the loss of his religious beliefs system and the substitute of another all the while the Roman doctrine that failure to believe such things that they teach about in their Roman New Testament results in one's damnation. Our adherence to many of these New Testament beliefs about Jesus are simply wrong and inaccurate and renders the uneducated believer an idolator and blasphemer when compared to the original beliefs of the historical Jesus and the Egyptian parents of the Jews.

WILL YOU LET ME PROVE THIS TO YOU?

If you have followed me up to now you might be bewildered to the claims made above but as they say in Texas: "the proof is in the pudding." I would ask you to search your heart and see if truth matter to you in your relationship with God. If it does then I would ask you to take this challenge and let me prove these things to you beyond any doubt which after twenty years of serious study I am prepared to do. The question is if you are willing to devote time and resources to procure some necessary books to aid in your study because I don't want anyone to stand before God in the judgment and say "pastor Craig said." That simply won't do. You are responsible for your own relationship with God as well as acquring the truth concerning your faith. In order to return to the faith of Jesus you must come first to the realization that you don't have it. This is my job to convince you through many infallible proofs that as a Gentile Christain it is impossible to be a follower of the historical Jesus.

On this ministry's various other websites I have over the years tackled various doctrial problems facing the traditional Christian and brought truth to bear upon the lies of Christian orthodoxy passed off as truth. Now we begin at the beginning of recorded history in order to undestand the religion of the parents of the Jews who gave us the historical Jesus. This will not be a quick or easy study and the concepts that will be revealed with be new and challenging. But as they say "no pain, no gain." So we begin at the beginning to understand the earliest of God's Revelation to mankind. Then after seeing these things for yourself then it is up to you to decide if you have been given the truth and a faithful representation of it by Rome or if you have been led down the road of deception like the billions of other Gentile who came before you who failed to take seriously the study of the origins of their faith. It is to these issues we now turn in this website. May God bless your effors and the repentance of your life as these truth pierce your heart and reveal to you maybe for the first time in your life that you have received the counterfeit instead of the real. In so doing the idolatry and blasphemy which contaminates every Christian due to Rome's antisemtism and rejection of "the faith once given to the saints" will be exposed and this is the first step in your repentance and returing to the real faith of Jesus: Faith "in" Jesus or "the faith of Jesus"...that is the question!

THE BASICS OF EGYPTIAN COSMOLOGY

Let me introduce a new word to your vocabulary: Cosmology.

- Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, © 1996, 1998 Micra, Inc., defines "cosmology" as the science of the world or universe; or a treatise relating to the structure and parts of the system of creation, the elements of bodies, the modifications of material things, the laws of motion, and the order and course of nature.
- The American Heritage® Dictionary of the English Language, Fourth Edition Copyright © 2000 by Houghton Mifflin Company, and published by Houghton Mifflin Company defines "cosmology" as the study of the physical universe considered as a totality of phenomena in time and space. The astrophysical study of the history, structure, and constituent dynamics of the universe. A specific theory or model of this structure and these dynamics.

Egyptian cosmology and understanding of God's Universe and all that is in it is based on coherent scientific and philosophical principles, of the universe as a whole. Another way to say this is the the totality of the Universe and all of Creation is based upon Laws and Divine Principles. The totality of the Egyptian civilization was built upon a complete and precise understanding of universal laws that express the Divine Intent and Order of the Divine. This profound understanding manifested itself in a consistent, coherent and inter-related system, where art, science, philosophy and religion were intertwined, and were employed simultaneously in a single organic Unity.

For the people of Egypt, there were no perceived differences between sacred and mundane actions, as we moderns believe there to be. Every action, no matter how mundane: plowing, sowing, reaping, brewing, building ships, waging wars, playing games, the system of weights and measures - was viewed as an earthly symbol for a specific divine activity. No aspect of their knowledge was divorced from any other aspect.

UNDERSTANDING THE ATTRIBUTES OF GOD AS EGYPT DID

The Egyptians regarded the universe as a conscious act of creation by the One Great God. The fundamental doctrine was the unity of the Deity. This One God was never represented. It is the functions and attributes of his domain that were represented and this idea finds expression in the multiple examples of Egyptian gods and goddesses which are not separate gods but only representations of various aspects and attributes of the one true God of all. Once a reference was made to his functions/attributes, he became a distinguishable agent; reflecting this particular function/attribute, and its influence on the world. His various functions and attributes as the Creator, Healer, and the like, were called the neteroo (singular: "neter" in the masculine form and "netert" in the feminine form).

The ancient Egyptian word "neter," and its feminine form "netert," have been wrongly, and possible intentionally, translated as "god" and "goddess," by almost all scholars. There is no equivalent word in meaning, to the word "neter," in the English language. Honest translation should use the native word, if they cannot find its equivalent in their language. "Neteroo" (plural of "neter/netert") are the Divine Principles and Functions that operate the Universe. They are all aspects and functions of the One Supreme God. The words "god" and "goddess" leave the impression that ancient Egyptians had a multitude of gods, which is absolutely untrue.

As such, an Egyptian neter/netert was not a god/goddess but the personification of a function/attribute of the One God. With this understanding comes likewise the understanding that the labeling of Egyptian religion as "pagan" or "idolatrous" betrays the complete lack of understanding of the Egyptian religion by the writer or would be scholar.

MAN IS MADE IN THE IMAGE OF GOD

Central to their complete understanding of the universe, was the knowledge that man was made in the image of God, and as such, man represented the created image of all creation. Accordingly, Egyptian symbolism and all measures were therefore simultaneously scaled to man, to the earth, to the solar system, and ultimately to the universe.

The Egyptian thinking that the One God can be represented through his functions/attributes has its equivalence in mankind. Each one of us has various functions and attributes. A person can be a teacher in the classroom, a father to his children, a husband to his wife, a player on his team, ... etc. This person does not have multiple personalities, but multiple functions/attributes.

Egyptians recognized the universal validity of this kind of thinking, and applied it to all the levels of the hierarchically organized world. Even though it may appear complex at first sight, it is both coherent and consistent with experience. This was the essence of the Egyptian philosophy. It is a real philosophy based on organized, systematic, self-consistent and coherent principles.

Modern science uses terminology which is comparable to the Egyptian thinking of neteroo (gods). We speak of the four force fields of the universe - the weak force, the strong force, gravity, and electromagnetism (and perhaps a fifth, if there is a fifth). These forces have to be subordinate, since they all came from somewhere. This "somewhere" was understood as the "First Cause".....God. The ultimate thing is God, the One. As such, it might be said that the Egyptian neteroo (gods) represent what we today would consider scientific theories that are continually refined, the way Newtonian physics moves toward quantum physics.

The cosmological ideas of ancient Egypt were expressed by myth and symbolism, which are a superior means for expressing metaphysical concepts. I will drive home the point over and over in this website that myth, symbolism, allegory, and metaphor as used by the Ancient Egyptians was NEVER understood to be "literal" but only a method of expressing such Divine Truths on a level easier to understand by mankind. Philosophy, mathematics and science are dry subjects with many abstracts. Mythology incorporates philosophical and scientific ideas into a story form, like a sacred drama or mystery play, which can be easily digested. Pure philosophical and scientific abstracts and terms do not guarantee understanding. Information alone is useless, unless it is transformed into understanding. Well-crafted mythology can achieve that understanding.

MYTH

Myth is an intentionally chosen means for communicating knowledge. Myth dramatizes cosmic laws, principles, processes, relationships and functions, and expresses them in an easy to understand way. Meaning and the mystic experience are not tied to a literal interpretation of events. A myth has no historical value. Once the inner meanings of the myths have been revealed, they become marvels of simultaneous scientific and philosophical completeness and conciseness. The more they are studied, the richer they become. And, rooted in the myth as it is, the part can never be mistaken for the whole, nor can its functional significance be forgotten or distorted.

SYMBOLISM

We live in a world of symbols, logos, icons, and emblems, which are a powerful and concise means of representing a company, product, idea, etc. Words convey information; symbols evoke understanding. Egyptian symbolism could be compared in some sense to modern day caricature. The use of symbols, (such as Uncle Sam, Russian bear, British bulldog, etc.) in caricature, are arbitrary and reveal nothing functional of the nation they symbolize. For the informed, the cartoon can reveal, in legitimate symbolic form, the totality of a given situation, in the eyes of the individual cartoonist. As such, a symbol, by definition, is not what it represents, but what it stands for, what it suggests. A symbol reveals to the mind a reality other than itself.

Egyptian symbols were carefully chosen from the natural world, to best express or embody a specific function or principle. A chosen symbol represents that function or principle, on all levels simultaneously - from the simplest, most obvious physical manifestation of that function to the most abstract and metaphysical.

It is important to realize that for Egyptians, every physical fact of life had a symbolic meaning. At the same time, every symbolic act of expression had a material background. (Moustafa Gadalla, Egyptian Cosmology: The Divine Harmony, Bastet Publishing, Erie, Pa., USA., 1997, p. 1-22).

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN SOLAR RELIGION...COULD IT HAVE BEEN THE PRECURSOR TO GENTILE CHRISTIANITY?

The title says it all! Now it is up to me to prove the fact stated above: That the vast majority of Christian religious doctrines and dogmas is one way or the other associated with Jesus came from Egypt over ten thousand years ago. Let me say it another way: "Egyptian Solar Religion was personified in the form of the Osiris myth and and this "religious myth" was adapted by almost all Gentile nations in one form or another and finally applied to a Jewish Rabbi names Yeshua by both the Essenes and later the Romans.

Understand up front that if I could not prove this point I would not be devoting great lengths of time and effort to such a project but being an ex-Pastor who stumbled onto this facts and the religious synthesis of the ages by Sun worshipping Gentile nations I feel it is my obligation to alert and warn others to the deceptions to which they have been ensnared by Western Christianity. As our Ministry's other websites amply prove beyond any doubt so will this one reveal to the interested student the "secrets of the ages" and the "priesthood" who used such knowledge of the Heavens and the Stars to control the masses; we call it religion today and there is nothing new under the Sun (pardon the pun)!

WHAT WILL I LEARN IF I CONTINUE MY STUDY INTO EGYPTIAN CHRISTIANITY?

But all is not lost and there is no need to be depressed because once you see the facts for yourself you will see that within the religious system of Egypt are hints of a "Divine" Creator who has spoken to His children; the sad part is that during the struggle between different groups of Egyptian priesthoods throughout many Dynasties many religious beliefs were added to this Divine Revelation and God's Truth blurred if not lost. We at Bet Emet, by exposing the Astro-theology, Nature Worship, and Phallic Worship of the Ancients hope to help the interested student refocus on the Divine while at the same time "casting out the Leaven." Most interesting of all is the role of the Jewish people when their true origin is understood once one comes to sufficient knowledge of Egypt and their assimilation with the Semitic peoples of yesteryear. Suffice to say that the earliest understanding of the Divine was handed down to the children of the Egyptians known today as the Jewish people. If truth is paramount one must admit that the Jewish people flirted with paganism throughout their history but finally through Divine punishments which culminated in the Babylonian Captivity Israel was no longer to be entangled in idolatry and blasphemy for the most part although much later the Essenes would fail in this area in their rejection of Biblical Judaism. One more point has to be made before we go on; namely, Alexander the Great would destroy Egypt and their culture through his Hellenization of his conquered territories and Egypt and their religion was no exception. However, the Egyptian's children, the Jewish people, fought and died to preserve their Divine inheritance from Egypt. It is our task to day to "match up" these Divine rivers of Revelation we find in Egypt and Israel and their faith in God while at the same time factor out Osiris religion and its many religious dogmas which were assimilated by most all Gentile nations over their histories in one form or another. Understand that the "names" of the character in these religious myths changed in the various nations but the "pattern" is seen throughout when one begins to study comparative religions. What emerges once such "Solar patterns" are discarded is a Divine Revelation of a Creator who not only ordered the Heavens and Nature but applied such order to mankind as well as seen in a Divine Law Code held sacred to the Egyptians as well as the Jews today: It is called by the Jews today the Torah while the Egyptians called it the "Negative Confessions." We will get to all that shortly but now our task is to look to the Heavens to see what the Egyptians saw and how they over many centuries reasoned and personified what they saw into stories of gods and godesses and the religious doctrines associated with them.

What you will see in this website is that the Ancient Egyptians saw "God" in the Heavens and over times such observations "spoke" to them about the Creator and His "message in the stars" as they understood it. Over time these "observations" in the Heavens and in Nature (which was influenced by the Heavens and the Sun) were correlated and later personified by the Ancients into stories of gods and godmen and every Gentile nation saw these same things and made similar observations. Where the train jumps the track is here: While the earliest Egyptians saw Divine forces at work in the Heavens and Nature they understood them as "allegory" and "symbols" while later other Gentile nations will turn these "observations" into LITERAL religious beliefs and apply them to gods and godmen as if they were real. This explains why almost every Gentile nation of the world saw the same things in the Heavens and Nature as had the Egyptians and accounts for such similarities in their religions histories and why, when allegory became "literal" for them, that they applied them to gods and godmen in a literal way and then we come along and find the same things taught "literally" as applied to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua as found in the "Jesus story" in the New Testament; which when properly understood is little more than a retelling of Egyptian religious myths as found recorded in Egyptian and other Gentile ancient religious writings since the beginning of mankind's earliest written records.

It has to be stressed again. Understand as well that to them earliest Egyptians these religious beliefs which were expressed in myths were understood as an "allegory" of truths that they perceived as they looked on the Creator's handiwork in the Heavens. They even made connections in Nature since the Heavens influenced the growing seasons and the food chain. But again it has to be said these understandings of these Egytpians were "allegories" of higher spiritual truths as they perceived them in their lives. We as Christians and followers of Jesus fall into idolatry and blasphemy of the Creator when we attach similar religious beliefs to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua/Jesus and believe them in a "LITERAL" way as we have been taught under the influence of Western Christianity. It is my hope that after seeing what the ancient Egyptians saw in the heavens then you will be able to see how such "allegories" later became "literal" religious beliefs which were attached to false gods and dying godmen in almost every nation under the sun and finally to Jesus/Yeshua by the Essenes and later Rome.

Understand that we desire the truth about Jesus and not just the re-telling of the "Osiris" myth over and over again through countless generations where finally it was again applied to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua in the Fertile Crescent in the first century B.C. One's relationship with God should be built upon truth and not Astro-theology and concepts personified from nature. It is to this task of recovering such Divine truth held by such men as Pharaoh Akhenaton, known today as Moses, that we now turn.

THE PRINCIPLES OF EGYPTIAN RELIGION

In Egypt, what we now call religion, was so widely acknowledged that it did not even need a name. There is no indigenous name for religion within their own language.

The Egyptians did not have a word for religion in their language. For the people of Egypt, there were no perceived differences between sacred and mundane actions, as we moderns believe there to be. Every action, no matter how mundane: plowing, sowing, reaping, brewing, building ships, waging wars, playing games, the system of weights and measures - was viewed as an earthly symbol for a specific divine activity. All actions by mankind are linked in a grand dynamic scheme. No aspect can be isolated from another and treated as a separate specialty or field without distortion and destruction. What is startling is that this is the exact concept of Biblical Judaism! But as said before the Jewish people are the children of the Egyptians and their intermarriage with Semites so one should begin to expect great similarities between Biblical Judaism and Egyptian religion in many regards.

SOME NECESSARY BACKGROUND INFORMATION FIRST

Most grievously the Egyptian words "neter," and it's feminine form "netert," have been wrongly, and possibly INTENTIONALLY, transformed to "god" and "goddess," by most all scholars. There is NO equivalent word in meaning, to the word "neter," in the English language. Honest translators should use the native word, if they cannot find its equivalent in their language. Neteroo (plural of neter/netert) are the Divine Principles and functions that operate the universe. They are all aspects and functions of the One Supreme God!

Getting that out of the way we need an honest foundation in the religion of Egypt.

Egyptian cosmology is based on coherent scientific and philosophical principles, of the universe as a whole. The totality of the Egyptian civilization was built upon a complete and precise understanding of universal laws. This profound understanding manifested itself in a consistent, coherent and inter-related system, where art, science, philosophy and religion were intertwined, and were employed simultaneously in a single organic Unity.

The Egyptians regarded the universe as a conscious act of creation by the One Great God. The fundamental doctrine was the unity of the Deity. This One God was never represented. It is the functions and attributes of his domain that were represented. Once a reference was made to his functions/attributes, he became a distinguishable agent; reflecting this particular function/attribute, and its influence on the world. His various functions and attributes as the Creator, Healer, and the like, were called the neteroo (singular: neter in the masculine form and netert in the feminine form). As such, an Egyptian neter/netert was NOT a god/goddess but the personification of a function/attribute of the One God.

Central to their complete understanding of the universe, was the knowledge that man was made in the image of God, and as such, man represented the created image of all creation. Accordingly, Egyptian symbolism and all measures were therefore simultaneously scaled to man, to the earth, to the solar system, and ultimately to the universe.

The Egyptian thinking that the One God can be represented through his functions/attributes has its equivalence in mankind. Each one of us has various functions and attributes. A person can be a teacher in the classroom, a father to his children, a husband to his wife, a player on his team, ... etc. This person does not have multiple personalities, but multiple functions/attributes.

Egyptians recognized the universal validity of this kind of thinking, and applied it to all the levels of the hierarchically organized world. Even though it may appear complex at first sight, it is both coherent and consistent with experience. This was the essence of the Egyptian philosophy. It is a real philosophy based on organized, systematic, self-consistent and coherent principles. God was undefinable to the Egyptians but the "effects" of His "cause" were seen everywhere. The "Cause" and His " effects" were recognized in various forces seen both in the Heavens, Nature, and within the human species himself. These forces have to be subordinate, since they all came from somewhere. The ultimate thing is God, the One.

These cosmological ideas of ancient Egypt were expressed by myth and symbolism, which are a superior means for expressing metaphysical concepts. Philosophy, mathematics and science are dry subjects with many abstracts. Mythology incorporates philosophical and scientific ideas into a story form, like a sacred drama or mystery play, which can be easily digested. Pure philosophical and scientific abstracts and terms do not guarantee understanding. Information alone is useless, unless it is transformed into understanding. Well-crafted mythology can achieve that understanding. Again it needs to be stressed that this understanding of the Creator and His actions exhibited and observed by these Egyptians were later personified and symbolized by various entities which were narrated in story form to express such Divine concepts.

MYTH

Myth is an intentionally chosen means for communicating knowledge. Myth dramatizes cosmic laws, principles, processes, relationships and functions, and expresses them in an easy to understand way.

Meaning and the mystic experience are not tied to a literal interpretation of events. A myth has no historical value.

Once the inner meanings of the myths have been revealed, they become marvels of simultaneous scientific and philosophical completeness and conciseness. The more they are studied, the richer they become. And, rooted in the myth as it is, the part can never be mistaken for the whole, nor can its functional significance be forgotten or distorted.

SYMBOLISM

We live in a world of symbols, icons, and emblems, which are a powerful and concise means of representing a company, product, idea, etc. Words convey information; symbols evoke understanding.

Egyptian symbolism could be compared in some sense to modern day caricature. The use of symbols are arbitrary and reveal nothing functional of the entity they symbolize. As such, a symbol, by definition, is not what it represents, but what it stands for, what it suggests. A symbol reveals to the mind a reality other than itself.

Egyptian symbols were carefully chosen from the natural world, to best express or embody a specific function or principle. A chosen symbol represents that function or principle, on all levels simultaneously - from the simplest, most obvious physical manifestation of that function to the most abstract and metaphysical.

It is important to realize that for Egyptians, every physical fact of life had a symbolic meaning. At the same time, every symbolic act of expression had a material background. So when we begin to examine their representations of God as symbolized in various manifestations like Osiris, Anubis, Isis, etc., we must never fail to realize that these are NOT meant to be literal or separate gods but rather manifestations of the One True God and His Works.

What becomes hard for us is to separate the "ethics" of religion from the pure "myth" that has strayed beyond the Divine Truths of God....for this has happened in the Egyptian religion. I am confident that after your studies of the materials on this website that such a task will be much easier for you.

Religion by definition is any system of belief, worship, and conduct, which often involves a code of ethics and philosophy. The main elements of the Egyptian religion (metaphysical beliefs,) as existed since its earliest history, consisted of:

- God, the Divine Origin
- Creation of the Universe
- Creation of man and his role
- The Canons
- The After-life

GOD...THE DIVINE ORIGIN

Egyptian religion is, in the strictest sense, monotheistic (one God.) The Egyptians regarded the universe as a conscious act of creation by the One Great God. The fundamental doctrine was the unity of the Deity. This One God was never represented. It is the functions and attributes of his domain that were represented. Biblical Judaism does the same thing; it is called the Thirteen Attributes of God. Once a reference was made to his functions/attributes, he became a distinguishable agent; reflecting this particular function/attribute, and its influence on the world. His various functions and attributes as the Creator, Wise, Healer, Everlasting, and the like, were called the neteru, (singular: neter in the masculine form and netert in the feminine form.) As such, an Egyptian neter/netert was not a god/goddess but the personification of a specific function/attribute of the One God.

The Egyptian thinking that the One God can be represented through his functions/attributes has its equivalence in mankind. Each one of us has various functions and attributes. A person can be a teacher in the classroom, a father to his children, a husband to his wife, a player on his team, ... etc. This person does not have multiple personalities, but multiple functions/attributes.

Egyptians recognized the universal validity of this kind of thinking, and applied it to all the levels of the hierarchically organized world. Even though it may appear complex at first sight, it is both coherent and consistent with experience. This was the essence of the Egyptian philosophy. It is a real philosophy based on organized, systematic, self-consistent and coherent principles.

Central to their complete understanding of the universe, was the knowledge that man was made in the image of God, and as such, man represented the created image of all creation. Accordingly, Egyptian symbolism and all measures were therefore simultaneously scaled to man, to the earth, to the solar system, and ultimately to the universe.

In order to simplify and convey these abstract notions of God's attributes, some fixed representations were invented. As a result, the figures of Ptah, Osiris, Amun, Mut, etc., became the signs of such attributes/functions.

These figures were intended merely to fix the attention or represent some legendary tale or abstract idea, and were not intended to be looked upon as real personages. There was no prescribed form for a neter/netert, and the Egyptians believed that a neter/netert could take on any shape a person desired, since the object of a form was only to fix the attention or represent an abstract idea.

CREATION OF THE UNIVERSE

The creation of the universe and of man have complementary and intertwining themes. Each creation will be discussed separately, starting with the creation of the universe.

The cosmological ideas of ancient Egypt were expressed by myth and symbolism, which are a superior means for expressing metaphysical concepts. Philosophy, mathematics and science are dry subjects with many abstracts. Mythology incorporates philosophical and scientific ideas into a story form, like a sacred drama or mystery play, which can be easily digested. Pure philosophical and scientific abstracts and terms do not guarantee understanding. Information alone is useless, unless it is transformed into understanding. Well-crafted mythology can achieve that understanding.

The Egyptian creation myths, regarding the universe, are similar to the account provided in the opening chapter of Genesis: God creates heaven and earth, divides the waters, creates the light, and gives life to animals and man.

The origin of the world and the nature of the neteru who took part in its creation were subjects of constant interest to the Egyptians. The Egyptian cosmology was divided into four separate but complementary teachings, each with its center of specialty. These teachings are to be viewed as detailed versions of the various stages outlined in the opening chapter of Genesis. The four Egyptian separate teachings at the four centers were sponsored by four different neteru (wrongly translated as gods). The main neteru of creation are Ra of Heliopolis, Ptah of Memphis, and Amon of Thebes. The fourth, namely Tehuti (Thoth) of Hermopolis, provided an account of creation as a result of the word-analogous to the opening of the Gospel according to St. John.

THE CREATION OF MAN AND HIS ROLE

According to the Egyptian metaphysical beliefs, though all creation is spiritual in origin, man is born mortal but contains within himself the seed of the divine. His purpose in this life is to nourish that seed, and his reward, if successful, is eternal life, where he will reunite with his divine origin. Nourishing plants in the soil is analogous to nourishing the spirit on earth by doing good deeds.

THE CANONS

A canon by definition is a collection of books officially accepted by a religious body as genuine. As such, the Bible is the Christian canon. The Bible was formulated as a result of the church selection, from many previous writings some time ago. Their final choice resulted in our common Bible which contains thirty-nine (39) different books in the Old Testament and twenty-seven (27) writings in the New Testament. Ancient Egyptians had several metaphysical writings and teachings, but they were never incorporated into a singular canon. Egyptians had never discarded any view no matter what. Some of the writings were contradictory, but that did not matter, because it was not anybody's business to select and choose for the people. Each view was like a key to the truth and the various views were like keys resembling the pattern of the lock. As such, they decided to respect and retain all views.

There was never a single religious authority who had the power or the desire to choose some writings and incorporate them into one canon, as the case with the Bible, except during Akhenaton's reign which was an aberration.

The essence of the Egyptian religion is based on metaphysical beliefs. The whole universe is an intentional creation. Man was created to accomplish a specific role within the grand cosmic scheme. Man, who is born of flesh, has the potential to become spirit. The Egyptian texts described in detail the stages of the transformation process from man's earthly carnal to the pure spiritual.

Each of these texts emphasizes specific aspects of the Egyptian doctrine of life/death/rebirth. The Book of the Caverns has a psychological focus; and its theme of punishment and reward is paramount. The Book of the Gates has a spiritual focus. The Book of What Is In the Duat (or Underworld) has a magical/alchemical focus. The Book of Day and The Book of Night emphasize the cosmological and the astronomical aspects.

The Book of the Coming Forth by Day, wrongly translated and commonly known as The Egyptian Book of The Dead, consists of over a hundred chapters of varying lengths, which were mostly derived from the Unas Funerary (Pyramid) (ca. 2500 B.C.E.). This book is to be found, in its complete form, only on papyrus scrolls that were wrapped in the mummy swathings of the deceased and buried with him.

THE AFTER-LIFE

In a book of instructions, an Egyptian king advised his son, the prince, to attain the highest qualities, because upon his death he will see his whole lifetime in a single instant and his performance on earth will be reviewed and evaluated, by the judges. In recent years, numerous books addressed the near-death experiences of many people. In this phenomenon, it is reported that seeing the person's whole life span in an instant, is a recurrent theme for all persons with near-death experiences. Death is not the end, but rather it is a transitional state. Such an experience matches exactly the Egyptians' belief of the transformation process, which starts with the Day of Judgment where the life of the person is evaluated.

As stated earlier, ancient Egyptians expressed their metaphysical beliefs in story form (myth), like a sacred drama or a mystery play. The following are the Egyptians' symbolic representations of the process of the Judgement Day.

The spirit of the deceased denies committing each sin/fault before its assigned judge, by reciting the forty-two negative confessions (analogous to the famed Ten Commandments). These negative confessions come from The Book of the Coming Forth by Day (commonly and wrongly known as The Book of The Dead). Here is a translation of some of these negative confessions. Some of them may seem repetitive, but this was probably caused by not being able to translate the exact intent of the original language.

- I have not done iniquity
- I have not robbed with violence
- I have not done violence
- I have not committed theft
- I have not slain man or woman
- I have not acted deceitfully
- I have not stolen the things which belong unto God
- I have not uttered falsehood
- I have not uttered evil words
- I have attacked no man
- I have not defiled the wife of a man
- I have not committed any sin against purity
- I have not struck fear into anyone
- I have not been a man of anger
- I have not made myself deaf to the words of right and truth

I have not stirred up strife
- I have abused no man
- I have not judged hastily
- I have not fouled water
- I have not behaved with insolence
- I have not sought for distinctions

The imperfect soul will be reborn again in a new physical vehicle (body) in order to provide the soul an opportunity for further development on earth. This cycle continues until the soul is perfected by fulfilling the forty-two Commandments, during his/her life on earth.

The Egyptians seemed to hinder the reincarnation process by mummifying the body. By maintaining the conditions of the physical vehicle, the soul was able to continue its existence in the unknown world of the Duat. As a result, the soul was eventually capable of working towards its own resurrection, and thence, excluding the necessity of another physical reincarnation.

The perfected soul will go through the process of transformation, and as the Egyptian writing describes it, "becomes a star and joins the company of Ra, and sails with him across the sky in his boat of millions of years".

THE LINK TO WESTERN CHRISTIANITY AND THE JESUS STORY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Above was a very short presentation of the basics of Egyptian religion. What the uneducated reader fails to recognize is that some of the above religious beliefs come from Astronomy, Astro-theology, and Nature worship and some do not.

Answer for yourself: How do we tell the difference? How can we discern truth from superstition?

The task might seem impossible but it is not. The Jewish people today have done it....now it is up to us to learn what they know and see the plagiarism of Astro-theology and Nature worship as connected to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua. The task is considerable but not impossible. Now begins the detailed study because until you are very familiar with the Osiris story and it's origin in the Stars and the influence of the Heavens upon the seasons and Mother nature then it is impossible to recognize this "Osiris pattern" let alone see it replayed in it's many forms as found in the Jesus of the New Testament. Understand again that for the Christian his "Holy Bible" is corrupted with these solar religious beliefs as handed down by the Sun worshipping Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, and the later Greek and Latin Church Fathers who shared similar Sun worship with the Essenes. Without knowledge of this "Osiris Pattern" we cannot pick up our Christian Bibles and be able to discern truth from fiction. We end up reading about Jesus and religious doctrines connected with him and his life portrayed in Rome's New Testament which cause unsuspecting believers to live their lives in idolatry and blasphemy and never knowing the horrible consequences of such things; that is until they acquire such knowledge.

Let your goal be this and this only: The recovery of Divine truth and the casting out of religious beliefs that has infected you with idolatry and blasphemy of the Creator because you have accepted by faith alone the Osiris story replayed through the Jesus of history. Now we continue our study to find the truth about the "Osiris Pattern" and the Jesus of History.

THE NETERU

In a previous article I introducted the reader to a new concpet: the Neteru as the "Attributes of God" as understood by the Ancient Egyptians. I shared a little about the neteru as the personifications of universal principles, functions and attributes of the one great and supreme God. The neteru who were called "gods" by some, were endorsed and incorporated into Christianity under a new name, "angels".

The Song of Moses in Deuteronomy (32:43), as found in a cave at Qumran, near the Dead Sea, mentions the word "gods" in the plural:

"Rejoice, 0 heavens, with him; and do obeisance to him, ye gods."

Answer for yourself: Does this reference by Moses to "gods" by one motivated by Monotheism seem strange? Does this principle possible indicate that the Essenes, who would find their home in Alexandria, Egypt, later were influenced not only by Egyptian religion but by the evolution and paganization of it in their day? The Essene answer will come later for we have not gotten that far yet but the answer you will find upon examination is "yes." I have devoted a whole website to this problem which you need to see for yourself if you want to know how these ancient Divine Revelation and truths and personifications of universal principles, functions and attributes of the one great and supreme God were latercorrupted by these Essenes in Alexandria and Qumran where these concepts once expressed as "attributes" of the One True God were later personified as if "real people" and later applied to Jesus; thereby making him God.

The passage we find in the New Testament (Hebrews, 1:6),

Heb 1:6 6 And again, when he bringeth in the firstbegotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him. (KJV) reveals to us the transformation of the idea of the neteru. The the word "gods" as understood by Moses in the Song of Songs pointed about above has been modifed. These attributes of the One True God now have a life of their own and they become "angels." The word for "gods" is substituted with "angels of God". Again this concept of the "neteru" shows the hidden influence of Egyptian religion not only among Judaism but even the movement later termed Christainity and because of this fact it is imperative to understand Egyptian religion in its eariest form as well as the corruption of it down through history if one wants to correctly understand both Judaism and the later corruption of Judaism and the simple Divine Revelation under Christian hands and Gentile Christianity. The term "angels", according to the Metaphysical Bible Dictionary, refers to those who "guard and guide and direct the natural forces of mind and body, which have in them the future of the whole man."

Angels, or neteru, are living energies. In the wisdom teaching of various cultures, these Causal Powers are called by many names including Agents, Angels, Conscious Thought Forms, Creative Energies, Devas, Fathers, Fountains, Gates, Governors, Hands of God, Lords, and Shining Ones.

Edwin C. Steinbrecher, an astrologer, metaphysician, and author of, The Inner Guide Meditation, says that angels are, "living energies that contain ideas and information, specific patterns of instinctual behavior and thought. They are the energies which somehow attach themselves, without our conscious awareness, to everything we meet in the world we call real. [They] are the life energies that pour out of each of us unceasingly night and day. . . influencing everyone in our lives and causing us to be influenced in return."

Just like the Egyptian's neteru, each "angel" has been given a name and specific function(s). And just as each neter of Egypt did not always take the same form and shape, so is the case for each angel. As your projection of them changes, so will their appearance. Sometimes, they are so blocked by the ego that you can only see their dim, hazy outlines. Many have seen angels change from a shining light to a form resembling a human being, then into a symbol (cube, triangle, etc.), and back to human features. Upon careful examination, the concept of the Egyptian neteru was accepted by ancient and modern societies, who merely chose new names to express Egyptian ideas. The neteru became angels.

THE TRIADS OF ANCIENT EGYPT

The energies represented by the various neteru may function together in groups or as individuals. The interaction between the neteru are expressed in myth, which is to be understood as the dramatization of cosmic and natural laws. We discussed the role of myth in an earlier article. The union of certain pairs of complementary energies/attributes (masculine and feminine forms) resulted in a third energy/attribute.

Some of the major Egyptian triads are:

- Amen-Mut- Khonsu
- Ausar (Osiris) - Auset (Isis) - Heru (Horus)
- Ptah - Sekhmet - Nefertum

This is not an odd concept, and it was copied in the trinity of the Christian faith. More on this later.

EGYPT AND THE ANGELS OF GOD

Ptah was, according to the Egyptian texts, the Father of the fathers of all neteroo (gods) ... Who bore himself and was not borne.

Ptah manifested himself in many ways and under many aspects, and, as such, the neteroo (gods) have their forms in Ptah and are nothing but Ptah.

The neteroo (gods) were the personification of the energies/powers/forces that, through their actions and interactions, created, maintained, and continue to maintain the universe. As such, there are numerous (several thousands) neteroo (gods) in the universe.

In order to simplify and convey the scientific and philosophical abstracts of the neteroo (gods), some fixed representations were invented. As a result, the figures of Ptah, Osiris, Amen, Horus, Ma-at, Mut, etc., became the signs of such attributes/functions/ forces/energies.

These figures were intended merely to fix the attention or represent abstract idea(s), and were not intended to be looked upon as real personages. Therefore, there was no prescribed form for a neter/netert, and the Egyptians believed that a neter/netert could take on any shape that a person desired.

The worshipping of a netert (goddess) like Isis was actually worshipping the mother principle. Those worshipping Osiris were worshipping the resurrection principle, . . .etc. Again Egypt understood that these principles and forces seen in the Cosmos were manifestations of the One True God. In reality such "worship" was the worship of the One True God in His many manifestations.

The Egyptians gave a neter/netert (god/goddess) different names. This should not confuse us when we deal with philosophical/scientific abstracts, which were called neteroo (gods). Names in ancient Egypt were not just labels. A name was like a short resume or synopsis of the principle.

As an example, let us review the neter Ra, who personifies the solar principle responsible for all creation. This solar prinaiple has different roles, in the universe. Let us review three such roles which were mentioned in the Unas Funerary (Pyramid) Texts:

- They cause thee to come into being as Ra, in his name of Khepri.
- Thou ascendest unto them like Ra, in his name of Ra.
- Thou turnest back from their presence like Ra, in his name of Atum.

- The aspect of Ra, at sunrise, was called Khepri (which means coming into being).
- When the sun is high in the heavens, Ra is fully Ra.
- The aspect of Ra, as the sun at the end of the day i.e. as the completing or setting sun, becomes Atum.

An Egyptian temple was the shrine for the neter (god), who represented some specific aspects of the One God. It was a model of the universe seen from the point of view of the neter (god), to which it was consecrated. Only the priesthood had access to the inner sanctuaries, where the sacred rites and ceremonies were performed. In some instances, only the King himself, or his authorized substitute, had permission to enter.

THE TRIADS

The energies represented by the various neteroo (gods) may function together in groups, or as individuals. The interaction between the neteroo (gods), which are usually expressed in myth, are to be understood as the dramatization of cosmic and natural laws. The union of certain pairs of complementary energies/attributes (masculine and feminine forms) resulted in a third energy/attribute.

There were numerous trinities in ancient Egypt. Some examples are:

- Amen - Mut - Khonsu
- Mar - Met - Heru (Osiris - Isis - Horus)
- Ptah - Sekhmet - Nefertum

SIMILARITIES WITH ANGELS

The concept of neteroo (gods), as the personifications of universal principles, functions and attributes of the one great and supreme God, was later acknowledged by others as angels.

Just like the Egyptianµs neteroo (gods), each angel was given a name and specific function(s).

Edwin C. Steinbrecher, an astrologer, metaphysician, and author of The Inner Guide Meditation, says that angels are "living energies that contain ideas and information, specific patterns of instinctual behavior and thought. They are the energies which somehow attach themselves, without our conscious awareness, to everything we meet in the world we call real. [They] are the lift energies that pour out of each of us unceasingly night and day... influencing everyone in our lives and causing us to be influenced in return."

And just as each neter (god) of Egypt may have several forms and shapes, so is the case for each angel. The spheres of angels in Christianity are comparable with ancient Egypt's hierarchy of neteroo (gods/goddesses). Both these spheres or hierarchies describe the realms to which our senses have no access, but which are necessary within the universal scheme of things.

SYMBOLISM AND NETEROO (GODS)

In Egyptian symbolism, the precise role of the neteroo (gods) was revealed in many ways: by dress, headdress, crowns, feathers, animal, plant, color, position, size, gesture, sacred object, or type of symbolic equipment (e.g., flail, scepter, staff, ankh). Only those initiated into symbolic language - can contemplate a wealth of physical, physiological, psychological and spiritual data, in all the symbols. Compare the same concept to a modern-day caricature in the newspaper.

Crowns and ceremonial headdress of the neteroo (gods, goddesses) were never found, because they were symbols and not real.

The hieroglyph for a neter is a human figure dressed in the shepherd's long robe, and seated in the classic shepherd's pose as he tends his flock. Asar/Heru (Osiris/ Horus) was portrayed as the Perfect Shepherd (the good Shepherd).

Neteroo (gods) were always shown in action because God never sleep and is always acting in this continous Creation that is ever expanding and growing.

MADE IN THE IMAGE OF GOD???

According to the bible, Mankind was created in the Image of God. Mankind has written many volumes as to what this means but few have taken the time to research the ancients and their understanding of this concept. Let us not forget that it was the ancients who wrote this phrase in the first place and surely they above all would know what they intended by such a statement. It is we today who have lost our connection with these ancients and their documents which cause us to arrive at alternate meanings for concepts and ideas that they never intended or every taught. Simply said; we often are wrong about much of what we confess and believe.

The very mention of "mankind being made in the image of God" poses a very interesting question as to the descriptive Appearance of God.

- Answer for yourself: If we are, indeed, fashioned in the Image of God, does this mean therefore, that God is Man, or does He (God) have the Appearance of Man?
- Answer for yourself: Now, if we envision God in the Likeness of Man, does this include human frailties?

We, as humans, are Dependent upon the universe for our survival. We can not exist without, Fire, Earth, Air and Water.

- Answer for yourself: Is it possible that the Creator God could be likewise dependent upon the Elements.

In order to get to the bottom of this concept and arrive at it's intended meaning by those who framed it then it becomes necessary to review the bible verses concerning Creation:

- Gen 1:26 And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.
- Gen. 1:27 So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

These verses are unequivocal and clear. And according to these verses,

We look like God and have the Characteristics of God almighty. We have His Image!

Answer for yourself: But what does the word "image" mean?

- 1. A reproduction of the form of a person or an object, especially a sculptured likeness.
- 2. [Physics] An optically formed duplicate, counterpart, or other representative reproduction of an object, especially an optical reproduction of an object formed by a lens or mirror.
- 3. One that closely or exactly resembles another; a double:

And we have His Likeness.

Answer for yourself: But what does the word "likeness" mean?

The American Heritage Dictionary states:

likeness

- 1. The state, quality, or fact of being like; resemblance.
- 2. An imitative appearance; a semblance.
- 3. A pictorial, graphic, or sculptured representation of something; an image.

SYNONYMS: likeness, similarity, similitude, resemblance, analogy, affinity. These nouns denote agreement or conformity, as in character, nature, or appearance between persons or things.

Likeness implies close agreement:

Please understand that it is not my intention to make a play on words. These definitions (from the American Heritage Dictionary*)* get to the heart of what these verses actually mean, in Genesis. These two words , Image and Likeness, define not only appearance but even the Nature and Quality of the Creation (Image).

- Answer for yourself: Can you imagine the Creator God, being subject to the same needs, weaknesses, and limitations that we endure? I find that rather difficult to comprehend. Some writers say that our likeness to God refers to the spirit and not to flesh. This English word Spirit is derived from the Latin, spiritus, which means breath or to breathe, the act of inhaling and exhaling.
- Answer for yourself: So what are we saying, that God breathes as we do?
- Answer for yourself: Again, are we making God dependent upon a product of His creation, that is to say air, which is the vital constituent of human respiration?

Let us define the word spiritual, which may be more on target to defining the Godly Image which some say we are created after.

spiritual

- 1. [adjective] Of, relating to, consisting of, or having the nature of spirit; not tangible or material. a good synonym would be the word "immaterial."
- 2. Of, concerned with, or affecting the soul.
- 3. Of, from, or relating to God; deific.
- 4. Of or belonging to a church or religion; sacred.
- 5. Relating to or having the nature of spirits or a spirit; supernatural.

This word spiritual seems to indicate that which is unseen and immaterial, unearthly, that which relates to our soul.

Answer for yourself: Now what is a Soul? Again, let me present another definition from the American Heritage Dictionary, soul

- 1. [noun] The animating and vital principle in human beings, credited with the faculties of thought, action, and emotion and often conceived as an immaterial entity.
- 2. The spiritual nature of human beings, regarded as immortal, separable from the body at death, and susceptible to happiness or misery in a future state.
- 3. The disembodied spirit of a dead human being; a shade.

Take note that the definition of the word, soul, goes to our actions, our thoughts, our emotions .This is very interesting.

- Answer for yourself: Should we conclude that our emotional makeup is an accurate reflection of Gods demeanor?
- Answer for yourself: Could God possibly be subject to the same emotional hangups as we?

Please remember, we are trying to determine through a system of questions and analysis, exactly what it means to be created in the Image of God

If we conclude that we are the spiritual image of God, but not the physical image ,we end up with a real Pandora's Box. Without doubt, the state of today's world reflects spiritual corruption, in every facet of life. The spirit seems to be subject to the same or similar temptations and weaknesses as the flesh.

- Mat 26:4 1 Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.
- Eph 6:12 For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

Without doubt, we possess a spirit, which is corruptible.

Answer for yourself: Can this be a true reflection of God's Image?

I think we could go on for hundreds of pages, trying to explain with accuracy, in what manner mankind, was created in the image of God, and not come to a definitive solution; That is, if we try to make our conclusion agree with traditional Western religious precepts. This is where we have failed; trying to understand Eastern ideas with a Western mindset!

GETTING TO THE HEART OF THE ISSUE

As, with many of our commonly accepted religious concepts., our traditional beliefs and understandings of being created in the Image of God are in Error. I have gone through this brief litany of the most commonly held interpretations, concerning the image and likeness, in which we were created, for the purpose of exposing the artificiality of our most popular concepts on this matter. Being created in the Image of God does not mean, what most of us have believed throughout our lives. When the Ancients wrote that we were created in God's Image, they were propounding a hypotheses based on human correlations to the Cosmos. Correlations that are Exact to the smallest detail as you will begin to see as you continue your reading and study with Bet Emet Ministries.

THE ANCIENTS KNEW THAT MANKIND WAS BIOLOGICALLY CORRELATED TO THE COSMOS...IT WE WHO HAVE FORGOTTEN THIS TODAY

Many thousands of years ago, at the dawn of history, if there is really such a time as a dawn to history, the Ancients discovered undeniable correlations between the biology of the human species and the movements of celestial bodies within the stellar and solar universe. Correlations proportionately related in Time (duration) and Chronology (sequence) of Time. These correlations exist between the human species and the total universe, inclusive of the solar system, and of the Solar system to the expanded universe (infinity).

Now read the next sentence slowly with much deep thought. The Ancients saw the universe and their immediate environment as well as the capacities embodied within their own intellect as the most trustworthy representations of the Creator God. The Universe (terrestrial and celestial) appeared to our ancestors as the only authentic image of the Father.

Ps 19:1-2 1 The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork. 2 Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. (KJV)

The Cosmos was undoubtedly His Handiwork, and we, the Human creation was likewise the Handiwork of the Almighty.

In consequence , when our fathers discovered that they were indeed biologically and chronologically correlated to the Cosmos, they transcribed this knowledge to the written word and language as, We (humanity) are created in the Image and the Likeness of God.

LET US EXAMINE SOME OF THESE CORRELATIONS

One of the most noticeable correlations involves the life and light cycles of the female species of mankind to the moon. They discovered by critical examination of the cosmos the correlation between the life (menstrual) cycle of the woman that ran 28 days in correspondence with the light (phase) cycle of the moon, which also runs at 28 day intervals. [Remember this number "28" as we will find it again interpolated into the Osiris myth later in a subsequent article].

They noticed likewise that the phases of the woman's' cycle and the moon's cycle were relational. The New moon begins in darkness and waxes to it's fullness at 14 days (midway through the cycle of light).. When the moon reaches it's fullness, after 14 days of growth (waxing), it then commences to discharge it's light so that by the end of the 28 day period all light has been shed (flushed) from it's celestial body. [Remember this number "14" as we will find it again interpolated into the Osiris myth later in a subsequent article].

The life (menses) cycle of the woman likewise begins in darkness (undeveloped). At the beginning of the cycle (out of darkness, i.e. undeveloped) the egg begins to grow within the ovary until it reaches maturity (fullness) at 14 days, at which point it (the egg) is released and flows toward the uterus from whence it shall be discharged (shed) from the body. If the egg is fertilized, it shall be discharged after an appointed time (280 days, the natural period of human gestation) as a new individual. If the egg is not fertilized, it shall be discharged in one tenth of the appointed time (28 days, the natural period of human menstruation) as the dead remains of a once fertile germ of life (light).

The ancients also observed that the human body did not reach fullness in physical and intellectual potential till approximately eighteen years after birth. They reasoned that eighteen years seemed to represent a complete cycle of life, from birth to Adulthood. Likewise the moon, which they associated with the 28 day life cycle took a little over eighteen years to complete the cycle of it's Nodes. The Node represents the point of intersection of the Moon with the ecliptic (the apparent path of the sun around the earth), both north (Caput Draconis) and south (Cauda Draconis). It takes the Moon a little more than eighteen and a half years to complete this cycle (revolution), and restart anew, from it's original point of commencement. To complete a cycle is the same as reaching maturity. Both terms indicate a coming into fulfillment. [So again see the correlation of the 18 years of the moon's cycle of it's nodes related to the cycle of mankinds growth from birth to adulthood].

The Ancients studied even further into the relational parallels between the human species and the solar system. Within the chronology of the Solar System, they found analogies, that can only be described as astounding and categorically conclusive in proving the correlative link between humanity (the microcosm) and the universe (the macrocosm). The ancients understood this as Mankind being created in the image and nature of the Creator whose revealed Himself to them in the created Cosmos.

At this point, we shall explore the Osiris myth and the Osiris pattern and then examine similar correlations as they relate to the astrological (astronomical) foundations of the Christ Myth which is written into our New Testaments!

A BRIED HISTORY OF EGYPTIAN ASTROLOGY & THE ROLE OF THE NILE

In the beginning, astrology and religion were very closely connected. Astronomy and astrology were the same science--the split came only during modern times when it became expedient for the Church to redirect attention toward dogma and the scientific schools were looking to elevate logical study of the heavens by displacing the current science, much the same way allopathic medicine has displaced naturopathic medicine. Long before recorded history, the stars, sun, moon, eclipses, etc., were studied by men who charted the heavens and helped their contemporaries to understand the events and goings-on as they endured and celebrated with the "as above, so below" philosophy that still does and always will prevail in astrological thought. Because of these attempts to harness the knowledge of the heavens, calenders were made possible. Eventually, the ancient star mappers were able to see the power each of the planets, the sun, the moon and even the eclipses had on people and nations here below. The sun, being the most powerful, correlates to the individual or nation as a representation of self, which is why sun sign astrology has become so popular.

EGYPTIAN ASTROLOGY & THE NILE

From about 3,000 BCE to 300 BCE, astrology and religion were synonymous in practice with the priests holding the knowledge of the heavens. The main focus of life in Egypt was the Nile River and it is not surprising that water is a basic imagery used in Egyptian astrology. The sky became a large river (a goddess named Nut) and the lesser gods crossed the sky-river in boats. From this came the custom of supplying deceased pharaohs, with all they would need to cross the great river. The Egyptians believed the sun god controlled the Nile River and made it possible for the Nile to flood its banks making agriculture possible. The moon and Venus held superior places also.

In the beginning, the Egyptians divided the sky into 36 sections. These 36 sections became what the Greek astrologers called the dekanoi (ten days apart) and come down to us in tact as the decanates, which we still use today. Later, the sky was divided into 12 sections and each section was given a name and assigned three stars. Each was given a boat to cross the sky river. There as a special deity or god for each month and each day of the year.

Individual chart forecasting using the date of birth was first developed by the Egyptians in the 5th century BCE. Until that time astrology was used, as in other cultures, to predict wide-scale common events like weather, war, famine and leadership issues.

THE NILE AND ITS ROLE IN EGYPTIAN RELIGION

They come, the waters of life which are in the sky, They come, the waters of life which are in the earth The sky is aflame for you, the earth trembles for you, before the divine birth [of Osiris-Nile]. The two mountains are split apart. The god comes into being, the god has power in his body... The month is born, the fields live, (Pyramid Texts, 2063.)

Egyptian religion can be summarized with this cliche: "As above, so beneath." Egypt new that all life came from the Creator in the Heavens and this life was manifested in the same pattern in Egypt. Egypt was the carbon-copy of Heaven. Let us explain.

The ancient Egyptians interpreted every occurrence in terms of the relationship between natural and supernatural forces. Those phenomena that figured prominently in their lives included:

- NATURE: the annual cycle of the Nile River's flood, the enormous size and unchanging harshness of the surrounding desert, and
- CELESTIAL: the daily cycle of the sun's appearance in the east, gradual movement across the sky, and eventual disappearance in the west (symbolic of birth, life, death, rebirth) along with the movement of the stars and the constellations

The ancient Egyptians developed a world view in which these and other events and conditions were attributed to the actions of multiple, related gods and goddesses.

Egypt, the nation, is the work of the Nile. First it hollowed out its bed in the immense plateau of desert limestone and sandstone. Then, during the course of thousands of years, it deposited its alluvium at the bottom of the narrow valley, forming the arable ground. It was on the Nile, and on the amplitude of its annual flood, that the entire life of ancient Egypt depended; for rain is very rare. Egypt can look like a lush oasis if the Nile flood comes "in its day", or else a country made desolate by famine if the river fails to rise or if its rising is insufficient. What I say next is critical to further understanding of this website: the Nile's behavior throughout the year was carefully studied and the celestial signs accompanying its annual flood and receding were minutely observed and recorded. These observations of the Nile were at the same time associated with observations of the Heavens, constellations, and stars and these observations were associated and related to the Nile's flooding and receding throughout the year. From this comes the myth which reveals Egypt's understanding of the Divine Revelation of God in the Heavens, in the Earth, and in mankind as well. This is the heart of Egyptian Religion: the message of God which is the same spoken by Him in the Heavens above, the Earth below, and in human body as well.

Egypt is the image of the skies, where the divine beings sail the "waters on high"; and so the Nile has a heavenly as well as an earthly source. Its flood transforms Egypt into a vast sea, likened to the primordial ocean, the Nun. The Nile is thus an integral part of myth. Its periodic rise and fall are associated with the allegory and myth of Osiris, which teaches us divine principle of perpetual return, death and rebirth, as symbolized by the annual cycle of vegetation that accompanies the rise of the Nile and its recession.

The ancient Egyptians were a religious people. Two of the earliest religious cults were sun and nature. As an agricultural society, they depended upon the cyclical nature of the Nile floods to replenish the lands with fertile topsoil and they depended upon the sun to help produce a bountiful harvest. Witnessing the natural processes of the earth likely influenced their beliefs in the afterlife. Kamil explains,

"The sun and the river, which together formed the dominating cause of existence, made a profound impression on the people. They were two natural forces with both creative and destructive power. For the life-giving rays of the sun that caused the crop to grow could also cause it to shrivel and die. And the river that invigorated the soil with its life-giving silt could destroy whatever lay in its path or, if it failed to rise sufficiently, bring famine. The sun and the river, moreover, shared in the pattern of death and rebirth: the sun 'died' when it sank on the western horizon only to be 'reborn' in the eastern sky the following morning. And the 'death' of the land followed by the germination or 'rebirth' of the crops each year were directly connected with the river's annual flood. Rebirth was, therefore a central feature of the Egyptian scene. It was seen as a natural sequence to death and undoubtedly lay at the root of the ancient Egyptian conviction of life after death. Like the sun and the crops, man, they felt assured, would rise again to live a second life."

Such religious beliefs pervaded society. Egyptians often buried their dead on the West bank of the Nile River presumably due to their belief that the underworld was located in the west where the sun died each day. Relatives of the dead often buried miniature boats in their tombs to transport the soul in the afterlife. Like many other tomb artifacts, these were often marked with symbols of the sun God Re.

Now we can understand how the ancient Egyptian religion was centered in the belief of an afterlife. The Nile played a role in this belief by symbolizing life and afterlife. As mentioned above all tombs and burial places of the Ancient Egyptians, including pyramids, are located on the West Bank of the Nile River (Egyptian State Information Service, Ancient Religion). Many historians believe this is because the Egyptians knew that the Sun rose in the East, supposedly symbolizing birth, and set in the West, symbolizing death. Because of this, all Ancient Egyptians are buried on the West Bank of the Nile, and the West Bank of the Nile became a symbol of the connection of life on earth and the afterlife.

This is how the Nile played a significant role not only in the basic beliefs of Ancient Egyptian religion, but also in their belief in the afterlife.

Ancient travellers to Egypt were told by the priests that the source of the Nile was at the first cataract, at Bigah or Elephantine, where the river surged forth from the Calf (or Lower Leg) of Osiris, the divine relic preserved here. But as it is well known that the banks of the Nile upstream from Elephantine are dotted with ancient Egyptian temples, it is obvious that the source was known to be much further beyond, to the south.

{short description of image}

O Osir! The inundation is coming; abundance rushes in, The flood-season is coming, arising from the torrent issuing from Osir. (0 King) may Heaven give birth to thee as Orion! (Pyramid Texts 1944, 2113-2117.)

The Pyramid Texts tell us that Osiris, son of Nut, the Sky, and Geb, the Earth, inherited his father's throne, but was overthrown by his brother Seth, principle of discord. Plutarch transmits the whole legend as follows:

In the very distant past, after having completely organized and civilized the land of Egypt, Osiris confided the care and governing of the country to Isis, his sister, and left for the south in order to teach agriculture, the laws of harmony, and the ways of worshipping the divine powers, to the still savage peoples of those regions.

When, after a long absence, Osiris returned to Egypt, Seth and his seventy-two accomplices trapped him in an ambush. They enclosed him in a coffin made to fit his dimensions and they threw it into one of the arms of the Nile. It was carried out to sea and floated northward until the waves washed it ashore at Byblos in Lebanon. A magnificent tree grew up around the coffin, and the king of that country, when he heard of this marvel, had the tree cut down to make a column in his palace.

Isis, meanwhile, having heard from the whispers of the winds what had become of Osiris, set out in search for him. Arriving one day at Byblos, and transformed into a swallow, she flew around and around the column. Finally she succeeded in bringing the sarcophagus back to Egypt, where she hid it in a remote part of the Delta. But one night when Seth was hunting by the full moon he discovered it, seized the body of Osiris, cut it into fourteen pieces and scattered them all over the country.

So Isis, aided by her sister Nepthys, set out in quest of the parts of Osiris' body. As she found each part, she buried it in the place where it had come to rest, as a sacred relic. Thus, the head was preserved in a reliquary at Abydos, an ear was to be found at Sais in the Delta, and the left lower leg, the Calf of Osiris, on the Isle of Bigah where, as the legend says, the sources of the Nile spring forth.

A bas-relief in the temple adjoining the Nilometer on the nearby island of Philae shows the sources of the Nile symbolically. A serpent's body outlines a cave in some rocks, within which Hapy, the personification of the Nile, pours water from the two vases he holds in his hands. One cannot help but be struck by the coincidence that the zodiacal sign of Aquarius (the Waterbearer) is symbolized by the vase, and that the lower leg, which is the part of the body assigned to its influence in astrology, is enshrined as the local relic.

According to Plutarch, the Egyptians saw the Nile was the personification of the outflow of Osiris (his seed) fertilizing the earth as the body of Isis (ovum/womb). Thus, in becoming intermixed with the soil, the Nile-Osiris fecundates the Earth-Isis (we have the beginning of life). The most enlightened among the priests, he says, specify that Osiris is the principle of all that which is humid, the power and cause of all generation, the substance of every seed, the definitive symbol of all death and rebirth. Inversely, the opposite of life is death and this is personified in the Osiris myth as Seth-Typhon (personification of opposition/death); the principle of all that which burns, consumes. He has red hair, for example, for he represents the desert rocks, arid and sterile.

According to the Osiris myth Osiris murdered by his brother. The ambush laid by Seth-Typhon for Osiris, continues Plutarch, represents the intensity of dryness which evaporates the Nile's waters and narrows them to the riverbed. The presence among Seth's accomplices of the Ethiopian queen Aso represents the burning south winds which indeed blow during the months preceding the flood. Likewise the smothering of Osiris in his coffin represents the low water-mark which, in Egypt, is exceptionally important. The flood itself symbolizes Osiris's annual resurrection.

In the Temple of Philae the inundation of the Nile is pictured in a bas-relief in which the Nile, described as "Hapy, Father of the Neterw" (divine entities/attributes of the One True God), again with two streams of water, moistens a basin in which plants are growing. In this capacity the Nile is like God...the Life Bringer! In this basin stands "the soul of Osiris", the human-headed Benu bird, the phoenix, itself a symbol of the Nile flood and of the incessant cycles of rebirth. Next to this scene "Horus, Son of Isis" holds a triple palm, sign of the new year which begins with the inundation, and three vases from which flows a stream of ankh symbols or "keys of life", flanked by two streams of water. Horus has assumed for this occasion the ibis head, characteristic of Thoth, Master of Time, whose name belongs to the first month of the year. Horus makes libation "to his father Sokar-Osiris", who is followed by his two sisters, Isis and Nepthys.

According to a tradition transmitted by the Coptic calendar still in use during the last century, the Nile's flood was announced during the "Night of the Drop" at which time a "tear of Isis, coming from Heaven, falls in the river, causing it to swell". Plutarch writes that the souls of the divine entities shine in the stars: "Sirius is the one consecrated to Isis, for it brings the water." Similarly, the constellation of Orion, which appears just before the Dog Star (Sirius), is assigned to Osiris.

Such legends as these, based on actual facts, reflect the unique nature of the Nile: 6700 kilometres (over 4000 miles) long, a sixth of the earth's circumference, and capable at its flood of providing a massive flow of water, sixty times greater than its normal volume, after covering a stretch of more than 1000 kilometres (over 600 miles) without a single tributary. Throughout history it has incited admiration by the breadth and contemplative majesty of its flow, and curiosity by its exceptional rhythm. Contrary to other rivers, the Nile begins its annual swelling in the hottest time of the year, at the beginning of the Dog Days, at the beginning of the year, that is, at the moment when Sirius rises at the same time as the sun, a date which during the third millennium BC coincided with the summer solstice.

This coincidence between the heliacal rising of Sirius and the beginning of the inundation marked, from the earliest moments of Pharaonic history, the beginning of the year, as is witnessed by this small ivory tablet which belonged to the second king of the First Dynasty. The helical rising of a star is when a star or planet rises at the same time as the Sun. More commonly it refers to the date when the star or planet first becomes visible in the dawn sky. The ancient Egyptians looked for the annual heliacal rising of the star Sirius as the signal that the Nile river was about to flood its banks.

On this ivory tablet mentioned above is inscribed, "Sirius, Opener of the year, Inundation,". Isis-Sirius is represented by a cow wearing the symbol of the year between its horns; this same symbol is found employed again three thousand years later in the famous circular zodiac at Dendera.

Given the accurate correspondences between the myth and the Nile's actual behavior, one naturally begins to suspect that the priests really knew more about its sources than their continued insistence on the Bigah story would suggest. We will find throughout the religion of Egypt the interrelationships between the Nile, the Sun, the stars and constellations as related to birth, life, death, and resurrection (rebirth). Egypt saw this message of creation, life, existence, and destruction of life only to be reborn not only in the Heavens but Nature and Mankind as well. From this cycle and pattern exhibited by God developed an extensive mythology explaining such a Divine Message. Some look at Egypt and their understanding of the simple Revelation from God seen in the Heavens and Nature and see only paganism and polytheism. Others who look more closely see the Ethical Monotheism of Egyptian religion which later becomes the source for the three world's great religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

In a hymn to "The Lord of Eternity" we read,

0 sole God who hast no equal, Thou hast created them according to thy heart...The mountainous countries, Syria, Sudan-Ethiopia And the plain of Egypt...

Thou createst the Nile in the Dwat [Beyond] and bringest it forth at thy pleasure to give life to the people. Thou makest every nation live, however distant it may be. Thou hast set a Nile in Heaven which descends for them and makes currents of water on the mountains like the great green (sea), watering their fields in their settlements.

How excellent are thy ways, 0 Lord of Eternity! A Nile in Heaven is the gift that thou hast made to the foreign countries, and to all the beasts of the mountain which walk upon foot, just like the Nile which comes from the Dwat for the Beloved Land [of Egypt].* (N. de G. Davis, The Rock Tombs of El Amarna, VI.)

We shall see in our further study just how the Nile river interrelates with the Egyptian's understanding of God, the Sun and stars, and eventually in the religious doctrines that come from this understanding which later become the foundation for many of the Judeo-Christian religious beliefs we have today.

Let us continue.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE HEAVENS UPON RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

It has been said that the way people look at the universe has a lot to do with what they believe and how they behave. I have found that to be true.

In this age of urbanization and artificial light, it is difficult to appreciate the paramount importance of the sky to our ancestors. Digital watches and desk calendars are readily available; there is no need to watch the sky to tell the time of day or the year. And under the lights of our cities, we can scarcely see anything overhead-the night is diluted. Most of the stars are fainter than the background of scattered light. For city dwellers, the night sky is preserved only under the dome of the local planetarium. We have struggled-successfully-to shelter ourselves from the elements, and we have managed to shut out the sky. In the process, we also have removed ourselves from one of the fundamental components of our culture.

For most of the history of humankind, going back to stone age times, the sky has served as a tool. Just as the hands of the first people grasped the flints they crafted, so their brains grasped the sky. The regularity of the motions of celestial objects enabled them to orient themselves in time and space. And just as their culture was partly a product of the tools they made with their hands-axes and arrowheads, needles and spear-throwers-likewise the culture was also shaped by their perceptions of the sky. From the sky they gained-and we, their descendants, have inherited-a profound sense of cyclic time, of order and symmetry, and of the predictability of nature. In this awareness lie not only the foundations of science but of our view of the universe and our place in it.

For our ancestors, what went on in the sky was metaphor. It meant something. It was both the symbol of the principles that they felt ordered their lives and the force behind those principles. There was power in the sky. The- sides resonated with the phases of the moon; the seasons fell into place in concert with the sun and stars; the world and its inhabitants followed the seasons. Modern, urbanized peoples have lost this sense of coherence between what goes on in the sky and in their lives, but some traditional peoples still have it. The ancients understood that the sky orders our psyches and our societies, and they expressed the bond between their intellects and sky in their works: in calendars and clocks; in star maps and almanacs; in gods and in myths; in ceremony, costume, and dance; in temples and in tombs. Sometimes they symbolized this bond on the ceiling, sometimes on the floors of their sacred places. They embedded it in the layout of their cities. They incorporated it on playing boards for games. They carved it on boundary stones that commemorated a royal grant of land to a loyal subject. They wove it into the protocol of kingship and social organization. Some used the sky to assess the state of the world. Others looked up into the darkness to prognosticate the future.

LOOKING THROUGH THE EYES OF OUR ANCESTORS

Most of us have lost touch with the sky, but we are reminded of our old heritage, now and then, when the colors of sunset recapture us and we stop and watch the last gleam of sun slip behind the dark silhouette of a distant horizon. Alarm clocks awake us now instead of the morning songs of the birds, but it is still possible to experience the sense of renewal our ancestors found in the dawn. All we have to do is rise before sunup and wait for the first warm beams of light to spill over the landscape. By traveling outside our cities we can see the same stars people have watched for at least tens of thousands of years. Few of us have jobs and life-styles that permit us to live with the sky, as our ancestors did, but even a glimpse lets us feel what they felt.

To really know the sky, however, you have to keep watching it. A glance won't take it in, and it does change-from hour to hour, day to day, month to month, year to year, and in even longer cycles of appalling spans of time. If we take the trouble to notice them, the shorter cycles can be sensed just as our ancestors sensed them.

From one simple cycle, the earth's daily rotation, time is metered and directions are set. The cycle begins in the morning when the sun rises. By this we mean it crosses the horizon, that boundary between the earth spread out around us and the sky stretched out above. The original meaning for horizon is "boundary" or "limit," and our sense of territory, or bounded space, may owe something to the perception that the earth ends at the "edge" of the sky. As far as our eyes are concerned it does not matter if we know the earth to be round or if we think it flat. At any particular spot we are surrounded by the rim of the horizon.

Eventually the sun returns to the horizon-once it disappears the sky grows darker, and within an hour stars begin to shine overhead. By watching these stars closely, we see that most of them do the same thing the sun did. These stars rise, they pass over the world, and they set just like the sun. Those that were near the position of the setting sun follow it below the horizon in the early evening. Others, just rising when the sun went down, may be up the entire night. All the stars still in the sky at dawn vanish in the twilight as the sun brings day back to the world.

This reliable pattern of day and night [light and dark] is the sky's first cycle in the passage of time. Day and night are apportioned by the journey of the sun and stars across the sky. It is a parade animated by the spinning earth. We stand on the earth but we don't sense its motion. Instead we see the earth's motion reflected in the sky. Our planet rotates from west to east, and to us, it looks like the pageant is rolling from east to west.

East is the realm of risings (resurrection). Settings occur in the west (death). These directions acquire meaning because of the celestial events that define them, and these events have, in turn, symbolic meaning of their own. When we speak of east in a general sense-and not due east-we refer to the half of the horizon where celestial objects can appear. They are, in a sense, "born" there, and we associate birth, creation, and life with the east. East in Latin is orient, a word which derives from the verb "to rise." West, on the other hand, is occident, and similarly related to the verb "to fall." Ancient peoples equated settings of the sun and the other celestial objects to their "deaths," and we still speak of "sunset years" as a metaphor for old age. For many cultures the west was the land of the dead, and in World War I a soldier killed in action was said to have "gone west." The widely read novel The Lord of the Rings concludes as the two main characters, Frodo and Bilbo, in old age and at the end of an era, depart their homelands for "the West."

Some stars are placed so that they never descend beneath the horizon; throughout the day and night, they follow circular courses having a common center, a spot that never moves. In our era, in the northern hemisphere, an almost motionless star in Ursa Minor nearly occupies that spot. It is Polaris. The name refers to the north celestial pole, the center of the circular paths followed by the stars that never set. Just as the earth spins around its "pole," the sky appears to turn around this unique spot, and the stars that complete circles around it are called circumpolar stars. If we face the north celestial pole, the stars turn counterclockwise around it, but below the earth's equator, in the southern hemisphere, we see stars moving clockwise in rings around a similar spot, the south celestial pole. No bright object points it out, but the daily movement of the stars would make it noticed.

Pole, in the sense we have used it here, derives from the word for "stake," and the concept behind the word is a pole that reaches to the canopy of the sky, supports it, and acts as the pivot of the sky's daily rotation. It is a cosmic axis and is described in the mythologies of various peoples as a mountain, as an actual pole, as a tree, or as some other sky-piercing staff. In any event, the pole of the sky is a special place, a motionless reference in a moving sky.

By following an imaginary line from the steady beacon of Polaris straight down to the horizon, we locate the direction north. It is because Polaris defines this direction for us in the northern hemisphere that it is also called the North Star. And once we've found north, the other three cardinal directions, south, east, and west, are automatically defined. Between the cardinal compass points are the intercardinal directions, northeast, northwest, southeast, and southwest, in the center of each quarter arc of horizon.

SEEING THE SEASONS IN THE SUN AND STARS

Time slides through the seasons, and this too shows up in the sky. This cycle is a long one. It takes a year, the length of time in which the earth orbits the sun. Again, we don't sense the motion directly but follow it by observing daily changes in the positions of the sun and the stars until, after a year's time, they return to their original starting places.

During each circuit of the sun, the earth spins around about 365¼ times. There are, therefore, 365¼ days in a year, and shifts in the sun's daily path measure out the annual cycle. The measurement is made this way: From any place we care to stand, we can notice the direction in which sunrise occurs. If we are in the northern hemisphere, once every year, in winter, the sun comes up far to the southeast, as far south of east as we will ever see it from our chosen sunwatching station. Although the sunrise seems to reappear in the same spot on three successive mornings, it gradually edges north until-half a year later, in summer-it occurs far to the northeast, at its northern limit. For several days, the point of sunrise lingers there, but it eventually reverses its movements again and returns toward the south, parceling out the second half of the year until the sunrise is back at its southern limit and winter returns. This annual seasonal cycle, which is mirrored by the moving point of sunset along the western half of the horizon, then begins once more. Thus, by the passage of the sun, time is regulated in an orderly sequence of days and years.

When the sunrise occurs at its southern extreme, in the southeast quarter of the horizon, we say it is the day of the winter solstice. Both the event and the date bear this name, and solstice literally means "sun stand still," an acknowledgment that sunrise (and sunset) dawdles for a while before reversing its course along the eastern horizon. Similarly, the northern limit is reached on the summer solstice. Although these limits of sunrise occur in the general direction of northeast and southeast, they do not necessarily coincide with those intercardinal directions. The exact positions of the limits depend upon latitude. The farther you travel from the earth's equator, the farther north and south the solstices occur.

Midway between its northern and southern extremes, the sun rises due east and sets due west. This occurs twice a year, once when the sunrise is headed north and again six months later when the sun returns south. Both events are called the equinox-in spring the vernal equinox and in fall the autumnal equinox.

Equinox means "equal night," and on either equinox, the duration in hours, say, of daylight is equal to the length of night. At the winter solstice, the nights are long and the days are short. By contrast, short nights and long days prevail in summer. The sun is up longer in summer because it follows a longer path that arcs high through the sky. The winter sun passes low over the southern sky. Its path is short, and the daylight hours are few. At the equinoxes the sun's course falls halfway between these two extremes, higher than the winter solstice sun and lower than the summer.

It is the height of the sun's course in the sky, not the distance of the earth from the sun, that determines whether it is winter or summer. In fact, it is in January, during winter in the northern hemisphere, that the earth comes closest to the sun (about 3 percent closer than in July, when it is farthest away). Seasonal changes in temperature result, instead, from variations in how directly the earth is heated. This depends, in turn, on the angle at which sunlight strikes our spot on the earth. A low winter sun means the sunlight arrives from a low angle, hits the earth at a slant, and spreads widely over it. Heating is less efficient, and the weather is colder. In summer the high path of the sun provides more direct sunlight and more intense heating.

The height of the sun's path varies from season to season because the axis of the earth's rotation is tilted in space. On one side of the earth's orbit, the sun shines more directly on the northern hemisphere, and the sun appears to rise and set in the north. On the orbit's other side, the tilted earth now exposes its southern hemisphere to the most direct sunlight. Below the equator it is summer, but in the north the sun appears to rise and set in the south. Winter is in the air. All of the seasonal changes we experience are products of this simple arrangement of the earth in space.

If we continue looking at the sky with our ancestors' eyes, we shall see that there are also gradual, nightly changes in the stars as well as in the daytime path of the sun across the sky. At first glance, the night sky can be bewildering to anyone who is unfamiliar with its geography. It seems as though the stars are innumerable, but this is not so. About 8,000 stars can be seen with the unaided eye over the entire sky, both the half we see overhead and the half obstructed by the earth below our feet. At any moment, this number is greatly reduced, of course, because half the sky can't be seen at all and because stars low in the sky are obscured by the atmosphere. Perhaps as many as 2,500 can be seen at one time under the best conditions. This is still quite a few, but a little practice soon makes them familiar. They are not all the same, and they are not strewn uniformly upon the sky. The brighter ones are like landmarks, and in combination with fainter stars around them they seem to form distinctive arrangements and shapes. These patterns, or "pictures," are called constellations.

PRECESSION

For all practical purposes, the configurations of the stars and the form of the Milky Way do not change. Tens of thousands of years will have to pass before the Big Dipper looks like something else.

The stars very slowly shift the seasons of their appearances, however. In 13,000 years or so, Scorpius will herald winter, and Orion will rule the summer sky. These gradual changes reflect another celestial cycle-precession.

Precession is the product of gravity. The sun and the moon, pulling on the earth's equatorial bulge, cause our planet to wobble. This means that each time the earth returns to a particular place in its orbit around the sun-to the spot it occupies at the vernal equinox, say-its axis is pointing at a slightly different place in the sky. In fact, from one moment to the next, the axis is adjusting, but the effect is very small and is only measurable cumulatively, after several years. For the ancients it took centuries to see the shift. The pole, then, slips around a circle through the northern stars. Sometimes one star is the pole star and sometimes another; during some centuries there is no pole star at all.

The wobble of the earth is a bit like that of a top, but what takes only a moment for a top is a grand and stately cycle when mirrored in the apparent movements of the constellations. The entire cycle takes nearly 26,000 years. During this period the sun occupies different constellations-at an equinox or solstice, say-depending upon where in the cycle we are. For example, in our era, Pisces, the fishes, is the home of the vernal equinox sun. It began to appear there at that time of year about 2,000 years ago, when Aries, the ram, was abandoned. Before Aries, the vernal equinox occurred in Taurus. Still centuries ahead of us is the so-called Age of Aquarius, when the vernal equinox sun will shine among the stars of the water bearer. In 26,000 years, then, all twelve constellations of the zodiac, the ring of constellations through which the sun passes in a single year, stand their turns at the vernal equinox.

WANDERERS THROUGH THE STARS

A few of the "stars" don't behave like stars. They move among them. Constellations are fixed patterns, but the planets, or "wanderers," add variety to the unchanging pictures in the sky. The ancients knew just five: Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. Seen from earth, they are luminous nomads in a wilderness of stars. Since the invention of the telescope, three more planets have been discovered, and rocketpowered space probes have given us closeup looks at several. Of the five original wanderers, Mercury and Venus have orbits inside that of the earth, while the others are more distant from the sun. All, however, stay close to the path the sun follows through the stars.

MARKING TIME BY THE MOONLIGHT

Another celestial wanderer is the moon. Its cycles can be as complex as those of the planets, but paradoxically, it also acts as a handy regulator of time. The moon's reliable rhythm of phases, waxing full and waning to naught, subdivides the year for us, bundling the 365 days into 12 or so convenient packages of time, the months. The very word "month" derives from the word "moon," and both are rooted in a word that means "to measure." It is likely the moon was our first means of measuring the passage of the days. It is conspicuous-large, bright, fast-moving, quickly changing. All our calendars originate in its regular, cyclical phases.

The moon, of course, glows with no fire of its own; it shines by the reflected light of the sun. Because of this, its shape changes as it orbits the earth. When it is in the same direction as the sun, its dark side faces us, and we see no moon at all; this is called "new moon." In a day or so, after the moon moves east of the sun, a thin crescent shows up in the west after sunset; from our vantage point, it is the right-hand edge that is lit. Each day the moon moves quite a distance through the background stars and fills out as it goes. About a week after new moon, it is half lit; we call this "quarter moon," for the moon is a quarter through its cycle. Now it rises at about noon and sets about midnight. Another week passes and the moon, now opposite the sun, is full. It rises with sunset and sets at sunrise. It is bright and up all night.

Then the moon begins to wane. A week after being full it is half lit again-now the left half as we face it from earth. This moon rises at about midnight and sets at about noon. After another week, the moon has slimmed to a thin crescent in the morning sky. At last visibility it rises a little before the sun, and the next day it is gone. New moon has returned after 29½ days.

MA'AT: THE DIVINE COSMIC ORDER

Ma'at is the netert (goddess) that personifies the principle of cosmic order. The Egyptian texts recognize her cosmic power, as the source without which the other neteroo (gods) are functionless. She signifies harmony, balance and equilibrium between all the different cosmic forces (neteroo).

The Egyptians perceived the universe in terms of a dualism between Ma'at - Truth and Order - and disorder. The Creator summoned the cosmos out of undifferentiated chaos, by distinguishing the two, by giving voice to the ultimate ideal of Truth. In the Egyptian Coffin Texts, Spell 1130 reads:

I am the Lord of fire who lives on Truth.

The forces of chaos were multitudiness and disorder, while the ideal Truth (ORDER) was a single harmonious entity, running through the cosmos and society. On a cosmic level, this ideal Truth (the message of God speaking ORDER) was manifested in the solar cycle, in which the Creator had to repeatedly vanquish the forces of darkness every morning, as the sun rose.

Ma'at is the abstract concept of order, justice, truth, righteousness, and what is right, in all their purest forms. Ma'at is the force which holds creation together and makes it work like a well-oiled machine. Ma'at is the ideal of balance: of things working as they should. Without Ma'at, chaos reigns unchecked and the ability to create order is forever lost - that is to say, Ma'at is order on its most abstract level - that which causes everything to exist and continue to exist.

Ma'at is maintained in the world by the correct actions and personal piety of its adherents. Such obedience to the Divine's Laws results in not only an "ordered" life but an "ordered" society which reflects the "perfect order" found in the Cosmos.

With only this small introduction into God's design for Cosmic Order then it is much easier to understand the concept of Ma'at and its huge importantance in Egyptian Religion

Ma'at, Goddess of Truth, Balance, Order... Ma'at, unlike Hathor and Nephthys, seemed to be more of a concept than an actual goddess. Her name, literally, meant 'truth' in Egyptian. She was truth, order, balance and justice personified. She was harmony, she was what was right, she was what things should be. It was thought that if Ma'at didn't exist, the universe would become chaos, once again! Ma'at is the netert (goddess) that personifies the principle of cosmic order. The Egyptian texts recognize her cosmic power, as the source without which the other neteroo (gods) are functionless. She signifies harmony, balance and equilibrium between all the different cosmic forces (neteroo).

The Egyptians perceived the universe in terms of a dualism between Ma'at (Truth and Order) and disorder. For the Egyptian believed that the universe was above everything else an ordered and rational place. It functioned with predictability and regularity; the cycles of the universe always remained constant; in the moral sphere, purity was rewarded and sin was punished. Both morally and physically, the universe was in perfect balance. The Creator summoned the cosmos out of undifferentiated chaos, by distinguishing the two, by giving voice to the ultimate ideal of Truth. In the Egyptian Coffin Texts, Spell 1130 reads:

I am the Lord of fire who lives on Truth.

The forces of chaos were multitudiness and disorder, while the ideal Truth was a single harmonious entity, running through the cosmos and society. On a cosmic level, it was manifested in the solar cycle, in which the Creator had to repeatedly vanquish the forèes of darkness every morning, as the sun rose. Constantly the message was taught on a daily basis that disorder is to be subjected to order.

As stated above Ma'at is the abstract concept of order, justice, truth, righteousness, and what is right, in all their purest forms. If not noticed the definition it is related to the "Logos" as they both express "order" and "harmony." Ma'at is the ideal of balance: of things working as they should. Without Ma'at, chaos reigns unchecked and the ability to create order is forever lost - that is to say, Ma'at is order on its most abstract level - that which causes everything to exist and continue to exist.

Because of Ma'at, the Egyptians knew that the universe, that everything in the universe, worked on a pattern, just as, later on, the Greeks called this same underlying order of the universe "logos" (meaning, order, pattern).

If you remember from an earlier article one of the meanings of the word "logos" is "order/pattern." We see that the Egyptians laid the foundation for this understanding which the later Greeks picked up on since much of the education and learning obtained by the Greek "thinkers" came from their exposure to Egyptian wisdom.

"In the beginning was the logos, and the logos was with God and the logos* was God." - John 1:1

Properly understood this concept of order and pattern was in the beginning and this order and pattern was with God and this order and pattern was and "is" God today.

Nowhere yet in our definition of the word "logos" have we yet applied it to anything other than a pattern or order and only much later would this "concept" be applied to men who exhibited this order in their lives to the fullest. More on that later.

Egypt, then, was seen to be nothing without Ma'at. Ma'at was reality, the solid grounding of reality that literally held the Universe together; made the Sun rise, the stars shine, the river flood and mankind think. The universe itself, all the world around them, was thereford sacred in the ancient view because it was an expression of the Absolute Divine who "ordered" everything. The Egyptians understood this order transcended the stars and nature and found its most important focus within humanity in the form of ethics. "Ethics" is an issue of human will and human permission. Man has free choice to live according to the pattern of Divine Order or not. It is a function of the human world of duality: order or disorder, good or evil, righteous or unrighteous.

MANKIND IS JUDGED AS TO WHETHER HE LIVED A LIFE OF ORDER OR DISORDER AS REFLECTED IN THE DIVINE PATTERN

Despite being a winged goddess (like Nephthys), she was judge at the Egyptian underworld at the Halls of Ma'ati or Halls of the Double Ma'at. The dead person's heart was placed on a scale, balanced by Ma'at herself, or by the Feather of Ma'at (her symbol that she wore on her head was an ostrich feather). Thoth (god of writing and scribes who was also known as the "Logos" in creation) weighed the heart... if the deceased had been found to not have followed the concept of ma'at during his life (if he had lied or cheated or killed or done anything against ma'at and the Divine Laws of the Universe that was the pattern for this "order") his heart was devoured by a demon (she was called Ammut - Devouress of the Dead) and he died the final death. If the heart weighed the same as Ma'at, the deceased was allowed to go on to the afterlife (what we term Heaven). In life, it was the pharaohs' duty to uphold ma'at. "I have done Ma'at" has been spoken by several pharaohs, as well as being called "beloved of Ma'at". The ruler who forcibly emphasizes his adherence to Maat on his monuments in Akhenaten [Moses].

Ma'at, as would be logical, was also was the justice meeted out in ancient Egyptial law courts since man's laws are to be a reflection of God's Laws and the Divine Order. It is likely that a "Priest of Ma'at" referred to people who were involved in the justice system, as well as being priests of the goddess herself.

According to Egyptian traditions Ma'at did not exist until Ra rose from the waters of Nun (various gods and goddesses that emerge out of Chaos..thereby revealing order). She was known as a Neter [energy, force, power] goddess, and as such, was described as a daughter of Ra. But without Ma'at, Egyptians believed that Nun would reclaim the universe. She was also thought to be the wife of Thoth, moon god and god of the wisdom. She was, really, the most important deity of them all.

SO WHAT SHOULD THIS MEAN TO ME?

Ma'at, as an expression of God's will and Divine Order, is a pattern revealed to mankind both in the Heavens as well as in Nature itself. Even within the human body the Divine Order is maintained that sustains life. When this Divine Order deviates from the "pattern" then sickness and death quickly follows. Such "order" as learned from this "Divine Pattern" was not only understood by the earliest Egyptians but also understood that they were responsible to maintain this same "order" in the world by their correct actions and personal piety in their lives. These actions which reflect the Divine Order of Ma'at are found in the Ethical Commandmenets of the Egyptian religion; specifically in the 42 Negative Confessions that mirror the later Ten Commandments (better known as Ten Categories consisiting of 613 Laws/Mitzvoth). When men live by God's Laws then the Kingdom of God as manifested in Heaven is brought to bear upon mankind and this world and we reflect in this world "the pattern" desired by the Creator for His creation.

Again the reader should call to mind the definition of the "Logos" we saw in an earlier article and take special note as it relates also to order and Law and its dwelling within all humanity. The goal is the expression of this "Logos" through humanity. The similarity between the "Logos" and "Ma'at" are stricking; one could say they are the same things. To the degree you yield your members to these Laws and Absolutes of Divine Revelation as found in the Commandments of God then you reflect the "Logos" within you as well as manifest "the Divine Pattern" through your life.

Many down through history record the appearance of "Avatars" or men who in rather unique ways revealed the Almighty through their lives above their peers. You may be familiar with a more common term to reflect such men; that being "messiahs." Yeshua/Jesus was such a one as viewed by those who knew him best and he was equated with "the Logos" by those who knew him best. Because Yeshua lived the Laws of God out in his daily life and exhibited this Cosmic Order and brought it to bear upon this life like few others in his day and did so on a daily basis and taught others to do the same then those who knew him saw in him the most perfect manifestation of this Divine Order or this "Logos." This manifestation came from Yeshua's yielding himself to the Divine Pattern in his life and sets such an example to be learned and emulated by others. This again is done by observing and adhering to the Divine Pattern as represented by the Torah and the Laws of God.

Matt 5:17-20 17 Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. 18 For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. 19 Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. 20 For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven. (KJV)

But be not mistaken this "Logos" or this "anointing" resides in each of us as we say from an earlier article. This "Christ" or "anointing" resides in you and me and to the degree that we yield our members to these Higher Laws of Divine Order manifested in the Torah and manifest them in our lives then we reveal the Christ-Spirit within us.

I Jn 2:27 27 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him. (KJV)

The "him" in this verse does not apply to a person but to God (we are called to abide in the "Logos" of God and manifest it through our lives). If we do this then we are taught of the Spirit and manifest what we are taught about the Divine Pattern and Divine Order of Heaven and how we can manifest it both in and through our lives.

Understand Yeshua, because of his yieldedness to the Laws of God to the degree that he did was by others called the "the Christ." Understand his name was NOT Christ but this term was applied to him only because his followers saw in him the perfect manifestation of this Divine Pattern of Heaven on earth. Said another way we reveal the "Logos" or we don't depending upon our obedience to the Torah and the Laws of God. Said another way to the degree we manifest and adhere to this Divine Order and Pattern as manifested in God's Laws and Commandments then we manifest the "Logos" which dwells within each of us; that part of the Divine within us that history records was revealed by Yeshua like few others. This does NOT make us God; only Godly!

Rom 6:13 13 Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. (KJV)

Before we end this article I need to make one more point. As you noticed above there is a Divine Pattern in Heaven that is supposed to be manifested on earth. We find that in Scripture in various places. Let us look at only two of them.

Heb 8:5 5 Who serve unto "the" example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount. (KJV)

Several things strike us from the above passage. Notice first the definite artilce "the" which indicates the uniqueness of the example. There is not many but "one" example that is to be emulated by Moses and all humanity and that is the "real" that exists in Heaven in the realm of the Spirit. Believe it or not this is what Plato teaches about the realm of "Being" which is the real and our existence which he calls the "realm of change" which is but its shadow. Again Plato and the Greek philosophers get these concepts from Egypt. One only needs to read the book Stolen Legacy: Greek Philosophy Is Stolen Egyptian Philosophy by George G. M. James to see this for yourself. The term Greek philosophy is, to begin with a misnomer, for there is no such philosophy in existence. The ancient Egyptians ad developed a very large religious system, called the Mysteries, which was also the first system of salvation of mankind. This was the notion of the summum bonum or greatest good, to which all men must aspire, and it also became the basis of of all ethical concepts. After nearly five thousand years of prohibition against the Greeks, they were permitted to enter Egypt for the purpose of education. First through the Persian invasion and second through the invasion of Alexander the Great the Greeks made the best of their chance to learn all they could about Egyptian wisdom and religion and instruction was given by Egyptian Priests. After the Alexander's invasion the Royal temples and libraries were plundered and pillaged, and the Aristotle school converted the library at Alexandria into his personal research center. There is no wonder then, that the production of the unusually large number of books ascribed to Aristotle has proved a physical impossibility, for any single man within a life time.

Back to our point this "example" or "Divine Pattern" is to be manifested in this earth as the extension or "shadow" of this real that exists in this realm of Spirits (Plato learned this from Egyptian Priests). Moses, himself a Pharoah, and who is already familiar with the concept of Ma'at, is instructed to adhere to the pattern of Ma'at shown him in the mount as the passage in Hebrews attests above. The Earth is to reflect the Heavenly realm in all things mankind does. This is accomplished by yielding to the "Logos" within each of us and manifesting in and through our life and influence.

Now let us look at another example and Pharoah named Thuthmose III, otherwise known as King David in the Jewish Scritpures. Here we find again that King David is familiar with this "pattern" of Ma'at as recorded in I Chronicles 28:11-13:

Chr 28:11-13 11 Then David gave to Solomon his son the pattern of the porch, and of the houses thereof, and of the treasuries thereof, and of the upper chambers thereof, and of the inner parlours thereof, and of the place of the mercy seat, 12 And the pattern of all that he had by the spirit, of the courts of the house of the LORD, and of all the chambers round about, of the treasuries of the house of God, and of the treasuries of the dedicated things: 13 Also for the courses of the priests and the Levites, and for all the work of the service of the house of the LORD, and for all the vessels of service in the house of the LORD. (KJV)

The Hebrew word for "service":

Strong's number 5656 abodah or abowdah- labor, service

- a) labor, work
- b) labor (of a servant or a slave)
- c) labor, service (of captives or subjects)
- d) service (of God).

Interesting to note in the above passage is that this "Divine Pattern" was given by the Spirit and not by man. Included in this "pattern" is how mankind is to SERVE GOD! Included in this is the very worship of God which is according again to this "Divine Pattern" in Heaven as manifest in like form on Earth. There is to be an "order" to this worship and the Jewish people, the children from the Egyptians, teach us by their example this "Divine Pattern" of worship. I stongly suggest you get a siddur and learn the prayers that have been prayed according to this "Divine Order" since the days of King David (Thuthmose III). What will become apparent to you in time is the similarities between the texts of Egyptian worship and Jewish worship. After reading this article and doing some study into these areas for yourself you will no longer entertain doubts about the reason for the similarities between Egyptian religion and the Jewish religion. Let us never forget the Jewish word "Seder" means "order." The Seder is a term for the observance of the Passover kept yearly by the Jews according to this "pattern."

As I close this article we need to focus on the "Logos" since being reared as Christians and being taught that Jesus is the Literal Logos. I have tried to show you how the proper understanding of Jesus is NOT to be understood as the Literal "Logos" but only a symbol or methaphor for this "Logos." The Literalization of this "Logos" doctrine as taught by Gentile Christianity in error has rendered us idolators and blasphemers since it makes Jesus not the personification of God or Godliness but actually God Himself. Such is the great sin of Christianity given to the world by a previous sun worshipper who also declared his father and himself God: Constantine.

Now let us continue to explore the "Logos" to understand it properly thereby strengthening the above concepts that were originally given to the people who received this Divine Revelation from God.

THE HEAVENS AND THE GODS WE WORSHIP

A perusal of nearly any ancient pantheon reveals the obvious: At least some of the gods, often the most important ones, are objects in the sky. The metaphoric reasons are not difficult to understand. The regular motions of celestial objects made them agents of order that helped give meaning to the world below; endless repetition of their appearances and disappearances suggested immortality; their light commanded attention and connoted power. And being in the sky, with such a perspective on earth below, it was only natural to assume that the gods must know all because they could see all: To see the world, one's eyes must be in heaven. In fact, the sun and moon were described by the Egyptians as the eyes of Horus, the falcon god of the sky.

Although particular gods may differ in terms of the resources they are believed to control, control is the attribute they share. What they control, and how they do it, determines exactly what sorts of gods they are. Celestial gods control the passage of time by marking it and measuring it. They control direction and space through the locations of their comings and goings. As masters of time and space, they move the world. They make it change. Day changes into night. Winter melts into spring. Rivers flood and fall. Grain sprouts, grows, and ripens. In these cycles of the world and in our daily lives we see patterned change, and it is driven by the sky.

The importance of the sky is best revealed in the things we take for granted, the little things that mean so much. The sky permeates our lives so completely that the days of the week, one of the most basic units of organized time, bear the names of celestial objects. In English, the origins of three of the names are fairly obvious. Sunday is, of course, the sun's day; Monday is the moon's day; and Saturday is Saturn's day. We have inherited this nomenclature from the ancient Romans, whose names for these days were Dies So/is, Dies Lunae, and Dies Sat urni. The names of the other four days of the week come from Norse gods:

- Tuesday = Tyr
- Wednesday = Odin
- Thursday= Thor
- Friday = Frey

All four were chosen, however, because they were equivalent to the Roman gods who governed those days of the week, and, again, the celestial connections are clear:

- Tuesday = Dies Martis = the day of Mars
- Wednesday = Dies Mercurii = the day of Mercury
- Thursday = Dies Jovis = the day of Jupiter
- Friday = Dies Veneris = the day of Venus

So, the names of the days of the week refer to the seven moving celestial objects: the sun, moon, and the five "wanderers"-the planets. And although Latin is no longer a living language, this issue is not dead. Equivalent names have been carried into all of the Romance Languages, which derive from Latin. By the power of their names these old celestial gods still live and drive the week through time.

IMMORTALITY AND DIVINITY

If we are seeking immortality, the sky is a good place to start. When we gaze into the sky we see endless repetition there; reminiscent of immortality and eternal life. Although we know that we ourselves will die, we see the sun, moon, and stars survive night after night, month after month, year after year. They may disappear, but their absences are only temporary. It is from these observations of the ancients that they understood what the God of the Cosmos was saying to them over and over again; namely that all that exists has a beginning, life, death, and rebirth.

The sky in Egypt was Nut, a goddess whose outstretched body canopied the earth. Although she swallowed the sun each night, it was reborn from her loins each dawn. As the sun rose, she consumed the stars and gave birth to them again when at sunset the sun crossed her lips once more. The Egyptians also described the predawn reappearances of the decans-the stars that heralded the hours of the night-as rebirths from the "death" each experienced when, at its own time during the year, it vanished like Sirius for 70 days from the nighttime sky. The Pyramid Texts, however, as well as later funerary texts, make it clear that the ideal time and place of 'rebirth' was in the eastern horizon at the time of the so-called heliacal (dawn) rising of the star Sirius (Sothis), the latter identified to Isis, mythological and astral mother of the Kings of Egypt. The heliacal rising of Sirius, which was witnessed in the eastern sky at dawn, was an event that took place some 70 days after the star had been seen for the last time in the western horizon at sunset (known as the Heliacal Setting). What we see in this example is the picture of God, through cycles in the Heavens, speaking to the ancients concerning "birth, life, death, absence, and rebirth." This was metaphorically understood by the observations of Sirus by the Egyptian sages and astrologers. Because circumpolar stars never went below the horizon, and so never left the sky, the Egyptians called them "imperishable" and "undying." Again the Egyptians saw in this the principle of "eternal life." When you combine the two concepts you have "birth, life, death, rebirth, eternal life" and this cycle and pattern witnessed not only in the Heavens above but in Mother Nature around them, which was also influenced by the sky, spoke to them of the principle of life after death. When you factor in the ancient Egyptians understanding that they, as mankind, was created in the image of God, then the ancients understood these same cycles observed above them and around them operated even within them.

In another myth, taught to capture for all time Divine truth, Re, the Egyptian sun god, passed each night into a dangerous realm, the kingdom of death (following the sun's setting below the western horizon). He sailed through 12 perilous territories-12 hours of the night-and steered a course through the frightening creatures that inhabited them. Gigantic snakes writhing in their lairs, multiheaded serpents that walked on human legs, fire-spitting vipers armed with knives, a scorpion goddess: all these awaited Re. Despite confrontation and mortal danger, however, the sun survived to rise again each day.

The sky is one of the few things that provides concrete images upon which our conception of immortality might condense. The sky is itself eternal, and its occupants are continuously resurrected. There, in the celestial passages and returns, is the contrast between what is mortal and what is divine.

The power of the celestial gods was revealed by their light. Anyone standing in sunlight senses its energy. Its warmth is unmistakable. Though obviously weaker, the moon and planets also commanded respect. They shine not only in the blackened vault of night but, on occasion, in the brighter twilight sky, and some can even be seen in broad daylight. Again and again, gods were associated with light.

THE GODS IN HEAVEN: THE SUN AND THE MOON

The particular appearance and behavior of certain celestial objects have often led different peoples in different places of this world at different times to assign the same symbolic values to them; thus the similarity in sun myths found around the world where only the names are different but the stories almost identical. The sun, for example, is both powerful and dependable, as it pursues its orderly course through the seasons, and these characteristics have inspired many peoples to see in it the source of all authority, law, and social order. This concept will be very important as we will see in our continued studies.

In Egypt the sun, Re, was ruler of the day. His steady course ordered the world. The Egyptian environment was self-contained and stable. Government was ordered. Society was ordered. All this was a gift from the sun. The Nile, too, was well-behaved, but its gift was life. The real source of order was the sun. Each day, each season, each year the sun emerged from the darkness with its offering: Maat. Maat was sunlight and the rightness of things-congruence and the natural order. Personified as a goddess, Maat sailed the sky in the company of Re.

Compared to the sun, the moon's rapid changes make it seem practically vagrant, but it is useful as a timekeeper, and many peoples have accorded it divine status as such.

To the Egyptians the moon was Khonsu, the "runner." The earliest Egyptian calendar was based on the moon, and the gods associated with each lunar month appear often in the paintings and reliefs in Egyptian temples and tombs. Thoth, another form of the moon, in combination with his identity of scribe, was the regulator or measurer of time and seasons. His records and computations set the days for the festivals.

Through its monthly cycle of waxing and waning, the moon was often linked with life and fertility. The myth of Osiris provided a clear example, and in other nations similar connections were felt.

THE WANDERING GODS

In the tradition of associating the ancient gods with the planets, new planets discovered with the telescope also were given names of gods: Uranus, Neptune, and Pluto are now in the celestial roster. In addition, numerous minor planets, or asteroids, have been named after other Classical gods, goddesses, and demi-deities; Ceres is the largest of these. When we ran out of Greek and Roman names, we borrowed from other pantheons. Today Lilith, Hel, Quetzalcóatl, Frigga, Aten, Gilgamesh, and many more orbit the sun. The Egyptians portrayed Jupiter-and Mars and Saturn as well-with the falcon head of the sky god Horus. Among Jupiter's Egyptian titles were "Horus Who Illuminates the Two Lands" and "the Star of the South."

Apart from its brightness, the most distinctive feature of Venus is its cycle as a morning star and evening star. Accordingly, the Egyptians sometimes called it "the crosser" and in a later time portrayed it with two falcon heads. More often they symbolized Venus as the Bennu, a heron-like bird commonly equated with the phoenix. The Bennu belonged to Osiris, probably because the Egyptians associated death and resurrection with the planet's evening and morning appearances, or perhaps with its conjunctions behind the sun and its periods of visibility.

Mercury's Egyptian names refer to Set, the adversary of Osiris. Usually the planet is shown with the head of Set's mysterious, unidentified totem animal and it is called Sebeg. Among the Babylonians, Mercury was Nebo, the record keeper and messenger of the gods. Its status as messenger may be related to the quickness of the planet in its circuit from west of the sun to east of the sun and back to the west again. Mercury's swiftness also made him the gods' messenger in Greece and Rome, as well as the escort of the souls to the realm of the dead.

It is easy to pick out Mars in the nighttime sky. Its red color sets it apart from the other planets and from most of the stars. The color-the same as blood-also explains its association with gods of war: Nergal in Babylonia, Ares in Greece, and, of course, the Roman Mars.

The celestial path of Mars is similar to that of Jupiter and Saturn, but it is considerably closer to the earth and so appears to move more quickly. The effect is especially striking when the earth in its orbit swings past Mars, and the latter appears to move backward for a little over two months-a much more dramatic retrograde motion than those of the other outer planets. Egyptian texts refer to Mars as "Horus the Red" and "Shining Horus, the Star of the East in Heaven that Runs Its Course Backward." Apart from the "East," these names are easily understood. Both Mars and Saturn were called the Eastern Star and the Western Star in various inscriptions, however. The Egyptian Saturn was "Horus, Bull of Heaven," and its falcon head was often shown topped with a set of bull's horns.

THE STELLAR GODS

In most, if not all, ancient cultures the stars also were made divine. In Egypt, as noted, the stellar timekeepers - the decans - were depicted as gods in Egyptian temples and tombs: Sirius and Orion, as Isis and Osiris, occupied an important place in Egyptian religion.

The system of decans set up by the Egyptians combines the elements of space and time. The decans refer to 36 sections of a band of sky somewhat to the south of the ecliptic. Each section was thus about 10 degrees across. There were stars or stellar groups associated with each decan, but we do not know in general what they are. The only ones that can be identified are Sirius and Orion. The decans played an important role in the star clocks that appear on tomb ceilings from the the Middle and New Kingdoms. The basic idea is that the decans can be used to determine the time at night because different sets of stars rise through the night. These were called the hours of the night. However, a given set of stars rises earlier each night because of the revolution of the earth around the sun. A different decan rises at the same time roughly every 10 days. The star clocks account for a 365 day year and list the decans at different hours in columns differing by 10 days. This gives the clocks a diagonal structure. Because of the inaccurate year that was used, a given star clock would work for only 100-200 years. Star clocks were eventually replaced by water clocks.

The steadiness of the celestial pole and the constancy in the circuits of the northern stars may make them seem to be more benevolent gods than the sun, whose hot summers and cold winters keep life in a precarious balance.

THE PURPOSE OF CELESTIAL POWER

To our ancestors the sky was a place. Its geography was not our geography of outer space. The gods that lived there were not just astronomical objects that shine down upon earth, but also rain, clouds, thunder, lightning, rainbows, halos, and many more.

Our ancestors' vulnerability to the storm and their dependence upon rain prompted them to imagine numerous gods of thunder, weather, and wind. Because the themes of their lives were intricately entwined-just as our own are-it is often difficult to tell where one metaphor leaves off and another begins. We see this rich fabric of allusion and symbol contrived from threads of association between life and the sky. Rain, for example, falls from the sky and fertilizes the land. The process is paralleled when the man impregnates the woman. And in agriculture, the plow is the male. It cuts the female earth, and the furrow is where the seed is planted. Through such a network of images and associations, the sky, the rain, and semen are interchangeably symbolic.

Unlike most ancient peoples, the Egyptians personified the sky as a goddess. But in Egypt this makes sense: It rarely rains. The source of life-giving, fertilizing water is the Nile, not the sky. The river, as Osiris, is male, then, and the sky, as Nut, is female.

Because myths are a means by which a people explains its identity to itself, the main actors in the myths, the gods, represent and endorse the principles by which a people lives. Thus, Indo-European gods adopt the functions of importance in Indo-European life, with the warrior gods of weather and storm identifying with the idea of force. Through life-giving, fertilizing rain, fecundity, also, was linked to the sky. Force animates the world, and fecundity fills it with living things.

Creation, by contrast, was the province of the sky gods because the sky orients the landscape and orchestrates the rhythm of time. We see a fundamental pattern in the celestial realm and frame from it what seems to be the cycle of cosmic order and the way of the world: creation-growth-death-rebirth. We seek our own past, present, and future in that cycle. Our interaction with the sky is a reflection of our own identity. It is so important, we involve the gods.

Creation involves more than just promoting activity or procreating life, however. True creation is the establishment of order. This is why the sky is required, and this is where sovereignty comes in. By sovereignty, Dumézil meant preservation of sacred order. This responsibility was split between two regents-one to sustain cosmic order, the other to preside over social order and its laws.

The dual nature of creation-coordinating as well as originating-is evident in many myths.

HEAVEN DECLARES THAT THE SKY REACHES EARTH

Celestial order generally was transfused into human society in ancient times through the sovereignty of the ruler. The mandate of heaven sanctified kingship. By invoking the sky, kings and their institutions gained special authority and meaning. Like the sky, they could not be carelessly compromised. To do so would jeopardize the people's way of life and their sense of their own identity. Mircea Eliade, a specialist in comparative religion, emphasizes that orientation-the order of space and time-is what makes the world sacred for traditional, nonsecularized peoples. Once the world is founded and ordered, it acquires meaning. We can then have a sense of place in it.

In Egypt, an intricate network of language and ceremony reinforced a resonance between the sun and the pharaoh. The name of the sun was incorporated often in the cartouche of the king. The king wore the uraeus, the divine solar cobra, on his crown. The king's public appearance on the throne was equated with the sun's arrival on the horizon. Both concepts shared the same verb, a hieroglyph of the sun emerging from the primordial mound of creation. Enemies of the king were supposed to suffer the same defeat as Apep, the serpentine nemesis that faced Re in the last hour of his journey through the night. A festival of royal rejuvenation, the Sed, when held, was scheduled for the first day of the first month of the first season. Timed, then, at the New Year, the Sed invoked the notions of re-creation and reestablishment of the world order. Just as the sun was renewed, the pharaoh was reenergized, and so, too, was the land. Like the sun, the pharaoh was divine. He was the son of the Sun.

The notion that the organization of human affairs is closely related to the order of the cosmos is by no means restricted to ancient Egyptians and the Maya, of course. Consider the Gospel of St. Matthew, in which the birth of Christ is heralded by the sky. A brilliant, miraculous star drew "wise men" from the east, presumably Persian or Babylonian astrologers, to Bethlehem. The historical circumstances are in dispute, and the star may have been a detail contrived by St. Matthew. None of the other gospels mentions the star. We know, however, that several impressive conjunctions of~ planets and stars occurred during the most likely period of Christ's birth, and any of them could have been the Star of the Magi. But real or not, the Christmas Star has impact. It means new life and new order, and it appeared in the sky.

December 25, the traditional date of the birth of Christ, also signals the world's rebirth. The date owes more to celestial cycles and seasonal symbolism than to any historical record. It was borrowed from an early competitor of Christianity, Mithraism. This religion originated in Persia and passed to Rome, where it absorbed elements of the old Roman paganism.

Mithra was an avatar of the sun. He drove a solar chariot, judged the world, and preserved the cosmic order. His birthday was December 25, and, in the old calendars, it coincided with the winter solstice, when the sun turned back from its southernmost path. As the annual rebirth of the sun's light, the winter solstice was important in most parts of the world. In fact, the Romans already had an ancient winter festival whose seven days bracketed the solstice. Derived from very old fertility rituals of the harvest, the Saturnalia-the festival of the god-planet Saturn-marked a period of license and intoxication. Choosing the birth of Christ as December 25 successfully integrated long-standing popular traditions with the imagery of a new religion, and the theme of renewal is still part of Christmas (E.C. Krupp, Echoes of the Skys, The Astronomy Of Lost Civilizations, New American Library, 1984, pp. 62-81).

THE HEAVENS AND THE TALES WE TELL FROM WHAT WE SEE

Myths are not simple tales, but tales told simply. And these tales are not just idle chatter. The stories are important. They reflect, in symbols, the deepest concerns of our minds. For this reason myths are worth analyzing. The richest myths have multi-pie levels of meaning. They are networks of thought. Because they link a variety of perceptions and incorporate more than one theme, they endure. Our goal is to understand the use we make of the sky, and here mythology can help. We are hunting descriptions of the world's structure, explanations of natural phenomena, and accounts of the passage of time. We find them all in myth.

We must be thoughtful, however, about what we do with myths. We can identify the celestial connotations in a story, but then to declare the tale to be a "sky myth" shortchanges the metaphor. The sky symbolism does not necessarily explain the myth. The myth, on the other hand, may help explain what the sky means to us. Celestial metaphors still speak to us. To know what they say and why it matters, we must understand, in the words of anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss, "not how men think in myths, but how myths operate in men's minds without their being aware of the fact."

THE SKY....GOD'S PATTERN AND MESSAGE TO US OF COSMIC ORDER

What emerges in myth is a connection between the sky and cosmic order. The theme may appear in the imagery of the cycle of the seasons or in the story of a man who is little more than the personification of such forces (take Osiris/Isis for example). These myths link the sky to society's institutions and so reflect the role of cosmic order in human affairs. We find in these tales recitals of the creation, maintenance, destruction, and restoration of order. The sky is both the source of this order and the place where it is challenged.

There is a cosmic theme here: the challenge to world order. Primordial chaos threatens a return to the cosmos. Because the sky is the visible framework of world order, the sky suffers in chaos reemerges. Egyptian mythology provides a clear narrative of one such challenge to this cosmic order: the conflict between Osiris and Sets and Horus and Set.

Remembering that Osiris was also a picture of the personification of the sun and its path across the sky where it is reborn after sets and dies daily (as Osiris lived following his death in his rebirth) then let us understand that when the sky is linked with a story, it may tell us something about the sky's importance in our perception of the world. But it is not always easy to see the link. To understand myth, we have to understand the language of metaphor - and we have to know the cultural context from which the particular myth comes. A seemingly simple, ribald tale may have much deeper meanings than meet the uninitiated eye. For example, take the tale Osiris and Set or Horus and Set. Without understanding that this is a picture of the battle between darkness and light, between evil and good, then one might be led to read this story as if about two men or gods and miss the point of the myth all together.

THE MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

People in organized societies trace the lineage of their institutions to sources with enough power to justify the way things are. We find it important to demonstrate that our ways of governing ourselves, of organizing ourselves, are part of the natural order, This is done in terms of myth, because myth is the realm of the sacred.

By common consent, reverence and respect are signs of our acknowledgment of what is sacred, which, by definition, transcends the ordinary. It is immune to challenge and interference. It is like the sky. That is why the god-kings of ancient times allied themselves with heaven, and why the divine right of kings was very much an issue in European history until comparatively recent times.

Once order is created, it must be maintained. Recurrent events - the sunrise, the moon's phases, the circuit of the stars around the pole-are both the source of cosmic order and the signs of its preservation.

We don't perceive the world as chaos. We don't scramble space and time. Instead, we watch the sky and decide that there is order in the world. But we never quite forget the possibility of chaos. Certainly, the Egyptian priests had a sense that the whole cosmic structure might collapse, and their ministry to the gods in offerings in their Temples was their way of preventing this and maintaining such order on earth as it is in Heaven. Egypt had a central core to their religious beliefs: "So above, so beneath." We know of this same principle in slightly a different way:

Matt 6:10 10 Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. (KJV)

Let us not fail to realize that God's kingdom meant His rule and reign over this world and the people in it. Such rule over the hearts of men guaranteed that the comic order as seen in Law would be realized upon earth as well.

In many creation myths, creation means the defeat of chaos and the introduction of order. Chaos, however down, is not out. It lurks somewhere, submerged below the world's structure of space and time. We allow it to intrude in myth, and permit ourselves to banish it again. Set kills Osiris, but Osiris is resurrected and order is restored. Our myths of the intrusion of chaos and the restoration of order have a celestial dimension, for the sky and the seasons mirror this conflict and its end. We gaze upward and harvest the metaphors we find there.

And no clearer account of the retreat of cosmic order can be found as contained in the myths of Osiris, Horus, and Set and this provides the substance for all other such myths that will come subsequently from every nation on this planet; even the conflict between Satan and God we find in the Hebrew Scriptures which finds its origin in Zoroastrianism (another Dualism you see).

THE ROLE OF STARS IN SHAPING OUR THEOLOGIES

To understand the importance of fixed stars and constellations in astrology, let alone theology, one must return to the dawn of time and the original role that stars played in human lives.

Before time was conceived by the human mind, all was considered perfect. The world was envisioned by the ancients as hanging by a thread from the great, immortal, never-setting point, the North Pole Star. Seasons came and seasons went and nothing changed. This was the Golden Age, the age of perfection, the age of the immortal goddess, when the cosmos and all that was divine was regarded as perfect and in complete harmony. The polestar, with the heavens rotating around it every night, was seen as a great mill churning out gold and wealth, the source of all life and all order, the point of stillness around which all other things moved (G. de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill (Boston: Nonpareil Books, 1977). Aeons later the Greeks called this point the Omphaloessa, coming from the word omphalos meaning the center of things. In Latin this is translated as umbilicus from which we gain the word umbilical. The pole was the Earth's umbilical cord and all power, all strength, and all divinity came from this point. The Babylonians called it the "Mother Bond of Heaven." This connection from the point of stillness to the Earth was seen in some cultures as a pole or axis, a shaft around which the golden milistope turned. Other cultures considered it to be a Cosmic Tree (Mitchell, At the Center of the World (London: Thames & Hudson, 1994), p. 24), the Tree of Life of the Garden of Eden (De Santillana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill p. 223), or a measuring rod.

AS ABOVE...SO BENEATH...EGYPT'S MOTTO

Ancient societies structured themselves around the omphalos in an attempt to mirror on Earth the immortal life of the heavens, the goddess, the Mother of the World, as well as the gods. Since all power was believed to come from the pole, the Cosmic Center, it therefore followed that the power, authority, and wisdom to rule could be achieved by occupying the physical center of the tribe or group. Thus the center position belonged to the king, queen, or chief. This leader sat on a particular rock or stood beside a particular tree and claimed the power of the celestial pole by holding a staff or rod that symbolized the pole or shaft of the sacred mill. Later, this pole became the Royal or Holy Scepter, as well as the Sacred Sword of the Celts. This philosophy of divine power that came from the center was echoed at all levels of human society, from the very physical seat of government or throne to the central fireplace in every home. This was the first great impact that the constellations, the fixed stars, and the night sky had on the human mind: a primary philosophy that is so unconscious in the collective that it is generally unnamed and unrecognized, yet so strong it has formed the very foundation of our minds.

So, in this early human world where the polar regions, the central point of stillness of the starry sky, were duplicated physically in human life and in the human mind, the Earth was considered the plane between four gateways to the otherworld or afterlife. These four gateways were the points of the solar year;

- the spring equinox
- the summer solstice
- the autumn equinox
- the winter solstice

which were held by the four mutable signs:

- Sagittarius and Gemini, the equinox points;
- Virgo and Pisces, the solstice points.

The Sun moved along a golden road which we now know as the Milky Way and eventually settled onto the ecliptic, spending half the year in Gemini to Sagittarius, above the Earth giving light and warmth, and the other half in Sagittarius to Gemini, below the Earth in the great ocean, giving way to a period of cold and dark. In modern terminology, these were the two periods of northern or southern declination, respectively. The afterlife began with a journey on the Milky Way, the road or path which dipped below the ocean toward the other pole, the South Pole.

This perfect world was created and given life by the goddess at the sacred pole and maintained in its seasonal rhythm by the god who rose with the Sun on the morning of the spring equinox. This god rode the chariot or boat of the Sun and gave humanity the seasons and thereby the ring of life. Each year was measured by his rising. He was mythically connected to the goddess at the pole, and the two ruled the world in complete harmony. The Egyptians called him Horus/Osiris; he is known today as the constellation Orion. (Gertrude and James Jobes, Outer Space: Myths, Name Meanings, Calendars (New York: Scarecrow Press, 1964), p. 219).

THE EFFECTS OF PRECESSION ONCE NOTICED OVERTURNED OUR NEAT THEOLOGIES

However, as the effects of precession slowly broke this union of balance and harmony between god and goddess, society believed that the world was coming undone and that a great crisis had occurred. This event was explained first by the Egyptians who claimed that Osiris's brother, Set, attacked and killed him. The Greeks said that Zeus angrily banged the tabletop of the heavens, tilting the table, and talked of Zeus battling the Titans to overthrow the world order. The Celts said that Arthur pulled the Sacred Sword from the stone like his earlier counterpart, the nine-year-old hero, Kara Par, of Turkey, who was able to lift and extract the central copper rod from the Earth's navel or mill (De Santillana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill, p. 235). In Christian mythology a snake (Draco) appeared in the Tree of Life at the center of the Garden of Eden (the pole). Whatever the story, and there are many, the Golden Mill fell to earth, landed in the oceans of the sky and created a whirlpool. Until this moment, the world had been pinned at the polestar, keeping this great axis in place (De Santillana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill, p. 141). In the crisis, this axis was knocked from its groove and the axis of the earth tilted! The pole shifted focus to another star and the world became undone.

The whirlpool created by the falling mill is talked about in many myths, from the myth of Gilgamesh, to the world of the magical fish of the Celts, where one is lost in the world of water in order to gain wisdom, to the Greek myth of Hephaestus being cast from Olympus into the ocean (Pierre Grimal, The Dictionary of Classical Mythology, trans. A. R. Maxwell-Hyslop (Oxford, England: Blackwell Reference, 1986), p. 191).

It is important for us to understand right up front that this whirlpool was located at the tip of the constellation Orion, at the point occupied by the fixed star Rigel, the foot of Orion, the point which "slipped" into the great starry ocean. The "whirlpool" was and still is the intersection of the ecliptic with the equator. The effect of precession is that constellations seem to slip slowly against the seasons, so stars that rise with the spring equinox in one period of time will, over thousands of years, appear to slip southward. Visually, then, Orion slowly sank into the sea. Less and less of him appeared from one equinox to another. He had been ripped away from the union with Ursa Minor, separated from the immortal mother goddess and subjected to the whirlpool of the ecliptic where he underwent death and eventual rebirth. The whirlpool and its ceaseless churning cycle began to swallow all the gods, the zodiac, one after another. One god after another was to slowly die as they slowly sank below the horizon at the spring equinox only to be reborn at a later time when they rose again (visually above the horizon at the spring equinox). The only divine entities not affected were the goddesses that were associated with the circumpolar stars that never set and that circles the polar star. Precession had begun.

Time began in human consciousness when we realized that the equator and the ecliptic were separate. One solar journey was no longer like the others before it, and there was a larger cycle where immortal gods died, slipped into the sea, traveled on a boat, and then moved into the underworld. Gods could now die. History had started and the Golden Age had ended.

The Greeks tell us that the goddess Virgo, in distress at the end of the Golden Age, left humankind forever and returned to the heavens (A. W. and G. R. Mair (trans.), Callimacbus, Lycophron, Aratus (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989), p. 215). This is the mythic story of the historical demise of the constellation Virgo from her place in the summer solstice.

At such times of transition from one world order to the next, symbolized and heralded by one constellation entering the whirlpool and slipping into southern declinations, another taking its place on the spring equinox, the old world order is said to be "flooded" (De Santillana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill, p. 591). This was reflected in all the many diverse stories of great floods and deluges. The Greeks told the story of Deucalion, who seems to be a classical version of the biblical Noah. In Babylon it was the story of Utnapishtim, another Noah-like figure dealing with a great flood caused by the anger of Ea, the god of the waters. The native Hawaiians also talk of a flood called Kai-a-ka-hina-li'I, translated as "Sea that made the chiefs fall down" (J. F. Bierlein, Parallel Myths (New York: Ballantine, 1994), p. 127). In reality, these "floods" are mythology's record of prehistorical cosmic floods.

The Bible (Isa. 14:12) also tells us that Lucifer is cast out by God and falls to hell. Lucifer is the Lord of Light and is identified by some with Venus, as an evening star, and with Castor, the alpha star of Gemini. This constellation, along with Orion, slipped into the waters of the underworld. So Lucifer appeared to be cast into hell but was actually cast into the whirlpool. In the same way, Adam and Eve were cast out from the Garden of Eden when the devil, Draco, appeared in the Tree of Life in the center of the Garden, the North Pole. This was the end of the Golden Era: Paradise Lost.

Religions which contained the concepts of life, death, and rebirth emerged in the human psyche to embody the evidence of our eyes (Jane B. Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt (London: Penguin, 1992), p. 123.) The pole, the female divine goddess, was still immortal since she never set, but now the axis was tilted and male divine gods were subject to a cycle of life, death, and rebirth. In Egyptian mythology, Osiris died (Gemini/Orion having slipped from the equinox) to become the ruler of the underworld, passing his throne to his son Horns (Taurus as the new equinox sign) (Jane B. Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt (London: Penguin, 1992), p. 123). Horus, when he, as the Bull of Heaven and connected with the second sign of the zodiac, the bull of Taurus, likewise slipped into the sea, he passed his throne to Amen-Ra (associated with Aries-ram), a god known by the Egyptians as "King of the Gods." This signified Aries coming to the equinox. The emerging Greek culture gave this title of "King of the Gods" to Zeus, their Aries god. Two thousand years later when Zeus sensed the end of his time, he desperately needed to create an heir. This he did via the human Semele. Thus was Dionysus born, the new god of a new world order, with Pisces ruling the equinox point. Dionysus, like the gods before him, also needs to have an heir. Indeed in our time Pisces is nearly totally submerged in the whirlpool and Dionysus (Christ) has left not an heir, but only the vague promise of a Second Coming. I hoped you noticed that we just moved from Taurus, through Aries, through Pisces and saw how different gods ruled these ages; such ruling which was determined by the sign of the zodiac.

IN CONCLUSION

The whole starry sky was a canvas on which ancient people painted their myths, stories, oral history, and religion, while at the same time providing a model for their tribal structures. People watched and named the bright stars from the North Pole to as far south as one could see, and on this canvas myths could live forever. The starry sky became a great picture book unraveling its stories every night as people sat around their fires. These stories of the sky were carried by migration waves from one culture to another, so that by the beginning of time, the time of the great mythological loss of perfection which was the dawn of history, the sky was filled with many stories shared by many cultures whose origins had already been lost in the delicate fabric of oral history.

The night sky was a great cosmic book which fulfilled a need for these people. It was the original cathedral, or temple, a holder or a visual display of their morals, religion, and life-style. It showed them their place in the cosmos and gave surety to them in an uncertain world. It was the abode of the divine. Aeons later, Christians mimicked this sky full of stories by building great cathedrals, with their vaulted, lofty arches filled with colored glass to represent the Christian myths. Cathedrals were the books of the people, containing the stories of their myths and religion, and the rose window in every cathedral symbolized the sacred celestial pole, its holiness indicated by its prestigious placement. Instead of stars there was stained glass. (Bernadette Brady, Brady's Book of Fixed Stars, Samuel Weiser, Inc., York Beach, Maine, 1998, pp. 3-9).

THE DEAD AND THEIR CONNECTION WITH THE SKY

You may not have considered this but each person's life echoes the cycle of cosmic order we see played out in the sky. Our ancient ancestors saw a parallel between cosmic creation and each individual birth. For them the ancients realized that man was made in the image of God. Each life meant growth and the preservation of order. Each death was an intrusion of chaos and was a break with the Divine order of the Cosmos as pictured above and around them in Mother Nature. And just as our ancestors saw rebirth, renewal, and restoration of order in the sky, they also believed in an afterlife for the soul, a resurrection. Death, the key transformation in each soul's share of the cycle of cosmic order, initiated a transcendental journey to the realm of the gods and immortality. Very often the destination of the dead was the domain of sacred order-the sky itself. We say the exact same things today as Christains for when we die we believe we go to Heaven (the ancients called this the sky).

For this reason, in culture after culture, we find celestial metaphor in the ceremonies of the funeral, celestial imagery in the paraphernalia of the dead, and astronomical significance in the architecture of the tomb. By recognizing the relation between death and the sky, we can understand what death meant to our ancestors and what they judged was the role of the dead.

THE GREAT PYRAMID....ASTRONOMY...AND THEOLOGY

Death meant no rest for the pharaohs of Old Kingdom Egypt. Their destiny was overhead. Pyramids today stand as a reminder of the ancient Egyptian glorification of life after death, and in fact, the pyramids was built as monuments to house the tombs of the pharaohs. Death was seen as merely the beginning of a journey to the other world. In this society, each individual's eternal life was dependent on the continued existence of their king, a belief that made the pharaoh's tomb the concern of the entire kingdom. Believed to be aligned with the circumpolar stars, the king's spirit is then able to commute between heaven and earth in life after death.

Prayers carved into the stone walls of chambers within Fifth and Sixth Dynasty (ca. 2494-2181 B.c.) pyramids describe the pharaoh's "ascent to the sky among the stars," where he "regulates the night" and "sends the hours on the way." In some of thesePyramid Texts, in the monuments at Saqqara (about 40 miles up the Nile from Cairo), he joins the circumpolar stars and governs them. These stars, called circumpolar, never rise and never set, and so they never die. Circumpolar means to circle around the pole. Circumpolar stars or constellations daily trace circles around the north celestial pole, without setting or dipping below the horizon. They move in a counterclockwise direction.By joining these eternal stars, the pharaoh becomes eternal; he, personified as a star, never sets (allegory for death).

The pharaoh also makes another celestial journey: to Orion. This constellation is a symbol of his soul's rebirth because Orion stood for Osiris and the great cycle of birth, life, death, and resurrection.

Osiris was the Egyptian "god of the underworld." However, he was much more than this, because he also symbolized the Sun. Therefore, he also had a cyclic death and rebirth sequence. Every year he would die, and every winter solstice be "reborn." Hence, the religion of Osiris was essentially sun worship. In the Egyptian Osiris myth, he was killed by his brother and torn into 14 pieces; then resurrected by his sister/wife Isis (after she conceived their son Horus), to become lord of the underworld and Egyptian judge of the dead. The number 14 is further significant to the worship of Osiris because of his other association with the Moon, which has two 14 day cycles (waxing and waning). The waning cycle of the Moon also stands for Osiris' journey into the underworld (as the Moon grows dark, it goes "into darkness," the equivalent of the underworld), and the waxing cycle as the Moon grows brighter, Osiris' ascent from the underworld. Without going into too much detail, suffice to say that the number 14 is a very important number to the worshippers of Osiris, for more reasons than his death. Osiris, in his association with both the Sun and Moon, represents the principle of cycles; that everything has a beginning and an ending, but that life still goes on and new life takes the place of the old. Isis, the sister and "wife" of Osiris, was as important to the Egyptians (if not more so) than the god Osiris. She is represented by the star Sirius in Egyptian mythology. A "star configuration" used to sanctify Julius' new calendar that lacks Sirius or references to Sirius, would not be representative of Egyptian belief and worship. Isis was, for the Egyptians, the great nurturer and source of all "good things."

In the company of Osiris and guided by Sirius (in roughly the same part of the sky), the dead king maintains the calendar and administers the seasons. The pharaoh is busy in heaven. According to the texts, he takes "possession of the sky, its pillars and its stars" after death. On earth he maintained order and vitalized the system; in the sky, among the spirits, he activates the great cosmic cycles. His soul, or ba, has become a "living star at the head of his brethren." The tomb in which he was buried was the point of his departure for the sky.

Later Egyptian tombs are filled with astronomical imagery of the journey of the sun, the body of the sky, and the destinations of the stars: like the pyramids that contain hieroglyphic texts, they confirm that the Egyptians sensed a link between death and the sky (our Heaven). The builders of the earliest pyramids, however, and the builders of the greatest-those Fourth Dynasty (ca. 2613-2494 B.c.) mountains of stone blocks at Giza-left no written records of their intentions. Later commentators filled this void with fanciful speculation, downright misinformation, and plain silliness.

About 80 pyramids are known, all built on the Nile's west bank-the realm of the dying sun-but the Great Pyramid outstrips the others in fame as well as in size. The date of its errection is debated today but evidence reveals that it is much older than many want to concede; possibly 10,000 B.C.E. or earlier. It is recognized by Classical writers as one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, and it is the only one of the seven still standing. With amazing success, it has resisted the assaults of the desert, earthquake, quarrymen, and tourists. Herodotus, the Greek historian, marveled at its antiquity-and he visited Egypt in the fifth century B.C. Now with more justification than ever, an old Arab proverb counsels, "Man fears time, but time fears the pyramids."

THE GREAT PYRAMID... ITS ASTRONOMICAL INTERPRETATION

Various astronomical interpretations of the Great Pyramid at Giza have been proposed, involving alignments of its internal corridors and shadows cast by its profile. Some people have even suggested that it was used as an observatory. This pyramid's dimensions also have been said to encode practically everything from the number of days in the year to prophecies of the world's history. In our supposedly rational era, the Great Pyramid-or at least its shape-has been touted as a focuser of an as-yet-unidentified energy that can do everything from sharpening razor blades to mummifying milk.

It has been estimated that the volume of the Great Pyramid is as large as that of St. Peter's in Rome, St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey in London, and the cathedrals of Milan and Florence combined. Nearly 2,300,000 blocks of stone, each weighing on the average 2½ tons (the heaviest being 15 tons with none less than a ton and a half) were piled into an artificial mountain whose four sloping sides originally merged at a point 481.4 feet above the limestone plateau of Giza. Today, the top, including the gold-covered capstone, or pyramidion, is missing, and the Great Pyramid is 31 feet short of its original height.

The sides of the Great Pyramid once competed in brightness with the golden cap, for the rough limestone blocks that comprise the bulk of the pyramid were covered with a fine surface of shiny, white tura limestone. Only a little of the original tura now remains, however, in the bottom course on the north side.

Sheer size qualifies the Great Pyramid as "great," but its architectural details make it unique. First, whatever else may be hypothesized about the pyramid, there is no doubt that it is aligned astronomically, and with extreme precision, the four sides of its immense base (covering more than 13 acres) running north, south, east, and west. The worst agreement of any side with exact cardinal orientation is on the east, and even there the misalignment from a true north-south line is but 5½ arcminutes. The other three sides agree even better. Accuracy of this sort is possible, even with very simple techniques, provided that care is taken in setting out the lines. Preserving this accuracy on the monumental scale of the Great Pyramid, however, means not "twisting" the sides at higher levels, and the Egyptians' success is impressive. The corners of the base are very nearly right angles, and the entire base is almost a perfect square. The greatest difference in length between any two sides is 7.8 inches. This accuracy emphasizes the concern the builders had for the four cardinal directions, what the Pyramid Texts of the later Fifth and Sixth Dynasties call the "pillars" of the sky.

The internal details of the Great Pyramid are equally remarkable. A cross-section reveals a confusing collection of corridors, chambers, and shafts. Numerous claims for astronomical alignment of these vents and passages have been made, and most are wrong. There is astronomy among them, however. To appreciate it we must enter the pyramid.

22. The stellar alignments of the Great Pyramid's four shafts in the epoch of 2500 BC.

The Great Pyramid reveals much of the relgious beliefs of the Egyptians. There are 4 mysterious shafts emanating from the King's and Queen's Chambers of the Great Pyramid. Two of these shafts, once thought to be only "air ventalation shafts," are aligned perfectly to due north and the other two are perfectly to due south. They thus target, at varying altitudes, what astromomers refer to as the "meridian" - an imaginary line "dividing the sky" that is best envisioned as a hoop connecting the north and south poles and passing directly over the observer's head. What is terribly interesting is the theology that is written into the architecture of this Great Pyramid which not only instructs us but the precise alignments of these 4 shafts with key astral bodies operates as a time clock to pinpoint the time frame when this great wonder of the world was built. Recent investigators have established beyond any shadow of doubt that in circa 2500 B.C.E. - the era recognized by Egyptologists as the "Pyramid Age" - each of these shafts targeted a special star as it culminated at the meridian:

THE QUEEN'S CHAMBER

- From the Queen's Chamber, the northern shaft is angled at the star Kochab (Beta Ursa Minor) in the constellation of the Little Bear - a star associated by the ancients with "cosmic regeneration" and the immortality of the soul.
- The southern shaft, on the other hand, was aimed at the bright star Sirus (Alpha Canis Major) in the constellation of the Great Dog. This star the ancients associated with the goddess Isis, cosmic mother of the kings of Egypt.

THE KING'S CHAMBER

- From the King's Chamber, the northern shaft was aimed at the ancient Pole star, Thuban (Alpha Draconis) in the constellation of the Dragon - associated by the Pharoahs with notions of "cosmic pregnance and gestation."
- The southern shaft was angled at Al Nitak (Zeta Orionis), the brighest of the three stars in Orion's belt - which the ancient Egyptians identified with Osiris, their highe god of resurrection and rebirth and the lengenday bringer of civilization to the Nile Valley in a remeote epoc referred to as "Zep Tepi," the "First Time" when the Elohim walked the earth (see Genesis).

Both shafts, then, are oriented toward celestial zones that are mentioned in the Pyramid Texts. Thuban, as the North Star, was in a sense first among the circumpolar stars or "Imperishable Stars," as the Egyptians phrased it to acknowledge their ability to circuit eternally without ever setting. Its importance is further highlighted in that it is the Alpha star of Draco (the Dragon). Thuban, then, made an appropriate target for the north shaft. Meanwhile, the stars in Orion's belt, the objective of the south shaft, were among the decans, the stars whose risings or transits marked the hours of the night throughout the Egyptian year. Orion (as Osiris), of course, was Osiris, who presided over the resurrection of souls.

These celestial alignments don't make an observatory out of the Great Pyramid, for neither Thuban nor Orion's belt could actually be seen through the shafts' openings inside the King's Chamber. Both shafts bend horizontally for a short distance before they reach the King's Chamber and also at their other ends, prior to opening on the north and south faces of the pyramid. The shafts are symbolic references to the pharaoh's celestial destinies and to the starry realms that ordered heaven and earth. They mark the Great Pyramid as the site of his celestial transformation (Graham Hancock and Robert Buval, The Message of the Sphinx, Crown Publishers, New York, pp. 58-82).

Starry Tombs in the Valley of the Kings

Allusions to the same stellar destinies of the pharaoh appeared in the royal tombs of the New Kingdom, 1,500 years after the building of the pyramids. Most of these tombs are cut into the cliffs in the Valley of the Kings, near the old capital of Thebes on the Nile's west bank, across from modern-day Luxor.

Numerous representations of the "Northern Group," a figurative portrayal of the circumpolar constellations, were painted on the corridor ceilings in the tomb of Ramesses VI, a Twentieth Dynasty pharaoh. Perhaps the finest version of this theme appears overhead in the burial chamber of the tomb of Seti I, a member of the Nineteenth Dynasty, who ruled to about 1292 B.C. Against a rich blue field, we see the tawny forms of the constellations of the "northern Heaven." One of these, an upright hippopotamus with a crocodile on her back, leans upon an odd instrument, most often translated from references in the texts as a "mooring post." It is the north celestial pole, and the golden lines attached to it lead through the hands of an unidentified human figure to a bull. Sir Norman Lockyer, the British astronomer who discovered helium in the sun, devoted time and energy to astronomical interpretation of Egyptian myths and monuments, and he equated the hippopotamus with at least some of the stars of Draco the Dragon, the site of the north celestial pole in the early period of Egyptian civilization. It is actually broader than that and encompasses most of the northern heavens.

Just as the orientation of the Fourth Dynasty pyramids to the four cardinal directions stressed the cosmic order, so the burial chamber of Tutankhamun (Ca. 1345 B.c.) incorporated north-south and east-west alignments. References to the stellar destiny of this pharoah may now be seen in Cairo's Egyptian Museum. The inscriptions on the four gold-covered, boxlike shrines that formerly encased the sarcophagus of the deceased identify the king with Osiris, and Isis is described as following behind him, just as Sirius follows Orion across the sky. On the door of one of the shrines, Isis is portrayed as a bird with extended wings; on another she says: "I am thy protection, I am behind thee."

The tomb of Seti I, whose burial chamber ceiling illustrates the Northern Group, the stars around the north celestial pole, on one half, includes Sirius and Orion (as boat-borne figures of Isis and Osiris) on the other. Both stellar destinations of the pharaoh, portrayed here, repeat the traditions expressed in the Great Pyramid's "air shafts." On the ceiling of another burial chamber, that of Ramesses VI, The Book of the Day and The Book of the Night frame, each on its own side, the double body of the sky goddess. These texts chronicled the sun's journey, hour by hour, through the day and the night. They imply yet another celestial destiny for the pharaoh: the path of the sun.

Accompanying the images of Sirius and Orion in the tomb of Seti I, and on the ceilings of many other temples and tombs as well, are lists of the decans. The Decans were groups of stars from which the night sky was divided - these Decans were used as a calendar by the ancient Egyptians: each decan would rise above the dawn horizon for ten days every year (symbolic of rising from the darkness of death). There were 36 decans (36 X 10 = 360 days), + plus 5 added days to make up to 365 days. Diagonal "star clocks" listed the names of the timekeeping stars inside the lids of coffins from the Ninth through Twelfth Dynasties (2160-1786 B.c.). These clocks are really grid diagrams of the decans in the sequence of their appearance. A single star shifts its position in the grid, up one square and over one, to mark an earlier hour of the night every ten days. Each name, in hieroglyphs, traces a diagonal path through the grid and gives the design its name. Additional decorations usually include images of the Bull's Leg (that is, Set, the Big Dipper), Isis, and Osiris. Another type of star clock was painted in the Twentieth Dynasty tombs of the Ramesside pharaohs, from about 1300 to 1100 B.C. These, too, appeared together with the Northern Group, Sirius, and Orion. There is no reason to think Egyptian astronomers ever entered tombs to consult the star clocks. Their purpose was funereal. They belonged to the dead.

The decans themselves were selected because they imitated the behavior of Sirius and disappeared from the nighttime sky for 70 days. During this time they were up in the daytime, with the sun, and remained, therefore, invisible (they were "alive" but you could not see them...as in life after death). In Egyptian texts, a decan's departure from the night sky was called its death. It resided in the dangerous realm of Tuat, where the sun traveled each night. An astronomical treatise from the second century after Christ, the Papyrus Carlsberg I, quotes inscriptions from the cenotaph, or symbolic tomb, of Seti I at Abydos. Explicit references liken the decanal cycle to death and resurrection:

Here the language of the decans is the language of the mortuary. In a direct turnabout the mortuary customs mirrored the stars. The deceased was said to be a star, and mummification, also a process of purification, took 70 days. Then the dead pharaoh was reborn, like the decans.

In a similar manner it makes sense that the moon-which first appears as a crescent, grows full, and then wanes-is linked with the afterlife and immortality as we see this same cycle of birth, life, death, rebirth. In that celestial cycle of birth and death there is always another new moon. Through the cycle of cosmic order the moon guarantees its own immortality, and it is a fitting image for the belief of mankind of birth, life, death, and rebith from the dead which has been understood by the ancients since the beginning of time.

So as you can see the dead were associated with the sky. This may seem strange at first, but we can understand the ideas behind it. The souls of the dead journey to a celestial paradise; as Christians we call it "Heaven." Paradise is a realm of immortality and divinity, and that is what people see in the sky. Celestial objects, through their cycles of rising and setting, coming and going, waxing and waning, seem to die but are always reborn. They are the immortal gods, and the patterns of their movements establish order in time and space. The dead have access to their kingdom. Tombs are points of the soul's departure for the celestial realm. The astronomical components of these tombs are intimations of immortality (Dr. E.C. Krupp, Echoes Of The Ancient Skies, New American Library, 1983, pp. 100-125).

LIBRA, THE SCALES & THE WEIGHING OF THE HEART

The claws of the scorpion became known as the Scales around the time of the Greek and early Roman empires. Aratus referred to the constellation as the Claws of the Scorpion and called them "the mighty Claws...scant of light." However, well before Aratus this part of the sky was also linked to a light or lamp representing the Assyrian god Bir. Bir was known as Father and was a god of fire or great light who was believed to be found among these stars. Other images picture the stars as a lamp held by the scorpion, a type of light-and-dark symbol similar to the yin/yang symbol of the I Ching.

The Romans claimed they added this sign, bringing the number of the zodiac signs to twelve (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 200). But it should be remembered that, from at least 2,000 B.C.E., there were twelve signs with one, Scorpio, broken into two parts: the Scorpion and the Claws of the Scorpion. The Romans saw Libra as a symbol of justice ruled by their goddess, Astraea (Virgo), who held the Scales in her hands (Allen, Star Names, p. 270). She is still used today to represent the law and courts.

A possible origin of the association of the scales of Libra with justice is found in Egyptian theology, where the souls of the dead are weighed in a great scale following one's death as he stands before Osiris; the judge of the dead in the underworld. The Scorpion (Scorpio) was seen as the gateway to the afterlife, which was then followed by the scales of judgment (Libra) which represented justice, death, final judgment; this is the essence of this part of the sky. It is simply amazing when you piece this together and follow the successive religious theologies of Egypt that developed along with their understanding of the precession of the equinoxes over time.

WHAT ARE WE TO LOOK FOR IN THIS STUDY OF OSIRIS?

It is important in our study to remember what we have learned so far. Let us summarize.

Egypt looked at the Heavens and saw Divine order, patterns, and cycles. This was the only picture of the Creator God that they had besides Nature and in their observations of the Heavens they recognized and understood God was speaking over and over a Divine Message to them. The Egyptian Priests observed with great diligence the Heavens for thousands of years and in so doing came to clearly understand God and the this Divine Message and related concepts: "As above so beneath." Observing these Divine Laws, patterns, and cycles these Egyptian Priests saw God speaking to them over and over again "birth, life, death, and rebirth." There was a Divine Order to this cycle of "birth, live, death, rebirth." The Egyptian Priests observed this not only in the Heavens with the cycle and path of the Sun, but the stars and constellations as well. They also understood that the movement of the Sun, moon, and stars affected Nature and thereby the same Divine order, patterns, and cycles were repeated by God all around them as seen in the changing of the seasons with the vernal equinox, summer solstice, autumn equinox, and winter solstice. They understood this cycle as an unending and unchanging message from God: "birth, life, death, and rebirth." Truly "as above so beneath." In these changes of the seasons, as seen previously in Heaven above by the movement and path of the Sun, which was a representation to these Egyptian Priests of God and His Divine gift of life to mankind, God was speaking to them of "birth, life, death, and rebirth" through the repetition of these Divine Laws of the Cosmos. Later as their knowledge grew they recognized that these very same Divine Laws operated in their own bodies as well. The Egyptian Priests knew then that they were therefore created in the image of God and understood as well that they were responsible as well to the Creator to live according to these Divine Laws of Order of Heaven and Nature that operated both outside them and within their own bodies as well.

To better explain to the common man these simple yet profound truths and message of God the Egyptian Priests created "myths" and "allegories" to transmit such Priestly knowledge to the people. The various aspects and attributes of the Creator were personified in both human and animal forms that related such concepts on a lower level to the common man. In so doing these stories and allegories were simplified whereby the people could understand, but on a lower level, this Divine Message of God. As long as these "myths" and "stories" were left as allegory and metaphor then God and His Divine Message was left intact and remained pure.

However over time these "myths" got a life of their own and what was once a metaphor or allegory in myth form became literalized and was taught as if the character or representation of these truths were "real." In so doing these allegorical attributes of the incorporeal God became literalized as real people. Osiris, instead of being a personification of the cycle of "birth, live, death, and rebirth" that followed these Divine Laws (with accountability to God after death at the judgment) later receives a life of his own by being "literalized" as if a real personage. Over time these simple "myths" and "allegories" become literalized as real beings and worship is now given to them; not the incorporeal God who gets lost in all this errant theology as it evolves and becomes so immense. The simple monotheistic faith of Egypt now becomes complicated and develops into an almost unbelievably elaborate religious belief system as man creates a very complicated and conflicting spin-off religious synthesis that replaces the simple understanding of God that Egypt, who coined such beliefs in the first place, had concerning God.

Osiris is our case in point. From a simple "allegory" or "myth" comes a complex and often conflicting theology that become the very foundation, in one way or the other, of every successive Gentile nation and their later religious beliefs. Judeo-Christianity is not immune to this sickness. Our focal point is the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, as well as Palestine which will later assimilate the Osiris Pattern and apply it to their "angel messiah." In so doing they Essenes lay the groundwork for applying such religious beliefs not only to their Teacher of Righteousness who they declared "God in human form" but gave life to these concepts in Palestine as well. This is idolatry. It would be only a short time before these Essenes would likewise apply this same "Osiris" religious pattern to a crucified Jesus.

Out task is to examine not only the Osiris Myth in order to fully understand it in all of its ramifications both in the Heavens (solar, lunar, equinoxes, solstices, etc.) but in Nature as well (flooding of the Nile and its recession as related to celestial events, etc.) and then look for the parallels of the Osiris Myth in the depiction of the Jesus of the New Testament. Only in separating out Osiris and Horus, his son, from the historical Jesus can we hope to find truth concerning Jesus. Only in so doing and ferreting out these Osiris-Horus patterns from the Jesus stories in the New Testament can we hope to narrow down what might be possible truths concerning the Jesus of the New Testament. Let us not forget that this New Testament is an Essene literary production which is later "finished off" by Rome, who like their Essene predecessors, were involved in Sun Worship as well.

In order to make accurate comparisons and trace the theological evolution of the Essene "Godman concept" and their theology surrounding him it is necessary to acquaint ourselves with the fundamental tenants of such "Astro-Theology" and the religious beliefs which existed and which influenced these Essenes while in Egypt. Only when you have become familiar with each individual religious tenant connected with the "Cosmic Godman Redeemer" taken from the Osiris Myth and how such "beliefs" began and their origin [personification of forces and events in the heavens and nature] can one fully understand and recognize them accurately as they were later written and altered and subsequently applied to the Essene "angel messiah/godman" and later to Jesus in the New Testament.

So now we begin this task in earnest with the hope that when we are finished we can see more clearly whom the Jesus of the New Testament actually was and if his message was in all actuality a return to the simple "gospel" of Egypt which sadly today is long lost to the world. Jesus, like many of the prophets before him, called Israel back to this simple message of God once taught by the Egyptian Priests but the real message of Jesus today is not heard today by the vast majority of people who consider themselves "followers of Jesus." Jesus taught a message of repentance back toward this Divine Order of God's Laws as Moses had taught before him. Roman theology has replace the message of Jesus with a substitute consisting of accepting the adapted Osiris theology as applied to him. Study of the Osiris Myth will reveal this substitution to you beyond any doubt.

I will promise you two things if you undertake this study: Sadness and anger by what you will find that will convince you just how far you have strayed from the simple message of Jesus, the Jews and Egypt along with joy at recovering these Divine Truths once held sacred by the Ancients, Egypt, the Jewish Nation, and Jesus.

To say that you will be surprised by what you will uncover is an understatement and I only hope you have the hunger, patience, and diligence for such a study. Let us begin at the beginning with the first godman....Osiris.

THE OSIRIS MYTH

"We know not," once wrote Andrew Lang, "whence the Egyptians came; we only trifle with hypotheses when we conjecture that her people are of an Asiatic or an African stock; we know not whether her gods arose...to narrate and as far as possible elucidate this myth is the chief task of the student of Egyptian mythology" (Andrew Lang, Myth, Ritual and Religion, ii, p. 107, 135).

As we saw in earlier teachings on this website the Osiris Myth found it's ultimate origin in Astro-theology. We followed the synthesis of the Osiris myth from man's observations of the Sun and the illuminaries in the Heavens. Primitive man also made the connection that as these celestial changes occurred in the Solstices and the Equinoxes that conditions changed within Nature. Man personified these changes reflecting either "life" or "death" in stories about the Sun where it took on a life of its own in the heroes and villains of each nation. Such personifications of the Sun contributed to Sun-Worship not only in Egypt but eventually permeated all non-Jewish nations to some extent. Osiris served as the "pattern" for all subsequent Godmen Saviors and corresponding theologies and "Sun-myths" connected with him were later applied to agriculture and nature since Cosmic changes in the Sun and its course in the sky determined the productivity of vegetation in each season.

Let me say for starters that to understand the myth of Osiris is mandatory for Christians as you will quickly come to see since it provides the origin for many major parts of Christian theology let alone with the Jesus stories within the New Testament. We all wish to worship God in Spirit and in Truth; and that being the goal and purpose of faith, let us not be deceived any longer by our lack of knowledge concerning our faith. Without further delay, let us acquaint ourselves with the legend of Osiris, because only then are we able to "spot" the same solar-myths when they are repeated in the New Testament. Only in weeding out such Sun-myths can the truths that remain concerning Jesus be approached as possible truth.

THE LEGEND OF OSIRIS

Let us first, then, narrate the old legend, which is given by Plutarch as follows in the version by C. W. King's Isis and Osiris, pp. 12-19.

The following myth is related in the briefest terms possible, divested of everything unnecessary and superfluous. They tell that the sun having discovered Rhea secretly copulating with Kronos, laid a curse upon her, that she should not bring forth a child in either month or year: that Hermes being in love with the goddess copulated with her; and afterwards playing at draughts with the Moon and winning from her the seventy-second part of each one of her lights, out of the whole composed five days (no longer 360 but 365 days in a year), the which he added to the three hundred and sixty, which days now the Egyptians call “additional”, and keep as the birthdays of the gods; that on the first of these was born Osiris, and that a voice issued forth with him in the birth that "the Lord of all is entering into light." But some relate that a certain Pamyles, when drawing water out of the Temple of Zeus at Thebes, heard a voice ordering him to proclaim with a loud cry, "A great King, beneficent Osiris, is born", and for this cause he nursed Osiris, when Kronos put him into his hands, and also the festival "Pamylia" is celebrated in his honour, resembling in character the Phallephoria. On the second was born Aroeris, whom some call Apollo, some the elder Horus. On the third Typhon, neither in due time, nor in the right place, but breaking through with a blow, he leaped out through his mothers side. On the fourth was Isis born, in very wet places. On the fifth was Nephthys, the same as Teleute and Aphrodite, whom some call also Nike. They say that Osiris was begotten by the Sun, as also Aroeris, by Hermes Isis, by Kronos Typhon and Nephthys; that Osiris and Isis fell in love with each other and copulated under the cloak of darkness in the womb; some say that in this manner was Aroeris also begotten, and therefore is called by Egyptians the elder Horus, by the Greeks Apollo.

(Notice that the same gods and godesses, (the pattern) were known in other nations by other names...)...this shows the prevalence of such a myth among the non-Jewish nations

When Osiris reigned as a king, he made the Egyptians reform their destitute and bestial mode of living, showing them the art of cultivation, and giving them laws, and teaching them how to worship the gods. Afterwards he travelled over the whole earth, civilizing it; far from requiring arms, he tamed mankind through persuasion and reasoning joined with song of all kinds and music and brought them over to his side; wherefore Osiris is held by the Greeks to be the same with Dionysus (again the pattern of solar Godmen with different names in different nations). Typhon (personified "darkness" later understood as a type of Satan), during his absence, did not rebel, because Isis was on her guard, and able to keep watch upon him vigorously; but after Osiris returned Typhon laid a plot against him, having taken seventy and two men into the conspiracy, and having for helper a queen coming out of Ethiopia, whom they call Asó. He secretly measured the body of Osiris, and made to the size a handsome and highly ornamented coffer which he carried into the banqueting room. And as they were all delighted with its appearance and admired it, Typhon promised in sport that whoever should lie down within it and should exactly fit, he would make him a present of the chest; and after the others had tried, one by one, and nobody fitted it, then Osiris got in and laid himself down; thereupon the conspirators running up shut down the lid, and fastened it with spike-nails from the outside, and poured melted lead over them, and so carried it out to the River, and let it go down the Tanaite branch into the sea: which branch on that account is hateful even now and abominable for Egyptians to name. These things are said to have been done on the 17th day of the month Athor, when the sun is passing through the Scorpion, Osiris then being in the eight and twentieth year of his reign. Some have it that he had lived, not reigned, such a time.

The first to discover the mischief were the Pans and Satyrs inhabiting the country round Chemmis and to give intelligence about what had happened, whence the sudden terrors and fears of the multitude are to the present day called "panics". Isis on the news sheared off one of her tresses, and put on a mourning robe, whence the city even to the present day has the name of "Copto" (I beat the breast), but others think the name signifies bereavement, from "coptein", "to deprive". As she wandered about everywhere, not knowing what to do, she met no one without speaking to him, nay, even when she fell in with little children, she enquired of them about the coffer; these last chanced to have seen it, and told her the branch of the river through which Typhon's accomplices had let the chest drift into the sea. From this circumstance the Egyptians believe that little children possess the faculty of prophecy, and especially divine the future by their cries when they are playing in the temple courts and calling out whatever it may be. And having discovered that he (Typhon) had fallen in love and copulated with his sister in ignorance, as Osiris had done with herself, and seeing the proof thereof in the garland of melilote flower which he had left behind him with Nephthys, she sought for the infant (for she had at once exposed it, on bringing it forth, through her fear of Typhon); she found it at last with trouble and difficulty, through dogs guiding her to the place. This infant Isis nursed, and he grew up her guard and minister, being denominated Anubis and said to watch for the gods just as dogs do for men.

Proceeding thence, she learnt by inquiring that the chest with Osiris within it had been washed up by the sea at a place called Byblus, and that the surf had gently laid it under an Erica tree (impaled or encased on a tree). This Erica, a most lovely plant, growing up very large in a very short time, had enfolded, embraced, and concealed the coffer within itself. The king of the place, being astonished at the size of the plant, and having cut away the clump that concealed the coffer from sight, set the latter up as a pillar to support his roof. They tell how Isis, having learnt all this by the divine breath of fame, came to Byblus, and sitting down by the side of a spring all dejected and weeping, spoke not a word to any other persons, but saluted and made friends of the maid servants of the queen, by dressing their hair for them, and infusing into their bodies a wonderful perfume out of herself when the queen saw her maids again, she felt a longing to see the stranger, whose hair and whose body breathed of ambrosial perfume; and so she was sent for and, becoming intimate with the queen, was made nurse of her infant. The kings name, they say, was Malacander; herself some call Astarte, others Saosis, others Nemanous, who is the same with the Greek Athenais.

Isis is said to have suckled the child by putting, instead of her nipple, her finger into his mouth, and by night she singed away the mortal parts of his body. She turned herself into a swallow and flew around the pillar, twittering mournfully, until the queen watched her, and cried out when she saw her child all on fire, and so took away the boys immortality. Then the goddess, manifesting herself, asked for the pillar of the roof, and having removed it with the greatest ease, she cut away the Erica that surrounded it. This plant she wrapped up in a linen cloth, pouring perfume over it, and gave it in charge to the king; and to this day the people of Byblus venerate the wood which is preserved in a temple of Isis. But she fell upon the coffin and wailed so loud that the younger of the kings sons died of fright at it; the elder she took with her and, putting the coffer on board a ship, put to sea; but when the river Phaedrus sent forth too rough a gale, she grew wrath and dried up the stream.

As soon as ever she obtained privacy and was left to herself, having opened the coffer and laid her face upon the face of the corpse, she wailed and kissed it; but when the little boy observed this and came up quietly from behind to spy, she perceived him, and turning round gave him a dreadful look in her rage; the child could not stand the fright and died. Some say it was not so, but in the manner just stated he tumbled (in his fright) into the sea, but that he receives honours for the sake of the goddess, for the Maneros, whom the Egyptians sing about at their feasts, is this child. Others say that the boy is called Palaestinos, or Pelousios, and that the city was named after him, having been founded by the goddess. The Maneros that is sung about, they relate, first invented music. But some pretend "Maneros" is not the name of a person, but an expression suited to people drinking and keeping holidays and signifying "May things of the sort come with good luck," for that the Egyptians exclaim this each time upon the Maneros being uttered; just as, indeed, the exhibition of the image of a dead man in his coffin carried round at feasts is not a reminder of the mourning for Osiris, as some interpret it, but merely intended to warn one to make use of the present and enjoy it, as very soon they themselves shall be as he, which is why they bring it into the feast.

But when Isis had gone to see her son Horus (who was at nurse in the city Buto), and had put the coffer away, Typhon being out a-hunting by moonlight came upon it, and recognizing the corpse, tore it into fourteen pieces, and scattered them abroad. Isis, having heard of this, sought after the fragments, passing over the swamps in a papyrus boat; for which cause such as sail in papyrus boats are never injured by the crocodiles, because they either fear or respect the goddess; from this circumstance there are many places called "Tombs of Osiris" all over Egypt, because she, whenever she came upon a fragment of the body, there celebrated a funeral. Some deny this but say that she made images and gave them to the several cities, giving them as the actual body, in order that it may receive honours in many places, and that if Typhon should get the better of Horus, when searching for the real tomb, he may be baffled, from many being so called and pointed out. Of the members of Osiris the only one Isis was unable to find was the genital member, for it had been thrown at first into the river, and lepidotus, phagrus, and oxyrhyncus had fed upon it, which kinds of fish the natives scruple to eat above all others, and Isis in its stead made a model and consecrated it, namely, the phallus, in honour whereof to this day the Egyptians hold a festival. Isis made a new penis for Osiris' body. After the body was complete she impregnated herself with her husband's dead body. This becomes the foundation for later religious doctrines such as the "immaculate conception" as well as the "virgin birth." Isis was considered Virgin as she was seeded after the death and resurrection of Osiris … minus the phallus. Horus is the fruit of such an "immaculate conception." This impregnation was seen an the planting of seeds in a field. This is where he gets the name of god of vegetation.

Then Osiris came from the shades to Horus, and trained and exercised him for war, and then asked him "What he thought the finest thing possible?" and when he replied "to avenge ones father and mother when ill-treated", he asked him secondly "What he considered the most useful animal to people going to battle?" and when Horus answered "the horse", Osiris wondered at it and was puzzled why he said the horse instead of the lion. But when Horus explained that the lion indeed was serviceable to one standing in need of aid but the horse can both save him that flees and also destroy the enemy: Osiris on hearing this was rejoiced at the supposition that Horns had provided himself with horses. And as numbers came over from time to time to the side of Horus, Typhons concubine, Thoueris by name, Carrie also, and a serpent pursuing her was cut to pieces by the friends of Horus; and now in memory of this event, they throw down a rope in the midst of all and chop it to pieces. The battle between Horus and Typhon (Set) lasted for many days, and Horus vanquished; but Isis, having received from him Typhon in chains, did not destroy, but on the contrary unbound and let him go free. This Horus did not endure with patience, but he laid hands on his mother, and pushed the crown off her head; whereupon Hermes placed a bull-headed helmet upon her instead. And when Typhon brought a charge of illegitimacy against Horus, Hermes acting as his counsel, Horns was pronounced legitimate by the gods. After this Typhon was completely subdued in two other battles; and Isis conceived by Osiris copulating with her after death, and brought forth the prematurely born, and weak in his lower limbs, Harpocrates.

There, to quote Andrew Lang, the Greek narrator ends, but he expressly declines to tell the more blasphemous parts of the story, such as "the dismemberment of Horus and the beheading of Isis." Why these myths should be considered "more blasphemous" than the rest does not appear." One point from the rest of the text, as I think, requires here to be added. The moon, so we gather, was full, when Osiris was murdered by Set, whom the Greeks in their writings called Typhon.

Answer for yourself: Where does one turn to learn the esoteric religious meanings attached to this myth?

It is to this question that we now give answers.

INTRODUCTION TO ASTRO-THEOLOGY: THE BASICS TO UNDERSTANDING THE OSIRIS MYTH

It has been said that "The Christian religion is a parody on the worship of the Sun, in which they put a man whom they call Christ, in the place of the Sun, and pay him the same adoration which was originally paid to the Sun."- Thomas Paine

This is a most serious charge against Christianity as most know it and if such a charge can be shown to have validity then one should be honest enough before God to begin a serious investigation in his religious beliefs in order to separate truth from fiction.

Well it is for certain most who read our articles don't wish to be in "sin". A small article of this size cannot possibly do justice to such a complex and verbose subject as we have at hand but I hope to "break the egg" so to speak to help our readers begin to scrutinize the subject matter at hand in more detail by their personal study. Let's closely examine the original, conceptual foundations of the Christian faith, and then decide what to do with the serious "charge" made at the beginning of the article; that the Christian faith today is nothing but an evolution of "sun" worship transfigured into "Son" worship. Again I wish to reiterate the seriousness of such a charge if it can be proven.

BEGINNING...IN THE BEGINNING…

But in order to do that, we must go back not 2000 years to the birth of Christ, but 10 to 15,000 years to the birth of modern man. For when one seeks to establish foundations, one must begin at the beginning.

Many thousands of years ago, in what we refer to as the "primordial world" of the ancients, human life was a far different experience from that which we enjoy today. While it is true that we have less documentation on that prehistoric world than we have on our own age, enough is known from the ancient writings to paint a rather clear picture of our remote ancestry. If we have learned anything at all, it is this: "That the more we change, the more we stay the same." And nowhere is this more clearly demonstrated than in the history of man's quest for "God", and the ancient religion we still keep holy.

According to the best understanding we have gleaned from the available records, life for our ancient forefathers was a mixture of wonder and fear. Each day, just finding food for one's family without becoming a meal oneself was a life-and-death struggle. It was from these meager, distressful conditions of the human race that our long history of the search for God and meaning of life has come.

Any evolution, at its most accelerated rate, is always agonizingly slow. But from the beginning, man's profound questions demanded answers. When no clear answers were forthcoming from the universe, man turned inward and developed his own. The study of this subject is termed "Astro-Theology" or the "worship of the heavens ".

It did not take ancient man very long to decide that in this world the single greatest enemy to be feared was the darkness of night. Simply stated, man's first enemy was darkness.

With this one fact alone, one can readily understand why the greatest and most trustworthy friend the human race would ever have was heaven's greatest gift to the world . . . the Glorious Rising Orb of Day...THE SUN.

Today, as in all of mankind's history, from almost every nation under the sun, we find the same religious story told over and over. This story transverses all races and nationalities as far as recorded history can be discovered. This is of major importance as it has a direct bearing of what you have been told as "religious truth" by your religious authorities. This same story has once again been told anew to most of you, as well as I, in the churches we attend as well as in the New Testaments we carry. This is the story of Christianity: "The Greatest Story Ever Told." If one could undertake only a simple inquiry into the matter one would quickly see the hundreds of parallels between Christian metaphors concerning its "dying savior" and the natural reality of the sun and sky which are so striking and startling that one would come to the conclusion rather easily that the "Christian revelation of its crucified savior" does not constitute a new and unique revelation, but rather a re-telling of the same old myths which have been handed down since the earliest times of mankind which the earliest written records attest!

Modern-day Christianity has often belittled our ancient ancestors who are not here to defend themselves. They accuse them of being nothing more than ignorant worshippers of miscellaneous Gods. Therefore we can, with assurance, summarily dismiss 14,000 years of human spirituality as ignominious myth believed by well-meaning but gullible primitives. Too much of this kind of spiritual arrogance and religious pride has continued without challenge . . Until now! The time has come to set matters straight.

THE GREATEST STORY....EVER TOLD, AND TOLD, AND RETOLD

The "Greatest Story" went something like this . . .

The ancient peoples reasoned that no one on Earth could ever lay claim of ownership to the Great Orb of Day (the sun). Such a magnificent heavenly body must belong to the unseen Creator of the universe. It became, figuratively speaking, not man's, but "God's Sun." It was only a short hop and skip to the understanding that "God's Sun" was . . ."The Light Of The World."

As stated before, in the dark cold of night man realized his utter vulnerability to the elements. Each night, mankind was forced to wait for the "Rising of The Sun" (resurrection of the Sun) to chase away the physical and mental insecurity brought on by the darkness. Therefore, the morning Sun focused man's attention on heavenly dependence for his frail, short existence on Earth. Doing so, it became an appropriate symbol of divine benevolence from heaven.

So just as a small fire brought limited light into man's own little world of darkness, likewise, the "Great Fire of Day" served the whole Earth with its heavenly presence. For this reason, it was said at Deut. 4:24 and Heb. 12:29 that the God of the Bible was a "Consuming Fire" in heaven. And so He was!

It was accepted by all that man was bound to a life on Earth, but the sky was the abode of God's Sun. He resides "up there" in. . . "Heaven."

Ancient man saw in his male offspring his own image and likeness, and his own existence as a father was proved by the person of his son. Thus, it was assumed that "God's Sun" was but a visible representative of the unseen Creator in heaven. So it was said, "When you have seen the Son, you have seen the Father." Said another way, "The Father is glorified in His Son."

Ancient man had no problem understanding that all life on Earth depended directly on life-giving energy from the Sun. Consequently, all life was lost without the Sun. It followed that "God's Sun" was nothing less than "Our very Savior." This is a major concept in the evolution of religion and should not be under estimated in the creation of future theologies; especially in the Gentile nations who will have their multitudes of "crucified saviors" which would serve again as precursors to the Jesus story of Rome. Logically, even if man himself dies, as long as the Sun comes up each day, life on Earth will continue forever. Therefore, it was said in the ancient texts that everlasting life was "the gift" that the Father gives through his Sun. Not for you personally but for the Earth . . . everlasting life!

Since evil and harm lurked at every turn in the fearful dark of night, all evil or harmful deeds were naturally the . . ."Works of Darkness." And of course the evil of night was ruled over by none other than . . . "The Prince of Darkness." Hence, evil is of the Dark or of the "D-Evil"…the Devil!!!

Mankind progresses through his history but he retains his fears and phobias as well as his religious concepts based upon such superstitions as we have shown. We now have before us two cosmic brothers - one very good, and one very bad. This would be the basis for all Dualistic Religions that preceded Christianity. One brings the "truth to light" with the "light of truth." The other is the opposite, or in opposition to the light - "The Opposer" . . . Prince of the World of Darkness.

EGYPTIAN RELIGION AND THE SUN/SAVIOR...OSIRIS/HORUS

At this point we come to Egypt. More than three thousand years before Christianity began, the early morning "Sun/Savior" was pictured in Egypt as the "New Born Babe." The infant savior's name was "Horus," the Son for Osiris.

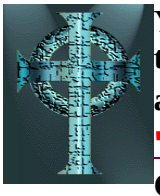
At daybreak each day, this wonderful, newborn child (represented by the Sun…the Sun/Savior) is of course "Born Again". Horus is risen on the Horizon as the sun rises in the East daily.

And of course "God's Sun" goes to His death at sundown wearing a "crown of thorns" or "corona" (the rays of the sun so clearly seen at sunset)/ Remember the Statue of Liberty? To this day, kings still wear a round crown of spikes, symbolizing the rays of the Sun!

The Egyptians knew that the Sun was at its highest point in the sky (or high noon) when no shadow was cast by the pyramid. At that point, all Egypt offered prayers to the "Most High" God! As stated before, to the ancients, the sky was the abode, or heavenly temple, of the "Most High." Therefore, "God's Sun" was doing His heavenly Father's work in the temple at 12 noon!

IMPORTANCE OF THE SUN DIAL & CROSS OF THE ZODIAC… RELIGION ADVANCES

The world of ancient man kept track of times and seasons by the movement of the Sun - daily, monthly, yearly. For this, the sundial was devised. Not only the daily movement of the Sun was tracked on the round dial, but the whole year was charted on a round calendar dial. Examples: Ancient Mexican, Mayan, Inca, Aztec, Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Egyptian, Celtic, Aryan, etc. With this method, certain new concepts emerged in the mind of ancient man



Since the Earth experiences four different seasons, all the same and equal (in time) each year, the round calendar was divided into four equal parts. This represented the complete story of the life of "God's Sun." The famous painting of The Last Supper pictures the 12 followers of the Son in four groups (of 3) . . . the four seasons of the year! Think on this for a minute!

On the round surface of the yearly calendar, you draw a vertical line directly across the middle, cutting the circle in half - one end being the point of the winter solstice; the other end being the point of the summer solstice. Then draw another straight line (crossing the first one). One end of the new line is the spring equinox; the other end is the autumn equinox.

You now have the starting points for each of the four seasons. This is referred to by all major encyclopedias and reference works, both ancient and modern, as "The Cross of the Zodiac." Thus, the life of God's "Sun" is on "the Cross." This is why we see the round circle of the Sun on the crosses of Christian churches. The next time you pass a Christian church, look for the circle (Sun) on the cross.

On December 21 or 22, the Sun, going south, reaches its lowest point in the sky (our winter solstice). By December 25th, it is clear that the Sun its returning northward. Therefore on December 25th the sun is "Born Again." Christians stole December 25th from the Roman celebration of Sol Invictus-the Sun Unconquered. And to this day, worshippers still celebrate the birthday of the Sun only under the disguise of the birthday of the Son…Jesus.

It was well understood by ancient man that our weather was caused and controlled by the Sun. It was a simple fact that God's Sun had the power to control storms at will. The ancient Egyptians taught that He did this as He rested in His heavenly boat while crossing the sky. The story of Jesus calming the storm (Matt. 8:23-27) echoes this.

The next point to be made requires first a little background. Christians have always referred to God as "The Father." But viewing God as a father didn't start here - it goes back far into the ancient world. The reason is: Our planet was always viewed as our "Mother Earth or Mother Nature." And since rain (the life-bringing fluid), falling from heaven, impregnated and brought life to Mother Earth, it was therefore believed that our Father was in Heaven.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE INFLUENCE OF THE PHARAOHS

Though all of the essential pieces of the Christian story were long in existence before Egypt, it was with the coming of the Pharaohs that the story was finally codified and became religious dogma. Though the story varied in some details from place to place in Egypt, the essence was always the same: God's Sun was the "Light of the World," who gave His life for us.

In ancient Egypt it was said that if you wanted to follow the life of God's Sun and thereby "live in the light of God's Word," one would have to leave his old ways of life to "Follow the Sun." But before beginning this new life in "The Word," one must die to the old way of life and be "Born Again." Your first birth was "out of water" your mother formed you in. Because her water broke and your new life began, rebirth is symbolized by coming out of total immersion in water-baptism-or being born again.

In Mal 4:2, the God of Heaven is described as the "Sun of Righteousness with healing in His wings." The Sun with healing in His wings?? Then in the New Testament in Matt. 23:37 and Luke 13:34, we see God's Son wanting to gather all under "His wings." This is most appropriate for, in Egypt, the Sun was always pictured with His wings. I mention this only to show you that even the Old Testament is not immune from such symbolism within itself.

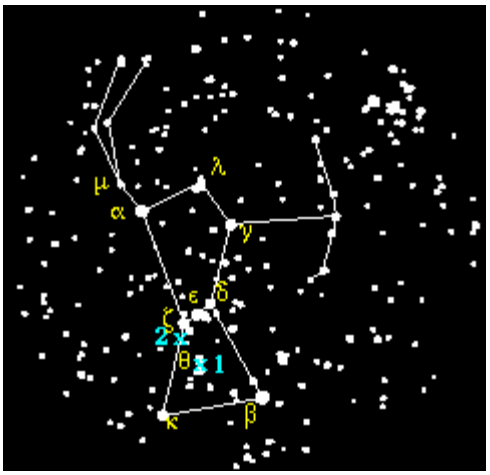
These points here mentioned are a few of hundreds, if not thousands of direct connections that can be made between the Christian Bible Story and the far more ancient, original story from the origin of religion among mankind. My purpose for drawing your attention to this literary plagiarism is best stated by Alfred North Whitehead who said, "No lie can live forever," and Egyptologist Gerald Massey, "They must find it difficult, those who have taken authority as the truth, rather than truth as the authority."

I would like to leave you with a quote which I hope will serve as an impetus for your further study into these areas in order that you "cast out the leaven" of perverse lies taught as truth:

"All Indo-Germanic nations have worshipped crucified Saviors and overwhelming proof was obtained that the sun-myths of the ancient Aryans were the origin of the religion in all the countries which were peopled by the Aryans"… Charles Morris. Let us study to show ourselves approved by God. Anyone wanting to look into this subject more thoroughly might read Aryan Sun Myths …The Origin of Religion by Charles Morris…and Bible Myths by T. W. Doane.



Let us continue to uncover more truth long covered up and withheld from us.

ORION, THE HUNTER...THE STARS BECOME PERSONIFIED

Osiris/Orion...the slayer of the bull (Taurus) in Egypt; Orion the Hunter in Greek Myth

Orion is the hunter; the constellation Orion dominates the sky in winter, the hunting season . Late in April, Orion's left foot begins to disappear below the early evening horizon.

ORION/OSIRIS IN EGYPTIAN MYTH

In ancient Egypt, the stars in the constellation we call Orion were connected with the god Osiris. As you have now see the ancient Egyptians saw in the Heavens events and forces that they later personified into characters to better explain what they believed they saw. These cosmological ideas of ancient Egypt were expressed by myth and symbolism, which are a superior means for expressing metaphysical concepts. Philosophy, mathematics and science are dry subjects with many abstracts. Mythology incorporates philosophical and scientific ideas into a story form, like a sacred drama or mystery play, which can be easily digested. Pure philosophical and scientific abstracts and terms do not guarantee understanding. Information alone is useless, unless it is transformed into understanding. Well-crafted mythology can achieve that understanding. Again it needs to be stressed that this understanding of the Creator and His actions exhibited and observed by these Egyptians were later personified and symbolized by various entities which were narrated in story form to express such Divine concepts. Egyptian symbolism could be compared in some sense to modern day caricature. The use of symbols are arbitrary and reveal nothing functional of the entity they symbolize. As such, a symbol, by definition, is not what it represents, but what it stands for, what it suggests. A symbol reveals to the mind a reality other than itself. Central to their complete understanding of the universe, was the knowledge that man was made in the image of god, and as such, man represented the created image of all creation. Accordingly, Egyptian symbolism and all measures were therefore simultaneously scaled to man, to the earth, to the solar system, and ultimately to the universe. In order to simplify and convey these abstract notions of god's attributes, some fixed representations were invented. As a result, the figures of Ptah, Osiris, Amun, Mut, etc., became the signs of such attributes/functions; these are no more than personifications of what these stargazers saw in the Heavens.

According to Plutarch, the Egyptian god Osiris was killed by his brother Seth. Isis, the faithful wife of Osiris, revived his body long enough to conceive their son, Horus. Osiris rose from the dead; after his resurrection he took a different form, becoming god of the dead. His tribunal passed judgment on every soul bound for the world beyond.

The son Horus found himself in the same situation that Hamlet, Prince of Denmark would face, thousands of years later. When Horus grew up, he avenged his father by battling his uncle Seth and defeating him. However, Horus sacrificed an eye in the battle, which he took to the underworld and gave to Osiris. This gift was interpreted as giving Osiris back his soul.

The belt stars of Orion point to Sirius, a bright blue star associated with the goddess Isis. Both Orion/Osiris and Sirius/Isis are on the west bank of the Milky Way.

ORION AND THE GREEKS

Orion was a mortal son of Poseidon (Neptune), god of the sea. His father gave him the gift of walking under water. Orion was very strong and handsome, and was always getting into trouble over women. Depending on the story teller, Orion is either a brute or is very unlucky.

Orion was asked by King Oenopion of Chios to rid his island of wild animals. Orion fell in love with the King's daughter, Princess Merope, but the King was opposed. Some say Orion became drunk and attacked Merope, others say the King made Orion drunk and put out Orion's eyes while he slept. Orion's blindness explains why the stars in the head of Orion are faint.

Orion regained his eyesight when he asked to be led in the direction of the rising sun. (At first glance this doesn't appear to make sense: when Orion is visible, he is always running toward the west, not east. It might make more sense in the context of precession of the equinoxes.)

In another story, Orion was involved with Artemis (Diana), goddess of hunting and twin sister of Apollo. (Artemis is strongly associated with the moon.)

Some say Orion challenged Artemis, who sent a scorpion to bite him. (In spring, the constellation Scorpius rises in the east as Orion dies his seasonal death in the west.) Others say it was Gaia who sent the scorpion, when she heard that Orion had threatened to kill every animal on earth.

Still others say Artemis loved Orion, but her brother Apollo disapproved and tricked his sister into shooting Orion with an arrow. Orion was walking in a river with only his hair above water, so Artemis didn't recognize him. (The head of Orion is in the Milky Way, known in the far east as Silver River. So the story about walking under water was intended to remind us that the head of Orion is in the celestial river, the Milky Way. The arrow in the story may come from Mesopotamian sky lore: they saw the bright star Sirius as the point of an arrow aimed at Orion from the constellation we call Canis Major, the dog.)

STAR NURSERY

The Orion Nebula, located near the star theta Orionis, is avidly studied by astronomers today because it is a region of intense star formation. The nebula is a huge cloud of hot gas heated by radiation from nearby young stars: a sort of blister on a cloud of molecules. Radiation pressure and particle winds streaming from these young stars heats and compresses the neighboring clouds of molecules, which helps form new stars. The Hubble Space Telescope has taken some stunning photographs of the Orion Nebula and its star formation process. (R.C. Bless, Discovering the Cosmos, University Science Books, 1996, pp. 327-8, 346-7.)

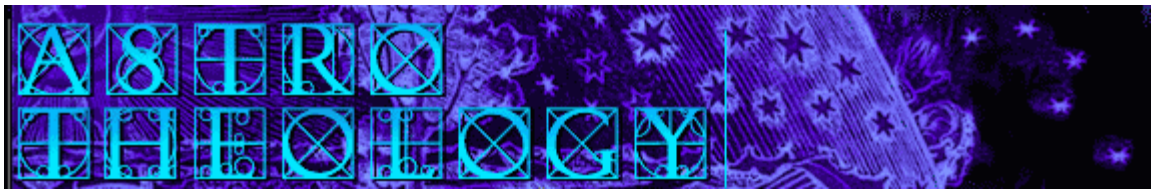
THE OSIRIS MYTH...DOWN THROUGH THE AGES

Osiris, in Egyptian mythology, was one of the principal deities. Originally the local god of Abydos and Busiris, Osiris, who represented the male productive force in nature, became identified with the setting sun. Thus he was regarded as the ruler of the realm of the dead in the mysterious region below the western horizon (remember the Sun set in the West and sinks below the horizon...to the Egyptians a symbol of the netherworld). Osiris was the brother and husband of Isis, goddess of the earth and moon, who represented the female productive force in nature. According to legend, Osiris, as king of Egypt, found his people plunged in barbarism and taught them law, agriculture, religion, and other blessings of civilization. He was murdered by his evil brother, Set, who tore the body to pieces and scattered the fragments. Set is best understood as personified "darkness." Here we find the first "spiritual warfare": the light of the Sun vs the darkness. We call it "dualism" and it will become the foundation for many world religions. Isis found and buried his scattered remains, however, and each burial place was thereafter revered as sacred ground. Their son Horus, sired by a temporarily regenerated Osiris, avenged his father's death by killing Set and then ascended the throne. Osiris lived on in the underworld as the ruler of the dead, but Osiris was also, through Horus, regarded as the source of renewed life.

The cult of Isis spread from Alexandria throughout the Hellenistic world after the 4th century BC. It is here that we find the Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt, heavily influenced by the Isis cult and this is reflected in their corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures when translated by them into the Greek known today as the Septuagint.

The cult of Isis appeared in Greece in combination with the cults of Horus, her son, and Serapis, the Greek name for Osiris. The Greek historian Herodotus identified Isis with Demeter, the Greek goddess of earth, agriculture, and fertility. The tripartite cult of Isis, Horus, and Serapis (the Trinity) was later introduced (86 BC) into Rome in the consulship of Lucius Cornelius Sulla and became one of the most popular branches of Roman religion. It later received a bad reputation through the licentiousness of some of its priestly rites, and subsequent consuls made efforts to suppress or limit Isis worship. The cult died out in Rome after the institution of Christianity, and the last remaining Egyptian temples to Isis were closed in the middle of the 6th century AD. Simply said the cult of Isis died out because it was transformed into Gentile Christianity through religious synthesis and survives as such today yet unrecognized by most.



He carries the flagellum and crook, connecting this most ancient god of rebirth to the Neolithic arts of agriculture and herding. The bringer of vegetative growth, Osiris annually was resurrected by Isis. Many elements of his cult influenced later Hebrew and Christian ritual. His animal surrogate is the bull Apis.

With these few facts let us begin our study of the evolution of the Osiris Myth and its influence upon world religions; Christianity included.

THE ARYAN PEOPLES AND THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES & THE JESUS' STORY: ASTRO-THEOLOGY & THE OSIRIS MYTH

In ancient times there lived on the highest elevation of Central Asia a noble race of men called the "Aryan." ..the Indo-European people otherwise known as "Aryans." These "Aryans" are that part of the human race that include the peoples of India, the Hindus, and Persians as well as most European. Archeological evidence, as well as linguistical studies, will prove that the European race traces its roots back to the Aryan peoples. The Aryans will be the forerunners of the Teutonic peoples which comes from a term "Teutons," which is a Latinized form of the word meaning the people of Germanic origin in general. However, it also refers to the languages spoken by other peoples including the Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, English, Dutch, Icelandic, Norse, Danish, German, and Swedish. Don't look now but we are speaking of Eastern European people. What is important for our study is that a link can be found between these Teutonic peoples and their predecessors...the Indo-European people otherwise known as "Aryans." This is very important for our study as we trace the evolution and spread of Sun-worship and how it became the backbone of all Gentile pagan religions and finally culminating as the core of Christian doctrines. Just remember the importance of the Aryan people for now. These Aryan people spoke a language not yet Sanskrit (ancient language of the Hindus, Greek, or German, but containing dialects of all). We need to understand that the nations which we normally think are European, especially Eastern European, from which America would spring one day, was heavily influenced by these people and that applies to their religious ideas as well. This is very important to remember as our study progresses.

THE WORSHIP OF THE ARYANS

These Aryan people worshipped nature; the sun, moon, sky, and earth as a comparison of ancient religions and mythology in the land peopled by Aryans, demonstrates. Their chief object of adoration was the Sun. To this race, in the infancy of its civilization, the Sun was not a mere luminary, but a Creator, Ruler, Preserves, and Savior of their world as they knew it. Around the Sun these people would develop a religious doctrine which finds its origin in the Sun and its influence upon mankind. Such is called "Astro-Theology".

The major factor to consider when reading and studying these "Astro-theologican Sun-Myths" is how they are to be interpreted. There are two ways that they have been approached by scholars; one today is accepted the other rejected. The historical interpretation is today discounted and most understand them to be an allegorical relating of the attributes of the Sun and its influence upon man.

As there could be no life or vegetation without light, the Sun, as a light-bringer, became for these people their Creator. If Creator, it was logical that this same Sun was then Ruler of their world as they knew it. This Sun was in reality their "Father" of all things both seen and unseen. These people related in pictures as much as words. In driving away the darkness, likewise in fertilizing the earth, the Sun became for them the Preserver and kind Protector of all living things…..the Savior of mankind. As the Sun sometimes scorches and withers vegetation and dries up the rivers, this same Sun was conceived of as a Destroyer also. As Creator, Preserver, and Destroyer the Sun was three persons in one…the Trinity. This is the first time man imagined a Trinity within their Sun god. History proves such a concept would never pass away.

It is very hard for man at the present day to realize the feelings with which the first dwellers on earth looked upon the Sun. Put yourself in their shoes for just a minute. "Think of man," says Professor Muller, "at the dawn of time…Was not the sunrise to him the first wonder, all though, all philosophy? Was it not to him the first revelation, the first beginning of all trust, of all religion?"

The Aryans looked up to the sky and gave it the name Dyaus, from a root-word which means "to shine." This name was to stick. When, out of the forces and forms of nature, they would later fashion other gods, this name of Dyaus became "Dyaus Pitar", the "Heavenly Father," or "All-Father." The earth they worshipped as the Mother of all.

THE "SUN" BECOMES THE OFFSPRING OF THE SKY GOD THE "SUN" IS NOW THE "SON" OF GOD

Their reasoning led them to believe that the Sun was the product of the Sky god; the Heavenly Father. This "offspring of the Sky-god" was none other than "the Son of the Sky", or that the Sun was the "Son of the Heavenly Father", and that the immaculate virgin, the Earth (sometimes it was the dawn or the night), was the Mother of the Sun. Hence we have the Virgin, or Virgo, as one of the signs of the Zodiac.

As the Sun begins the apparent annual northward journey on the 25th of December, this was said to be the birthday of the Sun (all movement commences with birth). This special day, the birthday of the Sun, was observed with great rejoicings. On this day the sign of the Virgin is rising on the eastern horizon, the Sun having reached the winter solstice.

The division of the first decan of the Virgin represents a beautiful immaculate virgin with flowing hair, sitting in a chair, with two ears of corn in here hand, and suckling an infant called "Iesus" (Jesus in Latin), by some nations, and "Christos" (Christ in Greek) which means "an Anointed One, a Messiah. The infant denotes the Sun, which at the moment of the winter solstice, precisely when the Persian magi drew the horoscope of the new year, was placed on the bosom of the Virgin.

The zodiacal sign of Aires was anciently known as the Lamb; consequently, when the Sun made the transit of the equinox under this sign, the Sun was called the "Lamb of God." Later when the Sun was personified as "the Son" then the "Son was the Lamb of God."

The birth of the Sun was said to be heralded by a star…the Morning-star, which rises immediately before the Virgin and her Child. As the Sun appears to start from a dark abode, it was said that he was "born in a cave or manger,"or dungeon, and the splendor of the morning sky was said to be the halo around his cradle. As the Sun scatters the darkness, it was said that he would be the destroyer of the reigning monarch, Night. Warned of this peril by oracles, Night tries to prevent the birth of the Sun, and, failing in that, seeks to "take his life." For this reason it is said that the Sun is left on the bare hillside to perish, as he seemingly rests on the earth at his rising. The Sun meets with temptations on his course, is beset by foes, clouds of storm an darkness; but, in the struggle which ensues, he is conqueror, the gloomy army, broken and rent, is scattered. The daughters of his foes, the last light vapors which float in the heavens, try in vain to clasp and retain him, but he disengages himself from their embraces; and, as he repulses them, they writhe, lose their form and vanish. Temptations to sloth and luxury are offered him in vain; he has work to do, and nothing can stay him from doing it. He travels over many lands, and toils for the benefit of others; he does hard service for a mean and cruel generation. He is continually in company with his Twelve Apostles; the twelve signs of the zodiac.

As he approaches midsummer, he appears in all his splendor, he has reached the summit of his career; henceforth his power diminishes, and he meets with an early and a volent death, from which there is no escape. When the extreme southern limit his course is reached, his enemies (darkness and cold which have sought in vain to wound him) win the victory. The bright Sun of summer is slain, crucified in the heavens, and pierced by the spear (thorn, or arrow) of winter. He who has performed such marvellous miracles, healing the sick and raising the dead, cannot save himself; a stern fate decrees that he must die an ignominious death.

As the Sun wakens the earth to life after the long sleep of winter is passed, it was said that he raised the dead. The Sun is said to be "crucified", with outstretched arms in the heavens; outstretched to bless the world he is trying to save from the terror of darkness. His arms remain outstretched to the tree, or cross. It is an ancient custom to use trees as gibbets for crucifixion, or, if artificial, to call the cross a "tree," the tree being one of the symbols of nature-worship, which denoted the fructifying power of the Sun. The Sun crucified was the Sun in winter as it dies when it falls below the equator and the length of darkness of the days increase, when it is subjected to the evil power of darkness, the "D-evil" or the "Devil," when his fructifying power is gone. The Sun, in its death descends to hades for 3 days, then resurrects in its northward journey of re-birth on it way to spring as it is "resurrected."

Before the Sun dies he see all his disciples; his retinue of light, the twelve hours of the day or the twelve months of the year. These disappear into the clouds of evening; but the tender mother and the fair maidens he has loved; the beautiful lights which flush the eastern sky as the Sun sinks in the west. The tender lights of Sun-set remain with him till the very last. Their tears are the tears of dew. At the "death of the Sun" there is darkness over all the land. He descends into Hell, or Hades. In ancient times Hell, or Hades, was a place neither of reward nor punishment, but was simply the home of the dead, good and bad alike, the word primarily signifying nothing more than the hollow grave, hole, pit, cavern, or other receptacle which receives the dead. By the Aryans, Hades was supposed to be in the far west, which to them was always the region of darkness and death, as the east was of light and life. On the 22nd of December the Sun enters the sign of Capricornus, or the Goat, and appears to remain in the same place for 3 days and three nights, and then begins to ascend. This was said to be the resurrection of the Sun from Hades or the grave. At the vernal equinox, at Easter, the Sun has been below the equator and suddenly rises above it. It rises triumphant over the powers of darkness and cold. The resurrection of the Sun was generally celebrated on the 25th of March, when the return to spring may be said to be the result of the return of the Sun, from the lower or far-off regions to which it had departed.

What is important for the reader to understand is that each of these Aryan nations had their own Sun Story and this was later personified in the lives of each nation's heroes; either real or fictitious:

- Egypt gave us the myth of the original Savior God Osiris
- Adonis and Aphrodite
- The Greek Dionysus
- Attis and Cybele
- Demeter and Persephone
- Orpheus and the reconstruction of Dionysus
- Zoroaster and Zoroastrianism
- Brahmanism
- Buddhism as a revolt against Brahmanism
- Pythagoras and his religious synthesis
- Isis and Serapis
- Mithraism

What is important for our study is that it would be the Essenes of the first century A.D., who in repudiation of a Judaism they felt had apostasized since they had lost the priesthood to the Hasmoneans, turned from many Jewish beliefs and under the influence of their Teacher of Righteousness, adopted many of the above religious beliefs which can be shown to have had their origin in sun-worship. These Essenes would later attach themselves with the Jesus Movement in Palestine and this explains the infusion of their religious beliefs into the early church and the early faith which is today called Christianity.

SYMBOLISM AND SUN WORSHIP

There were numerous symbols which were held as sacred to the Sun, the most common being the fish, the lamb, the cross, and the serpent. The serpent was an emblem of the Sun, when represented with his tail in his mouth, thus forming a circle. The serpent was an emblem of eternity, when represented as casting off his skin; but when represented with his deadly sting, he was an emblem of evil. When represented as crucified on the tree (cross), the serpent denoted the Sun in winter, when it has lost its fructifying power.

RITES AND CEREMONIES ORIGINATING WITH SUN WORSHIP

The Aryans observed various rites and ceremonies, among them being Baptism and the sacrament of the Eucharist. If you read the individual accounts of these Sun-myths and their personification listed above, then you should have seen how each one of the personified sun-gods had a sacred meal and Eucharist. Each one in some manner obtained salvation either through "eating the essence of the god" or being "unified with the god" though sexual union with one who represented the god; either male or female. There is nothing new under the Sun as we find the same concept of the Eucharist involved in Christianity; both Catholic and Protestant. Indeed, the doctrine of Transubstantiation is one of the most ancient of doctrines. The whole Christian world practices this same rite Sunday after Sunday and never stops to think how the Passover was changed by the earlyGentile Church into the Eucharist; something they Gentiles always had done!

Baptism was held to be a regenerating rite; and rivers, as sources of fertility and purification, were at an early date invested with a sacred character. Every great river was supposed to be permeated with the divine essence, and its waters held to cleanse from moral guilt and contamination.

The doctrines of Original Sin and the Fallen Condition of Man were not unknown to the primitive Aryan, who, in order to propitiate his gods, atone for sins, or avert calamities, offered sacrifices to them. When men lived mostly on vegetables, they offered grain, salt, fruits, water, and flowers; but when they began to eat meat and spices, and drink wine, they offered these also. The Aryans naturally supposed that the gods would be pleased with whatever was useful or agreeable to them.

In the course of time it began to be imagined that the gods demanded something more sacred as offerings, or atonements, for sin. This led to the sacrifice of human beings, at first of slaves and those taken in war, and finally of their own children, even their most beloved and first-born. It came to be an idea that every sin must have its prescribed amount of punishment, and that the gods would accept the life of one person in atonement for the sins of others. From this arose a belief in the redemption from sin by the sufferings of a Divine Incarnation, by death on a tree or cross, or otherwise.

THE SPREAD OF THESE BELIEFS

Branches of the Aryan race migrated to the east and to the west. One of the offshoots, at the west, founded the Persian kingdom; another built Athens and Lacedaemon, and became the Greek nation; a third went to Italy, and reared the city on the seven hills, which grew into imperial Rome. A distant colony of the same race excavated the silver mines of prehistoric Spain; and the first glimpse at ancient England reveals Aryan descendents fishing in willow canoes. Germany was also peopled by the Aryans. Meanwhile other bands of Aryans had gone forth, from the primitive home in Central Asia to the seacoast. Powerful hands found their way through the passes of the Himalayas into the Punjab, and spread themselves, chiefly as Brahmans and Rajputs, over India.

Wherever the Aryans went, the Sun-myths went with them, and appeared in the course of time, after their origin was forgotten, as the groundwork of religions, epic-poems, folk-lore, and nursery tales. Out of these myths were shaped by degrees innumerable gods and demons of the Hindus; and devs and jins of the Persians; the great gods, the minor deities, and nymphs and fauns and satyrs, of Greek mythology and poetry; the stormy divinities, the giants and trolls, of the cold and rugged north; the dwarfs of German forests; the elves who dance merrily in the moonlight of an English summer; the "good people" who play mischievous tricks upon stray peasants among the Irish hills; fairies and gods and heroes.

Almost all we have of legend come to us from our Aryan forefathers. Often the stories are scarcely changed; sometimes so altered that the links between the old and the new have to be puzzled out; but all these myths and traditions, when we come know the meaning of them, take us back to the time when the Aryans dwelt together in the high lands of Central Asia. They all mean the same things; namely, the relation between the Sun and the earth, the succession of day and night, of summer and winter, of storm and calm, of cloud and tempest, of golden sunshine and bright blue sky.

ARCHEOLOGY, ANTHROPOLOGY, AND COMPARATIVE MYTHOLOGY....REVEAL THE ORIGIN OF MANY CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES AND DOGMAS

A few of the Aryan nations have preserved in their ancient poetry some remnants of the natural awe with which the earlier dwellers on the earth saw the brilliant sun "slowly rise from out the darkness of the night, raising itself by its own might higher and higher, till it stood triumphant on the arch of heaven, and then descended and sank down in its fiery glory, into the dark abyss of the heaving and hissing sea." It is to the stores and religions of these nations we now look to see if our premise is justified and provable: namely, that many or most of Christianity's doctrines and dogmas have their origin in Sun worship. What we are especially interested in as followers of Jesus/Yeshua, is if much of what we have been taught and read about him in the New Testament credible; and if not, then we need to look elsewhere to find such truths.

We need look no further than Astro-Theology and understand its implications for many of the doctrines of the Christian faith.

NOW...IF YOU HAVE READ EVERYTHING UP TO NOW...THEN YOU ARE READY TO BEGIN A SERIOUS STUDY AND COMPARISON OF THE "CHRISTIAN SAVIOR" AND THE VARIOUS SUN-MYTHS TO DETERMINE IF THE TEACHINGS BELIEVED TO BE INFALLIBLE, INERRANT, AND INSPIRED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT ARE REALLY A DIVINE AND UNIQUE REVELATION....OR PLAGIARIZED PAGANISM ORIGINATING FROM SUN WORSHIP

A DEEPER UNDERSTANDING OF THE OSIRIS MYTH

Many books have been made of this myth; yet its meaning, its source, its antiquity seem to be still in dispute. One thing can, however, be said that the legend in one form or other dates back, beyond reasonable doubt, to antiquity and the earliest recorded history of mankind.

In a prior article I shared with the reader that there were basically two ways to correctly understand the Osiris Myth:

- Agriculturally
- Astronomically

We examined them and took from them a basic understanding. For we may with some reason suspect that such myths are made to bear more than one meaning. In this instance we find an agricultural interpretation as related to the Osiris myth along with an astronomical interpretation one as well. Often more than not, scholars miss completely this astronomical interpretation of the Osiris myth. Moreover, the myth of Osiris was closely bound up with his Mysteries. One key is, I think, found in Plutarch. In Egypt vegetation and husbandry have ever been wholly dependent on the rise and the fall the Nile. To the Nile's annual inundation the country, almost as a whole, ever owed its amazing fertility. Plutarch, moreover, reports that among the more scholarly priests the great river of the Nile was known as Osiris; they also called Typhon the sea (Plutarch, Isis and Osiris, p. 33).

AGRICULTURAL MEANING OF THE OSIRIS MYTH

One word before we start. The Heavens and the Sun affect Nature on this planet as seen in the growing seasons associated with the path of the Sun in the Heavens. On a more deeper note these cycles of the seasons are connected with the Equinoxes and Solstices and the message of God to mankind was immortalized for all time in the Osiris Myth which finds its life and expression through understanding of the changes of the seasons reflected through these same Equinoxes and Solstices.

One must read Plutarch to understand these hidden meanings to the Osiris myth for these same "ideas" are traceable through successive Gentile nations and religions. Osiris is just the starting place for such agricultural and astrological religious ideas which later become personified in various personages of various nations. Understand up front that when the allegorical understanding of the Osiris myth is lost and the myth becomes later "literalized" mankind lost the simple message of God that the Egyptians intended to safeguard for all time through the Osiris Myth.

Now on with our study.

For our study it is important to note up front:

- Osiris is the Nile with its yearly overflowing and inudation of the land of Egypt
- Isis is the land of Egypt
- Hours, the seasonable temperatures necessary for fertility, is their offspring of the conjuction of nature, land, and life giving water of the Nile

Proceeding, says Sir J. Gardner Wilkinson, with the examination of the different parts of this allegorical fable, Plutarch observes that, "Osiris being the inundation of the Nile, and Isis the land irrigated by it from the conjunction of these two, Horus was born meaning thereby that just and seasonable temperature of the circumambient air which preserves and nourish all things. Horus is, moreover, supposed to have been brought up by Latona, in the marshy country about Butus, because a moist and watery soil is best adapted to produce those vapours and exhalations which serve to relax the excessive drought arising from heat. In like manner, they call the extreme limits of their country, their confines, and sea-shores, Nephthys, Teleute or the end, whom they suppose to have been married to Typho. Now as the overflowings of the Nile are sometimes very great, and extend to the boundaries of the land, this gave rise to the story of the secret intercourse between Osiris and Nephthys, as the natural consequence of so great an inundation would be the springing up of plants in those parts of the country which were formerly barren. Hence they imagine that Typho was first made acquainted with the infidelity of his wife by the melilot-garland which fell from the head of Osiris while in her company; and that the legitimacy of Horus, the son of Isis, may thus be explained, as well as the illegitimacy of Anubis, who was born of Nephthys." After quoting a passage from Plutarch, this author continues as follows: To sum up the details of this story according to the foregoing interpretation, we may apply to each its distinct meaning, as follows :

- Osiris, the inundation of the Nile
- Isis, the irrigated portion of the land of Egypt
- Horus, their offspring, the vapours and exhalations reproducing rain
- Buto, Latona, the marshy lands of Lower Egypt, where those vapours were nourished
- Nephthys, the edge of the desert, occasionally overflowed during the high inundations
- Anubis, the son of Osiris and Nephthys, the production of that barren soil, in consequence of its being overflowed by the Nile
- Typho, the sea, which swallowed up the Nile water
- The conspirators, the drought overcoming the moisture, from which the increase of the Nile proceeds
- The chest in which Osiris' body was confined, the banks of the river, within which it retired after the inundation
- The Tanaitic mouth, the lake and barren lands about it, which were held in abhorrence from their being overflowed by the river without producing any benefit to the country
- The twenty-eight years of his life, the "twenty-eight cubits to which the Nile rises at Elephantine, its greatest height"
- The 17th of Athor, the period when the river retires within its banks
- The queen of Ethiopia, the southern winds preventing the clouds being carried southwards
- The different members of Osiris' body, the main channels and canals by which the inundation passed into the interior of the country, where each was said to be afterwards buried
- That one member of his body which could not be recovered (phallus) was the generative power of the Nile, which still continued in the stream itself; or, as Plutarch thinks, it was said to have been thrown into the river, because "water or moisture was the first matter upon which the generative power of the deity operated, and that principle by means of which all things capable of being were produced
- The victory of Horus, the power possessed by the clouds in causing the successive inundations of the Nile
- Harpocrates, whom Isis brought forth about the winter solstice, those weak shootings of the corn produced after the inundation had subsided...

According to Sir. J. Gardner Winkenson, this, or something at least very like it, is to be taken to be one of the meanings which the myth of Osiris embodies.

But what I want to emphasize is that all of nature is first of all dependent upon the Sun in one way or the other. The Sun was understood to be an image of the unseen God who is both Creator, Sustainer, and Destroyed. The Sun brings life, causes crops to grow, sustains them through photosynthesis, but then at times its harsh heat destroys them. In this picture primitive man saw in this Sun a picture of God; Creator, Sustainer, and Destroyer. This is mankind's understanding of the first Trinity of God! What is important for us to know is that the Sun is primary for the success of nature and that all agricultural benefits, or interpretations of the Osiris myth, must begin not with the agricultural interpretation, but with the Astrological interpretation!

ASTROLOGICAL MEANING OF THE OSIRIS MYTH

The astrological understanding of the Osiris myth is yet today a secret to most. The key to it seemingly lies in what Plutarch, narrating the myth or expanding the points in his tract, has to say of the sun and the moon and the time when Osiris was murdered. While bearing once more in our minds a few facts that relate to the Nile, we must turn to certain facts of astronomy converted into figure and myth.

Let us recall that the central idea of the legend of Osiris, and the theme around which it was woven, was the strife of Osiris and Typhon. You will see its importance as we progress in this study. We referred above to the rise of the Nile. But the rise of the Nile year by year was dependent in turn on the sun. Summer solstice, when the Nile begins to rise.

And the sun and Osiris were one in this second, more recondite meaning. In the following accounts one must remember that Osiris, the sun, is light and Typhon, the evil one who murders Osiris, is the darkness. Just as Osiris and Typhon are in perpetual battle, so Light and darkness are in a perpetual battle (sunrise, sunset, solstices, equinoxes); both ethically and astronomically as we see the setting and rising of the sun on a recurrent basis. Light, from the sun, depending on the equinoxes and solstices, is longer or shorter and we recognize this by the length of the days. This fact, the shortening of the light of the sun, gives the foundation for the descent of the sun/son to the dark-evil (Devil) for 3 days at the winter solstice. Such "facts" of astronomical science were well know to the ancients and they "personified such events" in stories of heroes and villains.Osiris and Typhon is just the earliest. You will need to draw upon the information from a earlier article where you read of the Osiris Myth as this myth was originally played out in the heavens. With this basic information we are ready somewhat to tackle more complicated information which follows.

Now Typhon, Osiris' brother, by a ruse nailed him down in a coffer (sarcophagus-nailed to wood) and flung them both into the Nile. We learn, too, from Plutarch's account, which may seem at first sight on this point to be marked with excessive precision, that the sun was in Scorpion then and the date was the seventeenth day of the month the Egyptians called Athyr. The moon, be it added, was full. That these statements formed part of the legend, in spite of the tenses in Greek, and refer to the mythical time when Osiris was murdered by Set. Connected with these myths of the death of Osiris we find that at the same time the Nile (the life source for Egypt) then began to recede; vegetation was once more arrested. These facts we infer from Herodotus. The Grecian historian goes on to tell us that the Nile, rises at the solstice in June, and a hundred days after that date (roughly speaking, three months or so later) the Nile once more commenced to retire, to fall short in its stream and recede. All the records appear to confirm this, whatever the date they refer to. This means, according to the myth, Osiris was murdered toward the end of September when the light of the Sun begins to recede and the waters of the Nile begin to recede.

As it is with the time of his death, so it is with Osiris's birth. The date of his birth the myth itself indicates clearly. It speaks of a feast of the Pamylia. This resembled, says Plutarch, the festival in honour of the Greek Dionysus, when the phallus was borne in procession. We must remember that this was the only member of Osiris body which was not found by Isis prior to Osiris' resurrection.

In the Pamylia, an image would be carried about, the genital member of which would be three times the normal dimensions. But the phallus was surely the symbol of the generative powers of the sun at the time of the spring equinox. Because of this situation of Osiris and the Pamylia, we know that the Great Dionysia at Athens in classical times was observed in the month we call March and the phallus was carried about. We should naturally, therefore, conclude the Pamylia was kept at that time. In this context we may, perhaps, notice that Plutarch himself plainly says that Osiris and Bacchus were one. This he holds to be quite beyond doubt and conceives he has numerous proofs.

But the terms of the legend itself will provide at least one further hint. The wanderings of Isis conclude, when she finds or rediscovers Osiris. Isis was, doubtless, the moon. Now the sun and the moon were united once more at the spring equinox. But when Isis recovered Osiris, or all but his genital member, she made of that member a model and, so says the myth, consecrated it. The pious Egyptians ever after celebrated a feast in its honour. As the model, of course, was the phallus, which Plutarch has told us that Isis ordained to be carried about, this feast was, no doubt, the Pamylia.

Then Plutarch refers to a feast, which took place, when the spring-time commenced - called the entrance of Osiris into the moon. Here again to anticipate somewhat, I think this strange title must mean the conjunction of the sun and the moon (in more modern and technical terms) at the time of the spring equinox, when the sun impregnated the moon and the moon impregnated the earth. This feast in his own day, says Plutarch, was observed on the new moon of Phamenoth, a month coinciding very nearly in the late Alexandriari year with the month that is now known as March. This feast most likey was the the Pamylia.

We saw that Osiris was murdered in the twenty-eighth year of his reign or, perhaps, as some say, of his life. But why in the twentj-eighth year? The explanation may possibly lie in what Plutarch has elsewhere to say in regard to the Nile and its risings. He reports that the Nile's greatest rising was twenty-eight cubits in height. Each cubit could stand for a year in the figurative language of myth. This agrees with the view we put forward that Osiris was murdered by Typhon at the time of the autumnal equinox. The Nile then began to recede. And, of course, with his murder by Typhon the reign of Osiris would end. That he died in his twenty-eighth year may, perhaps, in a more general way signify that he died prematurely, as died, too, the handsome Adonis, cut short in the pride of his youth.

That Osiris is one with the sun, while admitted by some modern writers, is hotly disputed by others. For instance, Sir James Frazer says: "The ground upon which some modern writers seem chiefly to rely for the identification of Osiris with the sun is that the story of his death fits better with the solar phenomena than with any other in nature. It may readily be admitted that the daily appearance and disappearance of the sun might very naturally be expressed by a myth of his death and resurrection; and writers who regard Osiris as the sun are careful to indicate that it is the diurnal, and not the annual, course of the sun to which they understand the myth to apply. Thus Renouf, who identified Osiris with the sun, admitted that the Egyptian sun could not with any show of reason be described as dead in winter. But if his daily death was the theme of the legend, why was it celebrated by an annual ceremony? This fact alone seems fatal to the interpretation of the myth as descriptive of sunset and sunrise. Again, though the sun may be said to die daily, in what sense can he be said to be torn in pieces". One only needs remember that between the fulll moon and the new moon there were fourteen days; again reminescent that Osiris was cut into fourteen pieces after his murder. For these, among other reasons, Sir James Frazier thinksthe death of Osiris should be taken to mean in this legend the death or decay of vegetation (agricultural interpretation of Osiris' death). .But, if we are right in the main, it is neither the sun in his annual nor the sun in his diurnal course that, on this view, the story refers to. The theme is Osiris, the sun, not as rising and setting and so forth, but viewed as creative, fertilising, the source and the giver of life. Vegetation, its growth and decay come to some extent into the myth. But Osiris is neither the corn nor a sort, as he says, of corngod. Yet again, while the sun's daily course is in no sense the theme of the legend, it does represent, notwithstanding, the sun's annual journey or course through the various signs of the zodiac.

The war of Osiris and Typhon was the conflict between good and evil in the physical and spiritual worlds. And either prevailed in his turn. Now, good in the physical world was the same with light, life, warmth and so on. When mythically murdered by Typhon, the sun was deprived for the time of his generative, fertilising powers. Vegetation decayed; the leaves fell, and the Nile sank within its own stream. Then the night triumphed over the day and the darkness over the light. And for six months was Typhon supreme. It was not till the spring equinox that Osiris recovered his realm. Day then grew longer than night, and new life stirred in all the broad earth with the promise of harvests to come. Nature was rejuvenated.

And, therefore, in one of its aspects the conflict between the two brothers represented those marked alternations, light, darkness, heat, cold, life and death, so incessant and ever recurring throughout the material world. Set was as real as Osiris, and Isis could not root him out. There were order and law in the world.

The two principles of goodness and evil, inscribed, as it were, in the sky, will be found in all ancient cosmogonies. And are they not Ormuzd and Ahriman in that old Persian mythology? Apollo and Python in Greece or, again, Dionysus and the Titans? I suppose that, when men had conceived of a being all-wise and all-good, they perforce postulated another, his constant, implacable foe. How otherwise could they account for the manifest evil in nature?

Osiris was fabled to die; but the gods, though they died, were immortal. They died often under one name, and their tombs would be found upon earth, while they lived the while under another. So man, though he died, was immortal; he, too, had a soul, like to theirs. We may, therefore, suppose in the mysteries the death and rebirth of the god symbolised also man's resurrection. It seems, too, that life in the body, "the descent into matter" so-called, was a death, strictly speaking, in life.

The "gods" were incarnate in matter - at least in a good many cases, becoming incarnate for man, to bestow all their riches upon him. They dwelt in the same world as he but were also his living precursors. They "became," metaphorically, "men" and were, therefore, supposed to submit to the terms of all mortal existence. They were born, suffered, died, like mankind. They were married, like men, and had children and, dying, were buried in tombs shown at places like Sais and Delphi. King of gods and of men though he was, even Zeus had his tombstone in Crete.

Whence first of all came the notion of a dead or a dying divinity? We can at best only conjecture. The meaning we ventured to give to the death of Osiris in the myth can hardly, I think, be called primitive in any strict sense of that term. It can hardly belong to the time when mankind, looking into the skies, first essayed to explain what they saw. Nor, again, could that other conception of life as more properly death have emerged in those primitive days, unless we suppose primal man had some primal "revelation"accorded him. Perhaps the phenomena of nature were read in too literal a fashion. Man, when he died, would be buried - "put", we still say, "under ground". And the earth would be then a flat surface, extending how far no one knew; but the sun in its diurnal course would ascend and descend, rise and set, and at last sink beneath it, removed, like the dead men, from out of men's sight. And who in those times could be sure he would once more appear on the morrow? Each night, as he sank in the west, the great fear would come over men's minds that the darkness might not be dispelled but had settled upon them for ever. Would not darkness thus seem the great evil, against which such beings were helpless, and light, the sun's light, the great blessing? So, if light played, in some sense or other, much part in both myth and religion from the days of men's first speculations, we may, I think, here find the foundation at the center of the Osiris myth.

IN CONCLUSION

As we read of the Osiris myth, and the solar implications as Osiris' death was seen in the sun and it's course through the heavens, when the sun's light is hidden and kept from men, and when darkness increases as determined by the length of days, primitive man reasoned as best he could such sights in the Heavens. Heavy into superstition, early man saw in such events the death of the Sun along with it's resurrection as patterned in the regular changing of the seasons. Primitive man saw in the changing of the seasons and the Solstices and Equinoxes the cyclical death and rebirth of the Sun as well as Nature. He could see the resurrection of the sun (which became later personified in stores of Godmen) in the spring solstice when new life emerges on the planet from the lengthening of light from the sun and warmer temperatures. In Egypt this was allegorically understood to be the death of Osiris (the Sun) along with his rebirth or resurrection in the spring.

Such a "pattern" must be understood because of its importance since it will be applied to false gods throughout time immemorial and ultimately to Jesus as well by the earliest Gentile believers.

THE OSIRIS MYTH AND IT'S ASTROLOGICAL ORIGINS

As we saw in the previous article the ancients recognized the Solar and Lunar cycles in the Heavens and understood their correlations in Nature as well as in their own bodies. We saw before the significance of the number "14" and "28." As stated the ancients wove into their myths what they saw in the Heavens and Nature because they understood this as the workings of God. The earliest myth to capture this ancient understanding of the Creator is the Osiris myth of ancient Egypt.

It has been said that celestial imagery has been woven into virtually all aspects of the ancients' lives as well as their theologies. For us today which look toward the comfort and security of Christianity we feel insulated from such a statement. Sadly few Christians understand that their faith and most of their "cardinal" religious beliefs find their origin in the personification of the cosmos. Such a statement cannot go unchallenged but I assure you that if you find the time for unbiased and critical study of the origins of Christianity then you will find the vast majority of Gentile Christianity's religious beliefs found their origin in astrology, astronomy, and astro-theology of the ancients. These ancients personified their observations of the Heavens into astral heroes of their days. Later these same "beliefs" were applied to Jesus as depicted in the New Testament.

In a prior article in this series we found out that the ancients understood that mankind had been created in the image of God and this to them this was understood as being created in accordance with the pattern and cycles of creation which they first observed in the Heavens and the Stars. The order and repetitiveness seen in the cycles of the moon, sun, and stars were first recognized and then correlations made to similar observations in Mother Nature and finally to mankind themselves as the ancients witnessed the same cycles occurring in their bodies. These ancients saw the same pattern and cycles of Creation in the Heavens, Nature, and their own Bodies. They reasoned that they were likewise created in the image of the only God they could see...the God of the Cosmos and Heavens above them. This was made very evident in the prior article as we remember.

WHY CREATE THE OSIRIS MYTH?

In order to protect and safeguard these truths of the Creator and Creation the ancients immortalized them within stories which often go by the name of "myths." These myths were not to be understood as liberal but yet the truths that they conveyed were literal. Understand the these mythos were but metaphors and similes that recorded for all time what the ancients understood not only about the Cosmos which was a picture of the Creator to them but protected for all time this sacred and Divine knowledge and safeguarded for all time the very nature and characteristics of the Creator Himself. As long as these myths were understood as allegories only then we have no problem but when these allegories and metaphors would later become and understood as if they were literal then we lapse into idolatry and blasphemy. This is where Gentile Christianity finds itself today because much of what Christianity teaches about the Historical Jesus they connect to Eternal Life. Many of these "beliefs necessary for salvation" as taught by Christian doctrine are nothing more than allegories of the stars and the Heavens which were later personified and taught in the myths of the nations. That is why we find the same stories in other nations and their religious literature that we find in the New Testament about Jesus. These myths were fashioned with different characters in the portrayal of these "truths" and we find the very first one being Osiris which established the pattern for all others to come and we find "Osiris clones" in every time period and in every nation. The depiction of the Jewish Jesus in the New Testament is no exception.

THE OSIRIS MYTH AND UNDERSTANDING THE IMAGE OF G-D

For example, the god Osiris meant many different things to the ancient Egyptians. His rituals and myths have woven into them several threads from the sky, and these celestial connections linked the various aspects of Osiris together (a grain god, a water god, etc.). We understand him best by first understanding his celestial symbolism.

First and foremost, Osiris was the ruler of the dead. Depicted as a mummy, he presided over the judgment of souls and offered new life, through resurrection, to those who earned immortality by their proper conduct in this life. If you did not catch it this is the message of the Torah, the Bible Jesus used. Here we find that "faith without works" is dead as we discover replayed throughout the Torah and later in the epistle of James. Osiris shows up, therefore, in numerous funerary papyri, in tomb paintings, on coffins, and on temple walls. Inscriptions identify him with a variety of titles, and they tell us he was much more than a god of the underworld and funeral rites. He was, as well, a god of kingship and the pharaoh's vitality, a personification of the land's fertility, the spirit or force of the cycle of vegetation, a god of life-sustaining water, and, in fact, the Nile itself. If you did not catch it we have Osiris now connected with Mother Nature and we will see him later connected to the stars and moon (Heavens). This is what we spoke about before...the personification by the ancients of their observations of God and His actions in the Heavens, Nature, and Mankind (Osiris being a picture of the human species). Osiris' most appropriate title is "Lord of Everything." He was also a representation of the sun, the moon, and the stars of Orion (the constellation of Orion who is understood as a man in the Heavens). If we take a second we can see that all of the attributes of Osiris were extrapolated from the various celestial manifestations and later applied both to Nature as well as Mankind (the human species).

RESURRECTION FROM THE DEAD....A CHERISHED BELIEF BASED UPON CYCLES IN THE HEAVENS, NATURE, AND OUR BODIES

The myth of Osiris involves his own death and resurrection, a theme that echoes the daily cycle of the sun's death at sunset and its rebirth at dawn. Understand that the Osiris myth was to teach this same order of creation and destruction (death) as observed in the Heavens and Nature. This cycle was understood by the ancients by their simple observations of the cycles concerning the Sun, stars, and Nature itself. They then applied the same cycle to themselves and all mankind since for them God was demonstrating to them His plan as seen first in the Heavens and secondarily in Nature as well. Understand that the Osiris story and myth is the personification of these observable patterns and cycles seen in God's Heaven and God's Nature. These cyclical Laws were applied to mankind in the myth of Osiris. This is just a metaphor teaching a spiritual truth. God, since understood by the ancients being the same yesterday, today, and forever, will according to His working in the Heavens and Nature do the same within Mankind. Early mankind saw daily this repetitive pattern of birth, death, and rebirth with the cycle of the Sun and within Nature and made parallels to Mankind. The Sun rose above the eastern horizon daily and disappeared below the western horizon daily. The Sun was born and died only to be reborn again. This is what God is doing. Plants that grew one year died in the winter only to regrow in the same place next year. The cycle of birth, death, and rebirth was understood by the ancients as something that God is doing and as we will see they would come to understand that the same cycles observed in the Heavens and Nature were applied to them as well A religious doctrine was born. As intimated above connected with this same repetitive pattern of birth, life, and death of the Sun were parallels observed in Nature which itself was influenced by the life-giving light and warmth of the Sun in the first place (photosynthesis). This "pattern" convinced the ancients that the only God that they could see, the God of the Cosmos, was a God that gives life, sustains life, and then destroys life which is only then recreated again. This is the repetitive pattern of God observed in the entire Cosmos. This is the original trinity: birth, life sustained, and death. As ruler of the dead, Osiris was "First of the Westerners" since the Sun dies in the West every day. That is why in Egypt the graves and most of the tombs are west of the Nile opposite the Pyramids.

Another example of this pattern and observations of the Heavens and Nature by the ancients were woven into the myth of Osiris. A fertility ceremony, recorded on the walls at Dendera, 417 miles upriver from Cairo, involved Osiris and 365 lighted lamps. Certainly this refers to the annual cycle of 365¼ days and links Osiris with the solar year. His temples were said to be surrounded by 365 trees, planted in his honor. Again the correlation of Osiris and the Heavens (mankind with the Heavens).

Osiris is connected even more closely to the moon, but to see how, we have to know his myth. There is no single source for it, but numerous partial versions exist, preserved from many different eras of Egyptian civilization. Plutarch, the Greek historian and biographer, collected material from Egyptian sources in the first century after Christ and retold the story of Osiris in his treatise, On Isis and Osiris. Despite the late date of this composition, many traditions of considerable antiquity seem to be preserved. At least parts of Plutarch's version are verified in the hieroglyphic inscriptions that remain.

Fathered by Geb, the earth, and born of Nut, the sky, Osiris [notice a mixture of Heaven and Earth became man] became king of Egypt and brought civilization to the land and its people. He taught the people how to plant and harvest grain, how to lay out fields and measure their boundaries, and how to irrigate the land with canals and dams. Laws, religion, and urban life were all gifts of Osiris. He was Egypt's organizer and its spirit. He made Egypt what it was. Clearly, Osiris is connected with order, and we should not be surprised to find him associated with the sky because it was in the sky and the Heavens that the ancients saw God's Laws and Order. The ancients understood that since being made in the image of God then they were responsible for bringing God's order to this world as well (thy kingdom come on earth as it is in Heaven).

Success in Egypt made a missionary out of Osiris, but when he returned from his travels to his sister and consort, Isis, Osiris was killed by conspirators led by his brother, Set. Set was a troublesome figure among the Egyptian gods. He was associated with the northern stars of the Big Dipper-what the Egyptians called the constellation of Meskhetiu, the "bull's leg and haunch." As the adversary of Osiris, he stood for sterility, the desert, mindless force, and violence. In the Osirian cycle, Set is the personification of chaos (the opposite of order personified by Osiris). Set was the Egyptian "Satan."

At a banquet, Set and his co-conspirators tricked Osiris into reclining inside a box, built like a coffin, exactly to his measure. Swarming around him, they closed the lid, nailed it down, and dumped it in the Nile. According to Plutarch, Osiris was slain- suffocated in the box-on the seventeenth day of the month of Athyr, when the sun was in Scorpius, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign.

The numbers are significant. Although the moon completes its phases in 29½ days, the number 28 was used symbolically for this interval. And an intricate logic links the moon with the Nile through the number 28. At Aswan, the traditional southern limit of Egypt, a nilometer measured the height of the river Nile's maximum rise as 28 cubits. This peak occurred in the fall, in the month of Athyr, just as the Nile was about to decline. Osiris was slain on the seventeenth day of Athyr. The Full moon was counted as the month's fifteenth day, but the moon looks full the day before and the day after. By day 17, it is obvious the moon has started to wane. So, the death of Osiris marked the "death," or fall, of the Nile from its annual flood height and coincided with the day of the moon's monthly "death." Osiris, the god of the Nile and Egypt's life, was a moon god because the river, the land, and the moon wax and wane, cycle after cycle, according to the Creator's Divine pattern.

Other lunar symbolism also threads through the Osiris myth. His casket floated downstream, out of the Nile, into the Mediterranean. Isis followed it, found his body at Byblos, in Syria, and carried it back to Egypt. Although unable to revive him, she managed through magic to conceive a child by him (the first immaculate conception). She hid his body in the thickets of the Delta marshes and nursed, in secret, the newborn son of Osiris. One night, while hunting by moonlight, Set chanced upon the body of Osiris. Set tore the body of Osiris into 14 parts and scattered them up and down the Nile. Once again Isis set out to retrieve the body of her husband, now dismembered and dispersed throughout the land. With patience and perseverance she sought the far-flung parts of Osiris; all but his sexual member were retrieved. The symbol of his vitality remained lost in the Nile.

Answer for yourself: Did you notice that in the Osiris myth the importance of the numbers of 14 and 28 as we say in the previous article concerning mankind being created in the image of God?

The 14 pieces of the body of Osiris sound like the 14 days of the waning, or "dying" moon, and on the main ceiling of the Dendera temple are inscriptions and pictorial reliefs that leave no doubt. In one panel, an eye, installed in a disk, is transported in a boat. The eye, we know, was a symbol of the sun or moon. Thoth, the ibis-headed scribe god of wisdom and knowledge, pilots the barge. Thoth was closely associated with the moon and counted the days and seasons. The text for this panel refers to the period after full moon, and 14 gods accompany the eye in the disk.

Next to the portrayal of the waning moon, another carved panel represents the 14 days of the waxing moon. A staircase with 14 steps, a god on each, leads up to the same eye and disk, and hieroglyphics verify the god's association with days of the growing moon. Osiris, it is written, is "luminous," as the god of the moon.

Finally, a third, adjacent panel shows Osiris in a boat that is sailing across the sky with Isis and her sister Nephthys. Goddesses of the four cardinal directions support the sign of heaven, on which the boat floats, and the inscription says Osiris has stepped into the full moon and that he is the moon.

The myth of Osiris continues with his resurrection. Isis embalmed and mummified him, and through her help Osiris was restored to everlasting life. In numerous tombs and temples this aspect of his myth is incorporated into one more celestial identity-the constellation Orion. Orion and Sirius, the night's counterpart to Isis, are often shown sailing in celestial boats, usually with Orion in the lead looking back at his wife, who follows him in the nightly journey from east to west. The sky is the pattern for the rest of the myth as well. Just as the dead Osiris floated out of Egypt in his wooden casket only to be later followed by Isis when she searched for him, Orion eventually leaves the nighttime sky, followed by Sirius a little later. What a parallel!

Sirius was the key calibrator of the Egyptian calendar. The earth's orbital motion eventually puts the sun in the same direction as Sirius, and even the night's brightest star is lost in the glare of day. After disappearing from the night sky, however, Sirius eventually reappears in the dawn, before the sun comes up. The first time this occurs each year is called the star's heliacal rising, and on this day Sirius remains visible for only a short time before the sky gets too bright to see it. In ancient Egypt this annual reappearance of Sirius fell close to the summer solstice and coincided with the time of the Nile's overflowing. Isis, as Sirius, was "the mistress of the year's beginning," for the Egyptian new year was set by this event. New Year's ceremony texts at Dendera say Isis coaxes out the Nile and causes it to swell. The metaphor is astronomical, hydraulical, and sexual, and it parallels the function of Isis in the myth. Sirius revives the Nile just as Isis revived Osiris. Her time in hiding from Set is when Sirius is gone from the night sky. She gives birth to her son Horus, as Sirius gives birth to the new year, and in texts Horus and the new year are equated. She is the vehicle for renewal of life and order. Shining for a moment, one morning in summer, she stimulates the Nile - and starts the year.

In Egypt, Orion, like Sirius, is absent from the night sky for 70 days. This period is equated with the time Osiris spent in the transitional underworld. It is also equal to the stipulated period for the process of mummification. Orion's heliacal rising occurred a few weeks before the reappearance of Sirius and the Nile flood. Egyptian agriculture depended on the Nile. Without the river there would be no Egypt-only desert, the sterile domain of Set. With the summer's flood, life and water returned to the soil. Seeds were planted and nourished by the Nile. For Egyptians, the three seasons of farming and the seasons of the Nile were the same, and they named them accordingly. Each marked an important change in the landscape: Inundation, Emergence, and Low Water. There is a simple cycle here-birth, growth, death-and, with the next annual flood and new year, rebirth. This cycle is the essence of Egypt. It is paralleled by the Osiris myth. It is played out in the sky and nature both!

What we see in the lights overhead is the itinerary of cosmic order. Because it governs everything, it is reflected in the entire world. It is the core of our consciousness. It defines what is sacred and makes the sky the domain of gods. The ancients thought in this fashion and laid the groundwork for all theologies to come based upon what they observed in the Heavens, Nature, and in their own bodies.

OSIRIS AND ISIS, THE HEAVENLY MOTHER

Isis worship began in Egypt but she became Hellenized on the way to Rome adopting the Greek language and many non-Egyptian elements. Isis was worshipped in Greece in the fourth century BC and by the time of Julius Caesar there was a temple to Isis and Serapis on Capitoline Hill. The cult remained popular for another four centuries. By the first century BC she was regarded as a universal goddess, identified with Rhea, Demeter, Hestia, Hera, Aphrodite, Leto, Nanaia, Artemis and Astarte. Isis is the feminine principle, the Mother Goddess, like Cybele. Her advantage over Cybele was being Egyptian which gave her a history much longer than that of the Anatolian goddess. Isis and Osiris were sovereigns of prehistoric Egypt, quite possibly real people, but were thought of as incarnated gods who suffered in the world before ascending to Heaven.

Their worship was widespread and popular in the Roman Empire at the time of the foundation of Christianity. Though the worship of Isis began in Rome about 100 BC, by the start of the Christian era it was so widespread that a Christian writer said that some lands were full of the madness of Isis. There was a temple of Isis in Southwark, London. The last recorded festival of Isis was held in Rome in 394 AD but it was one of the last of the old faiths to die out, surviving less flamboyantly - it was illegal - against the Christian onslaught until the fifth century AD.

Osiris and Isis were brother and sister but, after the fashion of the Pharaohs they married. Osiris was murdered and thrown in a coffin into the Nile. The coffin was washed up on the coast of Syria and became lodged in the trunk of a tree which was cut down and used in the construction of the palace at Byblos where Isis eventually found it. She took the coffin and set the tree in a temple swathed in linen like the tree of Attis. Back in Egypt the evil powers found the body of Osiris and tore it into shreds. Finding him mutilated Isis reincarnated him from the pieces and Osiris was resurrected. But she could not find a penis and had to make a synthetic one to conceive their child Horns. Osiris then reigned as the king of the dead while Horns reigned on earth. Osiris, Isis and Horns are the Egyptian Trinity.

Serapis, the god of Alexandria, was the personification of Osiris through the Apis Bull, worshipped at Memphis. He was the equal of Isis with whom he ruled and eventually became an alternative aspect of the Sun-God.

The followers of Isis liked two of her aspects in particular, the bereaved wife weeping for her dead husband and the heavenly mother of the child Horns. Isis' first role likened her to Demeter who mourned Persephone in the Eleusinian mysteries, to Astarte who mourned her dead son Adonis and to Cybele who mourned her dead son Attis. In her second role Isis had a pronounced effect on the Christian perception of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Isis was endlessly depicted holding the divine child Horns, so there was no break in continuity when the Christian image of the Madonna and Child took over. Looking at old figurines it is often quite impossible to tell which was which.

Mary was first called the Mother of God in Alexandria, the home of the Essenes, the Egyptian centre of Isis worship, in the third century. Just after 400 AD Epiphanius denounced women who worshipped Mary as a goddess. Yet by 430 AD Proclus hailed her as the Mother of God and an intermediary between God and man. Nestorius objected to this. But a decisive sermon was preached in 431 AD at Ephesus which led to Nestorius being discredited and Mary elevated to the Queen of Heaven. In another of those pointed coincidences, Diana or Artemis, whose day was 13 August, had been the goddess of the Ephesians and represented an aspect of Isis. In the sixth century a popular myth that Mary had been miraculously carried to Heaven by Jesus and his angels was officially recognized by the Church as The Assumption. Now it is a great Roman Catholic festival held on... 13 August!

OTHER STRANGE COINCIDENCES:

- Many paintings of the Virgin Mary contain a crescent moon. Isis and Artemis were associated with Selene, the moon goddess.
- The pagan Queen of Heaven was Astarte, the Ashtaroth of the Bible. In Paphos in Cyprus women made offerings to the Virgin Mary as Queen of Heaven in the ruins of the ancient temple of Astarte!
- In many countries Mary is the Stella Mans, the Star of the Sea. Isis was the goddess of the sea, a role she had assumed from Venus (Astarte) who was born of the foam of the sea, mourned Adonis just as Isis mourned Osiris, and of course was the Morning Star.
- The festival of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin is held on 25 March because it is precisely nine months before the official birth date of Jesus on 25 December. It is no coincidence that the birth of Jesus was set on the same day as the birth of the sun god who was identified with Horus (Ra), the son of Isis and Osiris.
- 25 March is thus also the date of the Annunciation of Isis.
- The death of Osiris caused the Nile to flood and the land to become fertile. In one manifestation of the Osiris legend the man playing the god is wrapped in a shroud and is led back from Hell carrying a napkin by two priests, a tradition which seems to be echoed in the John's story (Jn 20:6-12) of the tomb empty save for two shining figures, a shroud and napkin.
- The festival of Osiris was held in early November when lamps were lit and allowed to burn all night in honor of the god in particular and the deceased in general. This is reminiscent of the Christian festival of All Souls held at the beginning of November when candles are burnt all night in honor of the dead. Though the Church only recognized this ceremony in 998 AD, Sir James Fraser has shown that it was simply incorporating the ancient pagan custom. The festival of All Saints held one day earlier was recognized in 835 AD and undoubtedly has the same origin.

VIRGO, THE VIRGIN

Lost in antiquity and mythologically connected to Leo, the ancient goddess in the sky was probably part of the original six zodiac constellations (Norman J. Lockyer, The Dawn of Astronomy, (Kila, MT: Kessinger, 1992), p. 404) and is considered by some astronomers (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 272) to be over 15,000 years old in human awareness (which was about the time the spring equinox occurred in this constellation). The earliest expression of Virgo was about 2,900 B.C.E. with the construction of the Egyptian sphinx, believed to be a celebration and adoration of the two zodiac signs through which the sun traveled at the time of summer and the harvest. The sphinx had the head of the great harvest goddess and the body of a lion (Jobes, Outer Space, , p. 274). However, Lockyer, in the late 19th century, implied that the sphinx may be far older than this date (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 83).

The Egyptians drew her on their Denderah zodiac, larger than she is now and with no wings but clearly a goddess. They saw virgo as the thousand-named goddess Isis, wife of the dead Osiris and mother of the god Horus (Allen, Star Names, p. 462). She was seen as holding a wheat sheaf in her hand, which she dropped to form the Milky Way. She ruled the summer solstice about 5,000 B.C.E., when time began for the human race (De Santillana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill; p. 59). The Golden Age was said to have ended when this goddess no longer governed the solstices, for the Egyptians saw this shift in the constellation of the summer solstices as a crisis: they believed the goddess had left the earth to return to heaven in distress at the behavior of the humans of the Silver Age. The Milky Way, which was formed by the wheat dropping from the sheaf in her hand, is a piece of mythology reflecting the early belief that the Milky Way was the burned out passage of the Sun, before humans discovered precession. For at that stage there was no reason to assume that the path of the precession of the equinox was defined by the ecliptic.

The early Arabs called her Al Adhra al Nathifah, the Innocent Maiden. She was also known as the Pure Virgin and the Chinese knew her as the Frigid Maiden, which seems to be an unkind literal translation from the Chinese. To the Greeks she was Demeter, goddess of the harvest, who withdrew herself and her seasons from the Earth when Pluto abducted her daughter. They also saw her as Erigone, a maiden who became so distressed at the ways of the human race that she hanged herself. By the time of Christianity she had become Mary holding the Child (Isis recast).

Whatever image is chosen from across time and cultures, what is contained in Virgo is the archetype of the harvest-bringing goddess, pure and good, independent of the masculine. She gives the four seasons and is the source of the fertile Earth. Her emphasis at the time of harvest linked her to the gifts of the harvest and the cycles of the Earth, rather than the more worldly pursuits of commerce and trade. Her purity was reflected in the concept of virginity. However, the earliest forms of this goddess are not "virginal" in the modern sense of the word. The older meaning of virgin was a woman who owned her own body and was therefore free to love whomever she desired. Virgo is a fruitful, fertile goddess, not a virginal, innocent adolescent.

THE OSIRIS PATTERN...THE ORIGIN FOR CHRISTIANITY'S PAGAN MYTHOLOGY

The Judeo-Christian religions were founded in a region of the world where savior religions existed for thousands of years. Much of the symbolism and many of the stories in the Bible may be traced to earlier myths of the Persians, Egyptians, and other people from the near east. Under Constantine when the Roman Empire adopted Christianity the festivals and stories were further infused with the traditions of the earlier Roman pagan religion. Constantine himself worshipped both Jesus and the sun god Sol Invictus, the Romanized version of Mithra, until he died. What is tragic is that it would be Constantine and his influence that will be the cause of the official recognition and adoption of Rome's New Testament some sixty years following the Council of Nicea where Constantine reigned supreme. It is, therefore, crucial to the proper understanding of the Bible to understand the influence that these ancient religions had on the early Jews and Christians when they were forming what was to become the Judeo-Christian tradition.

THE SOLAR MYTHOLOGY BEGAN WITH EGYPT

The most important and earliest source for what would become the major religious doctrines and tenants of Gentile Christianity is Egypt. Early Christians drew from what was the great civilization to the west, Egypt. Many of the pieces to the stories surrounding Jesus which differ from Mithraism may be found in the mythology of the Egyptians. Due to the vast differences in writing systems, the Egyptian religion did not have as strong an influence on the style of early Christian writings, but the influence of the characters and the magic associated with each is even more pronounced than it is for Mithraism.

The four most import figures in Egyptian mythology needed to understanding the Christian stories are Set, Isis, Osiris, and Horus.

In earliest times, Set was the patron deity of Lower (Northern) Egypt, and represented the fierce storms of the desert whom the Lower Egyptians sought to appease. However, when Upper Egypt conquered Lower Egypt and ushered in the First Dynasty, Set became known as the evil enemy of Horus [Osiris' son who himself was god so that makes Horus the "son of god"] (Upper Egypt's dynastic god). In Egyptian religion Set, of Seth, came to stand for the forces of chaos and destruction, of energy misplaced. Set was the opposer of light and the champion of darkness. Set was the principle of all which burns and consumes. In later periods, Set was identified with the Greek genie Typhon who had a serpents body. The snake is a symbol long associated with Set which undoubtedly influenced the use of the snake as the evil influence in the story of Adam and Eve. In the dynastic periods, when Osiris, Horus, and Isis were worshipped, followers of Set were persecuted and his priesthood was finally destroyed in the XXV dynasty. When the Hebrews emigrated from Egypt during the XIX dynasty, it is clear that they took with them the character of Set which was later used along with Angra Mainyu as the model for Satan. Even the word Satan was probably derived from the Egyptian hieroglyphic Set-hen, one of Set's formal titles.

The next major Egyptian character who had a large influence on the early Christians is Isis. Perhaps the most important goddess of all Egyptian mythology, Isis assumed, during the course of Egyptian history, the attributes and functions of virtually every other important goddess in the land. Her most important functions, however, were those of motherhood, marital devotion, healing the sick, and the working of magical spells and charms. She was the sister and wife of Osiris, sister of Set, and the mother of Horus the Child (Harpocrates). Isis was responsible for protecting Horus from Set during his infancy; for helping Osiris to return to life; and for assisting her husband to rule in the land of the Dead. Isis figures strongly in the rites and symbolism associated with Mary...the mother of Jesus. She was considered to be the mother of the king who is thought to be a God made man to rule over his earthy kingdom. The cult of Isis was widespread in Egypt and spread from there to Phoenicia, Syria and Palestine; to Asia Minor; to Cyprus, Rhodes, Crete, Samos and other islands in the Aegean; to many parts of mainland Greece - Corinth, Argos and Thessaly amongst them; to Malta and Sicily; and, finally, to Rome. In the first century BC, Isis was perhaps the most popular goddess in Rome, from which her cult spread to the furthest limits of the Roman Empire, including Britain: her only rival was Mithras. An interesting side note to this is that the 'Black Virgins', so highly reverenced in certain French cathedrals have been shown to be in fact basalt figures of Isis. Many of the parallels between Isis and Mary also figure in the parallel between Horus, her son, and Jesus. Obviously the most important similarity is that Isis was said to be a virgin when she gave birth to Horus. This is, of course, to be compared to the biblical story of the immaculate conception. As well as similarities between their stories and their functions, there are several similarities in the types of symbols and language surrounding Isis and Mary. Isis is constantly referred to as the honored one or as the holy one. She is referred to with language like "Immaculate is our Lady Isis" which is nearly identical to the language used about Mary. Cyril, the bishop of Alexandria, openly embraced Isis and simply anthropomorphized her into Mary.

Osiris was the god of the dead, and the god of the resurrection into eternal life; ruler, protector, and judge of the deceased. Osiris was the brother of Set and Isis, who was also his wife by whom he fathered Horus. Osiris ruled the world of men in the beginning, after Ra had abandoned the world to rule the skies, but he was murdered by his brother Set. Through the magic of Isis, he was made to live again. By Dynasty XVIII (Akhenaton/Moses), Osiris was probably the most widely worshipped god in Egypt. Reliefs of Roman emperors, conquerors of Egypt, dressed in the traditional garb of the Pharaohs, making offerings to him in the temples exist to this day. His death was avenged by his son Horus, who defeated Set, castrated him, and cast him out into the Sahara. Horus, the son of the Sun or the son of god, then became the divine prototype of the Pharaoh. As Heru-Ur, "Horus the Elder", he was the patron deity of Upper (Southern) Egypt. Initially he was viewed as the twin brother of Set (the patron of Lower Egypt), but he became the conqueror of Set around 3100 BCE when Upper Egypt conquered Lower Egypt and formed the unified kingdom of Egypt.

There are many striking similarities between the stories surrounding Osiris and Horus and those surrounding Jesus, but we should expect such since the Jesus of the New Testament has more in common with these religious myths than the historical Jesus of Jewish history. I will first describe the similarities between their stories and then I will talk about the similar themes and imagery used in the stories.

- Horus was born to the virgin Isis as Jesus was to Mary.
- Horus was born in Annu, the place of bread, where a star announced his birth whereas Jesus was born in Bethlehem, the house of bread, with an eastern star leading the Magi to his birthplace.
- Horus was baptized with water by Anup the Baptizer at the age of thirty just as Jesus was baptized at thirty by John the Baptist.
- Horus had twelve followers known as Har-Khutti and Jesus had his twelve followers known as disciples.

- Horus was carried off by Set to the summit of Mount Hetep where they did battle and Jesus was carried off by Satan to the Mount where Jesus was tested by Satan.
- After Horus' death he was wrapped in a mummy bandage that was woven without seam just like the vesture of Christ is without a seam.
- And finally there was That-Aan who bore witness to the word of Ra and to the testimony of Horus just as John bore witness to the word of God and to the testimony of Jesus.

By all means these are not all the similarities between Hours and Jesus. The stories of Osiris also shows many similarities to Jesus. Osiris was considered to be the bringer of enlightenment. He forced no man to carry out his will. He induced them to practice what he preached by means of gentle persuasion. His lessons were often imparted to his listeners through hymns or songs. Much of this may be seen in the later writings about the ministry of Jesus.

Of course, the most important similarity between the stories of Osiris and Jesus is their death and resurrection. Osiris was killed by his brother Set, his body stripped, torn to pieces, and finally scattered about. In this way, the death of Osiris bears similarity to the death of Jesus when his body is stripped and his clothes were divvied up among the soldiers. Osiris was then resurrected with the aid of his wife/sister Isis and his son Horus and in doing so became the lord of death and the keeper of the afterlife. This is mirrored in the story of Jesus' resurrection and subsequent mastery over death. Each year Osiris was the subject of the Abydos passion play, a ritual that stretched from the Old Kingdom up until around 400 CE. The Abydos passion play depicts the slaying of Osiris and his followers by Set. The figure of Osiris is then torn to pieces by Set, after which his remains are gathered up by his wife, Isis, and son, Horus, who then restore him to life. This ritual is mirrored by modern day Christians during Easter when the death and resurrection of Jesus is reenacted in modern passion plays. Some of these stories about Horus are accredited to Osiris and vise versa, but what is clear is that much of the mystical aspects that were added to the later stories of Jesus' ministry drew heavily from the earlier Egyptian texts with which the writers were undoubtedly familiar.

Even more startling than the plot similarities are the symbolic similarities between the Egyptian and Christian stories.

- Horus was associated both with the lion and with the lamb as was Jesus.
- Horus was identified with the Tat or cross as well as with the shepherd's crook and the rod. This association was first made through Isis, his mother. In an ancient Egyptian text Isis states that "I am the staff of his power in his youth, and he is the rod of my old age." This association was strengthened by the pharaohs, who were called Kings of the Kingdom and The Great Shepherds of Their Flock. In the tradition of Horus, who was called "The Good Shepherd", the pharaohs carried the staff and rod as the symbols of their heavenly power . Jesus' association with the cross goes without saying but he was also portrayed as the Good Shepherd, and in Rev. 12:5 and 19:15 he is said to "rule with a rod of iron."
- There are also Old Testament associations between God and the shepherd's crook and the rod. In the Book of Psalms the famous line "Yea, though I walk through the valley of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me. Thy Rod and thy Staff, they comfort me" (Psalms 23:4) points to the influence of the Egyptian traditions.
- Horus was known as Iu-em-Hetep, he who comes in peace, Horus the avenger, and Horus the afflicted one. Latter Jesus would be called the bringer of peace, he who brings the sword, and the afflicted one.
- Horus was the sower and Set was the destroyer in the Harvest field. Horus was identified with the plant, the shoot, and the natzar. Jesus was the sower of good seed and Satan the sower of tares. Jesus was also associated with the "true vine".

The influence of astrology on the stories of Horus and then later on the story of Jesus goes far beyond the star that signaled both their births.

- Horus was known as the Morning Star or as he who gives the Morning Star to his followers just as Jesus was.
- Horus also spoke of the paradise of the pole star Am-Khemen just as Christians have the Holy City lighted by one luminary that is neither the Sun nor the Moon, which makes it most likely the pole star.

Along with the symbolic comparisons, some of the sayings attributed to both deities also show the influence of the Egyptians on the early Christian chroniclers and to those who later translated the Bible.

- Horus says "It is I who traverse the heavens; I go around the Sekhet-Arru (the Elysian Fields); Eternity has been assigned to me without end. Lo! I am heir of endless time and my attribute is eternity". Striking a remarkably similar cord, Jesus later says "I am come down from Heaven. For this is the will of the Father that everyone who beholdeth the Son and believeth in Him should have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."
- Another similarity in speech is when Horus says that "I open the Tuat that I may drive away the darkness." Jesus is later quoted as saying "I am come a light unto the world."
- One final example is when Horus says that "I am equipped with thy words O Ra (the father of heaven) and repeat them to those who are deprived of breath. These were the words of the father in heaven." Jesus speaks with much the same feeling when he says "The Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak. Whatsoever I speak, therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak. The word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's which sent me."

Finally the most important similarity between the Egyptian religion and Christianity is the concept of a holy trinity. The tradition of the trinity goes back to the Amon theology of the Rameside period. The one god has three appearances or forms which are combined and treated as a singular being. In the later periods, the Egyptian trinity was taken to be Atum the Father, Horus the Son, and Ra the Holy Spirit. This is of course paralleled in the Christian trinity of God the Father, Jesus the Son, and the Holy Spirit. It is clear that not only the Persian cult of Mithra, but also the ancient pagan religions of Egypt strongly influenced the formation of the Judeo- Christian religion which grew up trapped between these two giants.

This is just a small sampling of the "Osiris Pattern" which would affect all other Gentile sun-worshipping nations which were to follow; not the least of which is the religion of Mithra.

MITHRA....A SLIGHT MODIFICATION OF THE "OSIRIS PATTERN

Among the religions that played large roles in influencing the types of religious beliefs of the ancient near east, Zoroastrianism was probably the must important. Zarathushtra is the Iranian word for Zoroaster who founded this religion in ancient Persia approximately 2000 BCE. In ancient Iranian mythology, Ahura Mazda was the lord of light and wisdom, originally an equal to Mithra the god of light and justice, was elevated to the supreme being by the prophet Zoroaster. The extent to which the writers of the Old and New Testaments were acquainted with the Persians is evident in the numerous references to the Medes and the Persians in the Bible. Mithraism, an off-shoot of Zoroastrianism, holds many striking parallels in symbolism and mythology to the latter Jewish and early Christian writings.

One very interesting addition to the Jewish mythology thought to have been taken from Mithraism is Satan himself. Up to the time of the exile, the source of both good and evil to the Israelites was

God. After the exile from Egypt, the doctrine of Mithraism became widely know to the Israelites. Their writings then begin the claim that God is the one God of the universe and that he is a God of righteousness. They introduce the character of Satan to explain all of the evil in the world. It is probable that the earliest writings about Satan were actually modeled on the arch deity Angra Mainyu of Zoroastrianism. The elaborate angelology and demonology of the later Judaism, the idea of a divine judgment and a final resurrection, and a future life which may be definitely described all seem to have come at least partially from the mythology of Zoroastrianism. An interesting side note to be mentioned here is that it is commonly believed that the Magi who are described visiting Jesus at his birth were Zoroastrian priests.

The influence of Mithraism on Christian mythology is even more pronounced. Mithra, a character already ancient by the birth of Jesus, appears to be one of the models for the later mysticizing of Jesus and his ministry. It is apparent that as each of the gospels was written more and more mystery and magic was accredited to Jesus. It is these additions to the story, added many years after his death, that borrow heavily from the earlier religions already well established in the near east. The story and role of Mithra is very similar to that of Jesus. The Zoroastrian religion centered on the struggle of Order against Chaos, Light against Dark. In this battle the Sun-god was a powerful ally for the side of light. Mithra was the son of the Sun-god [another son of the Sun...like Horus] sent to Earth to aid in this battle against evil and to be the savior of the world.

The Mithraic festival in celebration of Mithra's birth was held on December 25, the recognized date of Jesus' birth. Long before Christmas was celebrated, December 25th in the Roman world was the Natalis Solis Invicti, the birthday of the Unconquerable Sun. This feast, which took place just after the winter solstice, was in honor of the Sun God Sol Invitus who was nothing more than the Roman adaptation of Mithra. Mithra was said to have been born in a cave or grotto where shepherds attended him and gave him gifts. This brings to mind much of the story of Jesus' birth in a stable. Mithra, like Jesus, is believed to have descended from heaven to earth, shared a last supper with twelve of this followers, and redeemed mankind from sin be shedding blood and rising from the dead. Mithraism postulates an apocalypse, a day of judgment, a resurrection of the flesh, and of a second coming of Mithra himself when he will finally defeat the principle of evil. The Mithraists even baptize their followers as Christians do, though they use bull's blood instead of water.

The similarities do not stop there. The symbol of Mithra was the setting and rising sun, which invoke images of Christ's death and resurrection. Both religions also included a sacrament of bread and wine derived from the last supper of their respective saviors. The influence of Mithraism on Christianity is even more pronounced in the symbolism and style of the later Gospels as well as in the language and dress of the early Christian leaders. The style of many Mithraic verses seem quite familiar to modern Christians. A typical verse used in a Mithraic service is "Be of good cheer, sacred band of Initiates, your God has risen from the dead. His pains and sufferings shall be your salvation." It is clear that many of the phrases used by Paul seem to draw heavily upon the terminology and style of the Mithraic religion. Another example of this borrowing of Mithraic symbolism is when Paul says "They drink from that spiritual rock and that rock is Christ" (I Cor. 10:4). Mithra was sometimes termed the god out of the rock and Mithraic services were often held in caves. In fact the Vatican hill in Rome that is sacred to Peter, the Christian rock, was already scared to Mithra. Many Mithraic artifacts have been found there. This should not be surprising when it is realized that Mithraism was introduced to the Roman empire around 70 BCE, over 350 years before Christianity was adopted as the official state religion, and that Tarsus, the home of Paul, was one of the chief centers of Mithra worship in the ancient world.

The liturgy of the Eucharist that John describes requires the converted to be born again. In John 3:3 Jesus states that "I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again." This concept of rebirth is again not unique to Christianity. It was in fact integral to the Mithraic religion for 2000 years before Jesus was born. In the Mithraic liturgy, it is stated that it is necessary "so that [the speaker] may gaze upon the immortal beginning with the immortal spirit that I may be born again in thought." Along with the concept of rebirth, the description of the Mithraic communion is nearly indistinguishable form the Christian accounts. The prayer said at a Mithraic communion is "He who will not eat of my body, nor drink of my blood so that he may be one with me and I with him, shall not be saved." This prayer may be compared to the Christian communion story in Luke 21:19 when Jesus breaks the bread and says "This is my body to be given up for you. This cup is the new covenant in my blood which will be shed for you." It is clear just how much influence the symbolism and terminology of Mithraism had on the earliest Christian writers. The other stylist influence that Mithraism had on Christianity is in the dress and trappings used during religious services.

The Mithraic Holy Father wore a red cap, garment, and ring and carried a shepherd's staff. The early Christian leaders adopted the Mithraic title of priest as well as their style of dress. Like the Mithraic priests, the Christian's became Father' despite Jesus' specific proscription of the acceptance of such a title. In Matthew 23:9 Jesus states that you should "call no man your father on earth, for you have one Father, who is in heaven." The Mithraic priest wore robes which featured the sword (cross) of Mithra which are identical to the robes worn by Catholic priests to this day. The Mithraic bishops wore a Mithra, or miter, as their badge of office which was also adopted by early Christian bishops. During a mass, Mithraists commemorated the ascension of the sun-god by eating a mizd, a sun shaped bun with the sword (cross) of Mithra. The mass and the communion wafer were likewise adapted to Christianity. The Roman Catholic mass wafer has maintained this sun shape for over a thousand years. No one would claim that the Judeo-Christian religious tradition is taken entirely from one source. As I have already shown and will continue to show, many similar adaptations were taken from Egypt, Rome, and other ancient civilizations, but it is clear that the Persian cult of Mithra was one of the most influential sources of mythology and symbolism to the ancient Israelites who wrote the Bible.

CONCLUSION

With all of these comparisons and similarities, I have not intended to imply that the Bible is merely plagiarized from these earlier sources. Nor have I intended to prove the that the Bible is a work of fiction. What I have intended to show, and what is apparently clear, is that when the founders of the Christian faith set out to document the life and message of their founder, Jesus, they drew from the best sources of religious doctrine available.

Just as any other writer, the writers of the Bible were influenced by their own cultural biases and view points as well as by the religious figures they met. And as time went on and Christianity was adopted and spread throughout the Roman Empire and the rest of the world, it is not surprising that it was infused with the religious doctrine, symbolism, and mysticism of the cultures it encountered.

To show that these were not just isolated examples from two religions, here is a list of over thirty saviors who were said to have descended from heaven, taken the form of men, and furnished evidence of their divine origin by various miracles and marvelous works. Each laid the foundation for salvation, all were worshipped as Gods or sons of Gods, many were said to have been born to virgins, and many were also said to have been crucified. The list includes such figures as:

- Chrishna of Hindostan,
- Budha Sakia of India,
- Salivahana of Bermuda,
- Zulis and Orus of Egypt,

- Odin of the Scandinavians,
- Crite of Chaldea,
- Baal and Taut of Phoenecia,
- Indra of Tibet,
- Bali of Afganistan,
- Jao of Nepal,
- Wittoba of the Bilingonese,
- Thammuz of Syria,
- Atys of Phrygia,
- Xamolxis of Thrace,
- Adad of Assyria,
- Deva Tat and Sammonocadam of Siam,
- Alcides of Thebes,
- Mikado of the Sintoos,
- Beddru of Japan,
- Hesus or Eros and Bremrillah of the Druids,
- Thor of the Gauls,
- Cadmus and Adonis of Greece,
- Hil and Feta of the Mandaites,
- Gentaut and Quexalcote of Mexico,
- Universal Monarch of the Sibyls,
- Ischy of the island of Formosa,
- Divine teacher of Plato,
- the Holy One of Xaca,
- Fohi and Tien of China,
- Ixion and Quirinus of Rome,
- Prometheus of Caucasus,
- Mohamud or Mahomet of Arabia.

So, truly, the study of the Christian faith must be a study of world faiths. For if we ignore or dismiss the beliefs of others, even those of ancient civilizations, then we are missing an essential part of our own faith.

THE FIRST GODMAN...AN AGRICULTURAL AND ASTRAL INTERPRETATION OF THE OSIRIS MYTH

In following articles we will examine in detail both Solstices and the Equinoxes and how primitive man fashioned a "theology" around what he both saw in the Heavens and experienced in Nature. His impressions and thoughts in these areas were later "personified" as shown in concepts regarding the birth and death of the Sun and it's representative "Osiris." Osiris is the first of these "personifications" of the dying/rising Sun. But in order to understand the "Osiris Myth" and its influence upon subsequent Gentile nation, as well as the Jewish nations and the Essenes, we have to throughly understand the "Osiris Theology." I can remember my amazement when I discovered, through intense study, the "Osiris Pattern" through almost all world religions in some form or fashion. Judaism is not immune either. Therefore we find in almost all cultures the residue of such "Solar Myths" and "Sun-Worship" which again find their origin with Astro-theology and the "Osiris Myth." These "theological myths" which later came to be "personified" in the person of Osiris and others find their origin in cosmic influences in the Heavens as seen in the changing of the seasons and the agricultural cycles of nature. One must remember that the changing of the seasons is influenced by the heavens, in particular, the Sun. We must begin our study of such primitive theology with primitive man and the nation of Egypt which leaves for us ample records of their worship of Osiris. For our purpose, as you will later come to see in further study, the Essenes of Alexandria Egypt, were involved heavily in "Osiris theology."

It is important for us to note right away that the original Godman-Savior/Soter was Osiris of Egypt. More on him later.

I said in a previous article that The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important religious doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures over a period of centuries.

Answer for yourself: Can Pastor Craig prove the above statement? Yes I can but not without your help. You will need to read sufficient information to familiarize yourself with the various mystery religions and the variety of savior godmen as found in order to verify what I am saying it truthful.

This fact, that the broad appeal of Christianity is due to it being a religious synthesis of the most important religious doctrines of pre-existing, pre-Christian cultures, can be no better proven than by examining in detail the original savior-god of mankind since time immemorial and taking note of the "unique pattern" for such a savior godman throughout the Gentile nations since time immemorial.

To do so one must start at the beginning of the "pattern" for this godman and turn his attention to Sun-Worship and the nation of Egypt for the earliest records of the great Osiris, the original Godman which would serve as the "universal pattern" for all other godman saviors. Osiris, an Egyptian deity, plays a preponderant role in religious history, not only of the Nile Valley, but also of the entire area which finally became the Graeco-Roman Empire. In fact, Osiris provides the pattern for all of Godmen or Savior concepts. The facts, the legend, the myth, and the soteriology (salvation doctrines) surrounding this majestic but also pathetic figure stretch back into the very roots of western culture and civilization. Millions today believe and adhere to this "Osiris salvation myth" never knowing the origin for such doctrines of salvation; believing them to be a Divine revelation and never aware of the origin for their religious beliefs.

COMING TO TERMS WITH THE ORIGIN FOR THE OSIRIS MYTH

A powerful force of Aryans from Mesopotamia, conquered the much less developed Nilotics, about 4,000 or 3,500 B.C. These Sumerians superimposed their own economy, jurisprudence, architecture, agriculture, and general way of life upon the conquered, first, by intertwining their own Aryan religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own religious concepts the active and preponderant force. This was a long and complicated process, in the course of which cannibalism and other primitive practices were outlawed, and the flood waters of the great river placed under control; and roads, temples, and cities were constructed. Scientific agriculture was instituted, an elaborate code of equitable law established, an elevated moral code adopted, and a popular and powerful religious system perfected. The result was the greatest civilization yet known, which continued substantially intact for nearly forty centuries.

It is at least probable that Osiris was an historical personage who had married his sister, became king of Egypt, and conquered many nations; that he was murdered by a group of conspirators headed by his brother; and that Osiris was finally transformed into the god-man savior by the priests of a great cult which became dominant in Egypt and later proliferated into adjacent lands and ultimately into almost all the known world!

THE OSIRIS MYTH OF THE GODMAN SAVIOR

According to the Osirian myth, the sun-god Ra detected his wife Nut in the embrace of Seb, the earth-god. He therefore decreed that her offspring could not be born on any day of the year, which then consisted of 360 days. Nut, however, appealed for help to Thoth, the God of Wisdom; and, by playing at draughts with the moon, he won from her a seventy-second portion of each day. Thus, five intercalated days were added to the year, on each of which the curse of Ra was ineffectual. Successively, on these, Nut bore quintuplets (immaculate conception since not human conception) Osiris, Horus, Set, Isis, and Nephthys. Osiris, born on or about the 25th of December, symbolized the rebirth of the sun; in due course, he married Isis, who bore the Younger Horus, who, with his parents, made up the Egyptian Holy Family; Set married Nephthys, who became the mother of Anubis. The Elder Horus remained the celibate and intellectual Scribe. These five personalities, born of earth and heaven (types of incarnations), were equally human and divine (types of Christologies), mortals with a capacity for immortality. Osiris became the supreme god-man and Isis the ultimate mother-goddess, whose role and importance expanded over the centuries in the Osirian cult and who finally emerged as a supreme divinity in her own right.

After conferring a superior culture upon the Egyptians Osiris set out at the head of his beneficent armies to do the same for other nations; he marched all the way to India and later in Europe to the Straits of Gibraltar. Finally, according to the legend, laden with the gifts of many grateful peoples, he returned home in triumph.

In his absence, however, the evil Set conspired with the seventy-two displaced reactionary priests to seize the throne for himself. Having constructed a coffin, he induced his brother to lie down in it: whereupon the conspirators welded the lid shut with molten lead, so that Osiris died of suffocation. Thrown into the Nile, the coffin floated across the Mediterranean to Byblus (modern Jebeil), in Syria, where the body of Osiris became encased and fixed in a tree (a type of a wooden stake or cross).

Escaping the rage of Set, Isis took refuge in the Delta Swamps, where Horus was born. Leaving her child to be reared at Buto, she set out in search of her husband; finding his body at last, she returned with it to Egypt. The implacable Set, however, hacked this into fourteen pieces (body broken for you) and buried one in each of the nomes or provinces of the country.

Now began the incomparable passion of Isis, which ultimately made of her the supreme mother-goddess of the ancient world. Up and down Egypt she went, seeking and searching (Luke 24:1; women were the first to seek out the body of Jesus), until she found all the dismembered portions and reconstituted the body; then, with the help of Thoth and Horus, she resurrected Osiris into a second and immortal life. Risen from death (Mark 16:6), he could never again be subject to its power [Heb. 10:10]; (immortal-Eternal life). In due course, he entered his solar ship, which transported him to the Elysian Fields (Acts 1:9; ascension), the realm of Khenti-Amenti, where he became and forever remains the judge of all who die (2 Tim. 4:1) and the ruler of the blessed.

Osiris, then, symbolized the reborn sun; as Apis, the Bull, he was the emblem of sexual virility; but, most of all, he was the god of agriculture. This, more than anything else, elevated the Egyptians from savagery and cannibalism into civilization. Isis, meanwhile, who was identified with the moon and the cow, was the great and nurturing Mother, who taught mankind to transform the wheat into the bread of life, the barley into the joyous and invigorating ale. Osiris gave men virility; Isis made motherhood possible and even delightful. Osiris gave mankind agriculture and Isis gave them civilized food. These two divinities gave humanity "life and life more abundantly."

ASTROLOGICAL AND NATURAL SYMBOLISMS

The sexual, astronomical, and agricultural symbolism woven into the Isis-Osiris myth reflects the deepest needs and desires of mankind. The offspring of Nut and Seb were conceived at the time when Sirius the Dog Star appeared in the East, as it did then on the first of June, when also the waters of the Nile begin to rise augmented, so the people believed, by the tears of Isis, weeping for Osiris, who was called the Morning Star who brings the waters, as well as the Great Bull, and the Reborn Sun. Deeply significant is the fact that the dismembered god was buried throughout Egypt on the very day when the grain was planted; only one part of Osiris' body could not be recovered...hisphallus and Osiris' resurrection occurred when the green shoots first emerge from the soil. The great rituals and festivals of Osiris were celebrated with the planting and the sprouting of the grain. In countless images of the god found in Egyptian tombs, his body lies on its bier with the tendrils of wheat growing from his body.

BECOMING ONE WITH THE GODMAN...THE EUCHARIST

The ritual of Osiris consisted primarily in the celebration of a eucharistic rite, in which the believers and followers of Osiris ate the flesh of the god in the form of wheat-cakes and drank his blood in the form of barley-ale (Matt. 26:26, Mark 14:22, Luke 22:19, I Cor. 11:24). By "eating the God" in the form of the Eucharist as a type of communion in leavened cakes, Osiris' divinity and immortality became their own through becoming one with their Godman (John 10:38); and this divinity and immortality was diffused through their members; and they became portions of him in spirit, and the heirs of immortality (Rom. 6:5) in his eternal kingdom.Osiris gave mankind through the Eucharist the heavenly bread that came down from heaven (John 6:33); he died that men might have life and have it more richly (John 5:40, John 10:10, John 20:31); he gave his body to his followers to eat and his blood to drink that men and women might make the ultimate identification with himself, rise from the grave, divine and immortal. Through the Eucharist one was "in Osiris, and Osiris in them".

Answer for yourself: Does any of this sound familiar to what the New Testament teaches concerning Jesus?

Answer for yourself: Does not Christianity profess itself to be a Divine revelation? Should we rethink that?

This, in brief, was the central core of the Osirian mystery.

This basic pattern of the "God-man" will be reproduced through succeeding nations on a chronological basis and will find it's ultimate home in the Essene-Christian faith which will be inherited by Roman Catholicism and Protestantism.

THE SPREAD OF THE OSIRIS MYTH INTO ALL THE WORLD

It is important for our studies to understand that for millennia, the Egyptian was the principal culture of the ancient world. That being so it follows naturally that a reconstituted and "modified" Osiris myth penetrated many nations and countries, especially throughout Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean. Nation after nation was eventually influenced by the Osirian myth:

- Perhaps as early as 2,500 B.C., the Egyptian god-man was united with the Semitic Astarte to constitute the Adoni & Aphrodite cult
- Later, as Attis, he became the dying and annually resurrected god of the cult of Cybele
- In the 13th century, B.C., the Osiris myth appeared in Thrace, as Dionysus the savior-god of Orphism
- Later still the Osiris myth migrated into Greece, where he finally became the center of the great Eleusinian mystery itself, which was dedicated to the worship of Demeter, who was herself the Greek reconstitution of Isis.
- In the Roman world, Osiris was known as Father Bacchus.
- About 520 B.C., the Osiris myth was incorporated into the Pythagorean cult as the central element in the first great religious synthesis of the western world.
- The Essene/Qumran cult will assimilate the Osirian Myth into Judaism and we have from this the foundation for the Essene-Christian faith which will be evangelized again into areas of the world which were already familiar and saturated with Osirian religious beliefs. This explains the ease of the spread of the Essene-Christian religious beliefs with a Jewish Rabbi as its center into an anti-Semitic world.

Various mysteries spread throughout the Graeco-Roman world, especially after the Trojan War; but the cult of Isis finally outstripped all others in popularity, magnificence, power and influence. These religious groups were wonderful for their number and diversity; and by the first century C.E., they had achieved dominion over the masses and little has changed today due to the influence of Christianity world-wide.

Almost all the mysteries had one element in common: the worship of an atoning, sacrificial, and immortalizing savior-god, substantially the replica of the great Osiris.

This "pattern" of the Osiris-Godman served the Essene/Qumran sect well in their rejection of Biblical Judaism and through them laid the foundation for the planting of the Essene-Christian faith as the world-wide religion known today as Christianity!

OSIRIS ...A VEGETATION GOD

Osiris is the Egyptian god of the underworld and of vegetation. Osiris is the son of Nut and Geb. His birthplace was said to be Rosetau in the necropolis west of Memphis. Osiris is the brother of Nephthys and Seth, and the brother and husband of Isis. Isis gave birth to Horus after his death, having impregnated herself with semen from his corpse (a form of immaculate conception from the personification of Virgo and Spica at the Vernal Equinox). Osiris was depicted in human form wrapped up as a mummy, holding the crook and flail (a form of personification of the constellation Orion..the man in Heaven...the realm of God). He was often depicted with green skin, alluding to his role as a god of vegetation. He wore a crown known as the 'atef', composed of the tall conical white crown of Upper Egypt with red plumes on each side. Osiris had many cult centers, but the most important were at Abydos (Ibdju) in Upper Egypt, where the god's legend was reenacted in an annual festival, and at Busiris (Djedu) in the Nile delta.

One of the so-called "dying gods", he was the focus of a famous legend in which he was killed by the rival god Seth. At a banquet of the gods, Seth fooled Osiris into stepping into a coffin, which he promptly slammed shut and cast into the Nile. The coffin was born by the Nile to the delta town of Byblos, where it became enclosed in a tamarisk tree (a crude cross). Isis, the wife of Osiris, discovered the coffin and brought it back. (The story to this point is attested only by the Greek writer Plutarch, although Seth was identified as his murderer as early as the Pyramid era of the Old Kingdom.)

Seth took advantage of Isis's temporary absence on one occasion, cut the body to pieces, and cast them into the Nile. In the Egyptian texts this incident alone accounts for the murder of Osiris. Isis searched the land for the body parts of Osiris, and was eventually able to piece together his body, whole save for the penis, which had been swallowed by a crocodile (according to Plutarch) or a fish (according to Egyptian texts). In some Egyptian texts, the penis is buried at Memphis. Isis replaced the penis with a reasonable facsimile, and she was often portrayed in the form of a kite being impregnated by the ithyphallic corpse of Osiris. In some Egyptian texts, the scattering of the body parts is likened to the scattering of grain in the fields, a reference to Osiris's role as a vegetation god. 'Osiris gardens' - wood-framed barley seedbeds in the shape of the god, were sometimes placed in tombs - and the plants which sprouted from these beds symbolized the resurrection of life after death.

It was this legend that accounted for Osiris's role as a god of the dead and ruler of the Egyptian underworld. He was associated with funerary rituals, at first only with those of the Egyptian monarch, later with those of the populace in general. The pharaoh was believed to become Osiris after his death. Although he was regarded as a guarantor of continued existence in the afterlife, Osiris also had a darker, demonic aspect associated with the physiological processes of death and decay, and reflecting the fear Egyptians had of death in spite of their belief in an afterlife. Osiris was also a judge of the dead, referred to as the 'lord of Maat' (i.e. of divine law).

Legendary ruler of predynastic Egypt and god of the underworld. Osiris symbolized the creative forces of nature and the imperishability of life. Called the great benefactor of humanity, he brought to the people knowledge of agriculture and civilization. The worship of Osiris, one of the great cults of ancient Egypt, gradually spread throughout the Mediterranean world and, with that of Isis and Horus, was especially vital during the Roman Empire. Osiris served as the pattern for the many Solar and Lunar gods that would come from almost every sun-worshipping nation down through history; including Rome. The theological similarities between Osiris and Jesus are astounding when you begin to seriously look into such a comparison.

THE NECESSARY ROLE OF PAUL'S EUCHARIST...IN HIS NEW RELIGION...THE OSIRIS SACRAMENT

THE ORIGIN OF PAUL'S EUCHARIST..THE OSIRIS SACRAMENT

In the last article in this series we made note repeatedly of the concept of "being in Christ" and it's parallels from Egypt when the devotees and followers of Osiris were "in Osiris." Little has changed in 3500 years and Paul is proof of it. We noted earlier in this articles on other of our websites some of the ethical and ceremonial prerequisites for becoming an Osiris (similar to "being in Christ" as expressed by Paul). But none of these could avail at all without the miraculous power contained in the divine eucharist: there was power, there was power in the flesh and the blood of Osiris. He was the grain; and the bread made from it was the sacred food, the barley ale brewed from it the divine drink, literally believed to be the body and the blood of the god. Since the ancient Nilotics believed that human beings become whatever they eat, this Osirian sacrament was believed able to make them celestial and immortal. The doctrine of the eucharist has its ultimate roots in prehistoric cannibalism: it was universally believed among savages that by eating other human beings or gods, their virtues and powers would be absorbed by the eaters. Such cannibalism, common among African tribes until very recently and still practiced among the most primitive, had this primary objective. Melville describes the same sacerdotal rite among the south sea islanders (Cf. Typee XXXI). One of the oldest of the Pyramid Texts is that of Unas from the VIth Dynasty, cir. 2500 B. C. This is of great importance because it shows that the original ideology of Egypt had commingled with the Osirian concepts. Although he is ultimately given high place in heaven by order of Osiris, Unas is represented as being at first an enemy of the gods and his ancestors, whom he hunts, lassoes, kills, cooks, and eats so that their powers and attributes may become his own. It is obvious that at the time this was written, the eating of parents and gods was considered a most laudable ceremonial; and it emphasizes how difficult it must have been for the Osirian priesthood to stamp out the older cannibalism:

"The Akeru gods tremble, the Kenemu whirl, when they see Unas a risen Soul, in the form of a god who lives upon his fathers and feeds upon his mothers.... He eats men, he feeds on the gods . . . he cooks them in his fiery cauldrons. He eats their words of power, he swallows their spirits. . . What he finds on his path, he eats eagerly.... He eats the wisdom of every god, his period of life is eternity. . . Their soul is in his body, their spirits are within him."

Having partaken of this dynamic sacrament, Unas becomes an Osiris and is admitted to the company of the gods.

A parallel passage is found in the Pyramid Text of Pepi II, who, it is said"

"seizeth those who are in the following of Set . . . he breaketh their heads, he cutteth off their haunches, he teareth out their intestines, he diggeth out their hearts, he drinketh copiously of their blood!' (Line 531 ff.).

Although crude, savage, and grotesque, this was the core of an overwhelming concept. The conviction that it was possible for humanity to achieve immortality by eating the body and drinking the blood of a god or of an immortal god-man who had died that mortals might have abundant and everlasting life, became a dominating obsession in the ancient world. The cult of Osiris forbade the older cannibalism, but did not proscribe the dismemberment and eating of enemies; and it certainly practiced the bloody sacrifice of captives and the sacramental rending and eating of the sacred bovine, which symbolized Osiris (The Book of the Dead, CLXXXI). The moral elevation of the Osirian cult lay in its identification of bread with the flesh of its god and of barley ale with his blood. The partaker of this eucharist could now achieve a mystical transformation and become an Osiris by living on wheat and barley bread during his lifetime, by drinking and eating the sacred ale and cakes during the annual mysteries, and by enjoying the same sacred fare in Sekhet-Aaru once his Khu had joined his Sahu in the next world. By this simple metaphysical transposition, the bloody sacrament became symbolic, but no less effective.

Now please pay close attention and "think" when reading the next item. For Osiris was, to his believers, literally and with complete reality, the divine seed which came down from heaven and was reborn from the earth that men might have life and have it more abundantly; and all who ate of that bread might live forever, for it was the flesh of the god, which he gave for the life of humanity. Whosoever ate the flesh and drank the blood of Osiris had eternal life; for he would be resurrected beyond the grave. Whosoever ate that flesh and drank that blood dwelt in Osiris and Osiris dwelt in him. This was the divine mystery which was given to the world by Egypt and which spread throughout the Mediterranean area in various cults; this concept originated only once, but it proliferated in all directions and became the dynamic force in every mystery-cult. It was solely by means of this sacramental food that the corruptible of the deceased could be clothed with incorruption. This idea appears again and again in infinite variety. Paul uses this "idea" in selling his Jewish "revelation" to the Gentile world; notice as I said earlier, that he does hot have to change anything when presenting his version of this "godman" and "his eucharist to the Gentiles...they already believed in solar/astral godmen who came drown from heaven in 'virgin births' and already were partakers in their 'mysteries' where their body and blood were 'eaten' in the forms of the suppers of their godmen.

The scribe Nebseni implores: "And there in the celestial mansions of heaven which my divine father Tem hath established, let my hands lay hold upon the wheat and the barley which shall be given unto me therein in abundant measure." This was the celestial eucharist without which the Sahu itself, the spiritual body, could not germinate from the mummy. Nu corroborates this fact by stating: "I am established, and the divine Sekhethetep is before me, I have eaten therein, I have become a spirit therein, I have abundance therein." Again he declares; "I am the divine soul of Ra . . . which is god. . . I am the divine food which is not corrupted." Nu identifies himself with Osiris and with Ra, who is called the divine, that is, the sacramental food. As we know, Horus, the Son of the Godman Osiris, who comes from an immaculate conception no less, was also frequently identified with his father; and we read: "Horus is both the divine food and the sacrifice." We read that the bread and the ale of Osiris make the eater immortal, (The Book of the Dead, 40) an idea which is frequently elaborated. The Osirian "shall eat of that wheat and barley, and his limbs shall be nourished therewith, and his body shall become like unto the bodies of the gods" (The Book of the Dead, XCIX). That the sacramental food which gave immortality was a very ancient concept we learn from the Pyramid Text of Teta, which dates from about, 2600 B. C. and which embodies ideas far more ancient still. We read here that the Osiris Teta "receives" thy bread which decayeth not, and thy beer which perisheth not." In the Text of Pepi I we read:

"All the gods give thee their flesh and their blood.... Thou shalt not die."

In the Text of Pepi II, the aspirant prays for "thy bread of eternity, and thy beer of everlastingness (Line 390).

THE GOD-MAN OSIRIS - PAUL'S PROTOTYPE

Such was the great godman Osiris: human, like us, and thus able to take upon himself all our sorrow, but also divine, and therefore able to confer divinity upon us. He brought the divine bread from heaven for mankind; he taught justice and practiced mercy; he died, was buried, and rose from the grave; he gave to all who became members of his mystical body his flesh to eat and his blood to drink so that this divine sacrament might then transfigure them into celestial gods; he went before to prepare mansions for his initiates in Elysium (our concept of Heaven); and he was to be the just and merciful judge before whom men and women must appear beyond the grave.

The Eucharist signifies the mystical incorporation of the initiate into the godhead by eating the body and drinking the blood of Christ (just another in a long line of Osiris proto-types). Such a ceremony implies the deification of Jesus and is quite impossible to reconcile with a view of Jesus as merely a Messiah in the Jewish sense. Moreover, the Eucharist, as well as implying a doctrine of participation in the godhead, implies a doctrine of the sacrifice of Jesus as an atonement for mankind; the worshipper partakes of the body of the sacrificed Jesus much as the Jewish worshippers used to eat the Paschal lamb (to which Jesus is likened in I Corinthians 5:7....sacrificed just like Osiris for his followers). Such a concept of the death of Jesus cannot be reconciled with any variety of Judaism, for it amounts to the reinstatement of human sacrifice, which for Judaism was anathema! Indeed a large part of the Hebrew Bible constitutes a campaign against human sacrifice. The institution of animal sacrifice was understood to entail the complete supersession of human sacrifice; and the story of the akedah or Binding of Isaac in which God finally renounces human sacrifice in favor of animal sacrifice is the validating myth of this advance.

While it is true that the idea of vicarious atonement is not wholly alien to Judaism, as pointed out earlier, it is peripheral and forms no part of the main pattern of salvation. The story may be told in the midrash that Rabbi Judah's sufferings ensured good harvests (Genesis Rabbah 33), but this does not mean that the average Jew was encouraged to lay his burden of sin upon Rabbi Judah or other such figures and abandon his own individual struggle against the evil inclination by the guidance of the Torah. Even the story in the Bible about Moses's offer to sacrifice himself for the Israelites is a peripheral narrative device, heightening the character of Moses as a lover of Israel, rather than pointing a way to salvation. In any case, Moses's offer is immediately refused by God in terms that reinforce the usual pattern of individual responsibility: "And the Lord said unto Moses, 'Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book'" (Exodus 32: 33). The implication of the Eucharist that salvation is to be obtained through faith in Jesus' death and the shedding of his blood is thus a radical departure from Judaism and a return to pagan concepts of atonement. Thus we see the "Eucharist" as the Catholic equivalent of the Protestant's "Communion." This "sacrament" originated in Egypt and spread thought the know world and offered a form of salvation to its partakers. Paul picks up this concept and advances it with Jewish overtones to his "converts." Thus, again we see that it was Paul and not Jesus who was the founder of a faith that has as its core not the Passover, but the supper of their Godman....Christianity.

BUT JESUS IS GIVEN CREDIT FOR THE EUCHARIST IN THE NEW TESTAMENT....HOW CAN THIS BE?

Equally relevant is the fact that the Eucharist, as the basic sacrament of Christianity, marks it off from Judaism as a separate religion. If Jesus instituted the Eucharist, then he was founding a new religion thereby, if only in the institutional sense of providing a central ceremony not contained in Judaism and taking the place of the Jewish sacraments of the Temple or (in the absence of the Temple) of the Shema, the affirmation of the unity of God, which forms the central act of Jewish worship. The institution of the Lord's Prayer by Jesus, as pointed out before, did not constitute any such radical departure from Jewish practice, for it was quite usual for rabbis of the Pharisaic movement to compose some personal prayer, for the use of themselves and their immediate disciples, which would be used in addition to the normal prayers. A number of such prayers have been preserved in the Talmud, and some of them have actually been incorporated into the Jewish Prayer Book and are used by all Jews today. It was only when the Lord's Prayer, after the death of Jesus, was made into a central feature of the daily service, instead of being added to the normal Jewish prayers, that it became a specifically Christian observance; for in itself, it contains nothing contrary to Judaism, and is indeed a characteristically Jewish prayer.

In the Gospels, certain familiar texts portray Jesus as founding the Eucharist. The earliest of these is in Mark:

"And as they did eat, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave it to them, and said, 'Take, eat: this is my body.' And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them: and they all drank of it. And he said unto them, 'This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many'" (Mark 14:22-24).

Matthew and Luke give the same account, with some small variations. This account forms part of the story of the Last Supper.

Answer for yourself: Did you ever notice that the Gospel of John explains the Eucharist completely different than the Synoptic Gospels?

John, however, strangely enough, does not mention this incident in his account of the Last Supper, but instead attaches the Eucharistic idea to a quite different phase of Jesus' life, his preaching in Galilee in the Capernaum synagogue:

Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever. (John 6: 53-58)

Please notice the conflicting origin for Jesus' supposed introduction of the Eucharist:

In the Synoptic Gospels (Mark, Matthew and Luke), Jesus is represented as performing a ceremony (distributing bread and wine to his disciples), but not as instituting a rite to be observed by his followers in perpetuity. It is left to the reader to surmise that this story provides a historical origin for the rite of the Eucharist as practised in the Christian Church. In John, on the other hand, Jesus does not even perform a ceremony: he merely expresses some ideas, dark and cryptic even to his disciples, some of whom are alienated by them (John 6: 66).

Answer for yourself: Does this blatant contradiction as to the origin of the Eucharist by Jesus possibly indicate that he had nothing to do with such an idea and the writing of this "account" in various ways were the later attempts of the Gospel writers to tie its origin to Jesus and not Paul, thereby giving greater credibility to the sacrament if it could be shown to have originated with Jesus instead of Paul? Without a doubt!

Answer for yourself: Could the Jew's rejection of Jesus' supposed offer to "eat his flesh and drink his blood" be historically accurate to the overwhelming Jewish lack of acceptance of Paul's Eucharist and it's implied meaning among the Jews? Without a doubt, but the attempt and connection had to be made in order to tie it to Jesus. The accounts of trying to tie it to Jesus are not the same; again showing the mark of man's creativity and not God's!

Answer for yourself: Where, then, do we find the first expression of the notion that Jesus actually instituted the Eucharistic rite as a regular sacrament in the Christian Church? Well we do not find it an any writings that can accurately shown to be written by Jewish hands; we have to go to the Gentile convert Paul again for this! I hope you don't forget that since a child Paul would have been impressed by the mystery of such a saving sacrament that was the center of Gentile religion; like Tarsus for example where he grew up.

The earliest assertion of the institution of this Osirian sacrament/Eucharist within Judaism is to be found in Paul's Epistles, and this is indeed the earliest reference to the Eucharistic idea too, i.e. to the idea that there is salvific power in the body and blood of Jesus...just as we saw was identical to Osiris:

For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, that the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread; and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come. Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. (I Corinthians 2: 23-30)

From this passage, it is abundantly clear that Paul himself was the inventor and creator of the Eucharist, both as an idea and as a Church institution. For Paul says quite plainly that the Eucharist was founded on a revelation which he himself received:

"For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you."

The fact that Paul says here that he received directly "from the Lord" (i.e. by direct revelation from Jesus himself, in one of the many appearances which Paul claims occurred to him) the details of how Jesus instituted the Eucharist (or what Paul calls "the Lord's Supper", verse 20), has been glossed over by scholars in a manner that might be considered extraordinary; but it is really quite understandable, for there is a great deal at stake here. To admit that Paul was the creator of the Eucharist would be to admit that Paul, not Jesus, was the founder of Christianity. It means that the central sacrament and mystery of Christianity, which marks it off as a separate religion from Judaism, was not instituted by Jesus. Nor are the ideas underlying this sacrament - the incorporation of the worshippers in the body of the divine Christ by a process of eating the god ?-part of Jesus' religious outlook: indeed, he would have found such ideas repugnant, though not unfamiliar, for they were a well-known aspect of paganism, especially in its mystery religion manifestations.

Even Christian scholars, however, have not been able to hide from themselves completely that Paul is here claiming to have received by revelation from Jesus personally how, at the Last Supper, Jesus gave instructions about the institution of the Eucharist. A typical comment is the following: "Perhaps St Paul means that he received this information by revelation, though the preposition apo (from) rather suggests his having received it from the Lord through the elder apostles or other intermediaries" (Evans, Corinthians, Clarendon Bible, 1930).

While allowing that it is possible that Paul is here claiming a revelation (though without admitting how momentous such an interpretation would be, or why it has to be fended off so desperately), this scholar takes refuge in a grammatical comment of little weight (Maccoby, Mythmaker, p. 113).

We must accept, then, that Paul is saying here that he knows about Jesus' words at the Last Supper by direct revelation, not by any information received from the Jerusalem Apostles, some of whom were actually at the Last Supper. It would obviously be absurd for Paul to ascribe to an exclusive revelation of his own an institution already well known in the Church since the days of Jesus himself. This explains the otherwise inexplicable fact that, as we shall see, the Eucharist was not observed by the "Jerusalem Church" at all, but only by those churches that had come under the influence of Paul. For if Jesus himself had instituted the Eucharist, one would expect it to be observed, above all, by those who were actually present at the Last Supper - unless they had unaccountably forgotten Jesus' words, and needed to be reminded of them through a special revelation given to Paul.

The Gospels, of course, do assert that the Eucharist was instituted by Jesus - or, at least, that as an institution it was based on something that Jesus did and said at the Last Supper. But we must remind ourselves, once more, that the Gospels were all written after Paul's Epistles, and were all influenced by Paul's ideas. Coupled with this fact is the scholars who today point out the fact that the Gospels bearing the Apostles' names were written quite late; much later than Church traditions reports and the hand of the authors of these Gospels were not the Jewish Apostles but non-Jews due to the innumerable internal evidences of errors which no 5 years old Jewish child would have made let alone the Holy Spirit. Of course, there is much in the Gospels that is not derived from Paul, especially in relation to Jesus' earthly life, in which Paul did not take much interest. But here is one alleged incident in Jesus' life about which, for once, there is a close correspondence between something in Paul's Epistles and the account of the Gospels. It is significant that this one incident concerns an institution so central for the Christian Church, which had a strong motive to ascribe its institution to Jesus, since otherwise it would have to admit that Jesus had no intention of founding a new religion at all. We are forced to the conclusion that the source from which the Gospels derive their account of the Last Supper, in its Eucharistic aspects, is, in fact, Paul's account of his revelation on the matter in Corinthians.

The Gospels, in general, have other sources for their accounts of Jesus' last days. But the Gospel-writers, being members of a Church in which the Eucharist was already centrally important (Gentile churches), and having no other source for the institution of the Eucharist than Paul's account, had to turn away from their usual sources and draw on Paul directly in order to write into the story something corresponding to what Paul alleged to have seen in his vision of the Last Supper. This explains the numerous verbal correspondences between the accounts given in the Synoptic Gospels and Paul's words in Corinthians. These cannot be a coincidence, but must mean that the Gospel authors had Paul's words before them as they wrote (they cannot be from a common source, since Paul says explicitly that he did not have them from any source but by personal revelation).

Though the Synoptic Gospels follow the outline of Paul's account closely, they do not go as far as Paul in ascribing to Jesus the actual institution of the Eucharistic rite; instead they portray Jesus as performing a ceremony which was afterwards made the basis of the Eucharistic rite. The absence of the whole incident in their other sources must have embarrassed the Synoptic writers to the extent that they inserted only a pared down version of Paul's visionary incident.

The author of John, on the other hand, omitted the incident altogether from his account of the Last Supper.

Answer for yourself: How could this be if Jesus instituted such an important sacrament?

This "omission" was certainly not because he was indifferent to the Eucharist, for, in another context, he gives a much longer and more impassioned version of its theory than is found in any of the Synoptic Gospels, making it essential to the attainment of eternal life, and evidently regarding it as a mystery of incorporation with the divine just as in the mystery cults. His omission of the topic from the Last Supper must mean that he was unacquainted with the Epistle of Paul in which the topic was attached to the Last Supper for the first time.

Answer for yourself: How could this be if Jesus instituted such an important sacrament at the Last Supper and he was writing under the unction of the Holy Spirit; or was he?

Nevertheless, as a member of a Church in which the practice of the Eucharist was regarded as essential for salvation (though unaware that this doctrine came from Paul), he included a long defence of the institution as part of Jesus' preaching. Thus all the Gospels provide some kind of basis in Jesus' life for the Eucharistic rite of which Jesus, in historical fact, knew nothing.

John shows himself well aware of the shocking character of the Eucharistic idea in Jewish eyes when he portrays even the disciples as offended by it, and some of them as so alienated that "they walked no more with him". What John is describing here is not the shock felt by Jewish hearers of Jesus (for Jesus never expressed any Eucharistic ideas) but the shock felt by hearers of Paul when he grafted on to the practice of Christianity a rite so reminiscent of paganism, involving a notion of incorporation of the godhead by a procedure with strong overtones of cannibalism.

PASSOVER OR PAUL'S OSIRIS RITUAL..NOW CALLED THE LORD'S SUPPER?

This is not to say, of course, that Jesus did not distribute bread and wine to his disciples at the Last Supper...which was simply a Passover Seder! This was quite normal at a Jewish meal, whether at festival time or not. The leading person at the table would make a blessing (blessing is the original meaning of the word "eucharist") and then break the loaf of bread and pass a piece to everyone at the table. This cup of wine seems to be what is referred to in the Synoptic accounts and in I Corinthians, and speaks of the kiddush wine of sabbath and festivals, which preceded the bread and certain parts of the seder. This procedure, which is still practised today at Jewish tables, has no mystical significance; the only meaning of it is to thank God for the meal He has provided. The addition of mystery religion trappings (i.e. the bread as the body of the god, and the wine as his blood) was the work of Paul, by which he turned an ordinary Jewish meal into a pagan sacrament. Since the blood even of an animal was forbidden at a Jewish meal by biblical law (Leviticus 7:26), the idea of regarding the wine as blood would be found disgusting by Jews. Here again, Paul seems to be deliberately removing himself from the Jewish ethos and canons of taste, and aligning himself with the world of paganism.

It is worthy of note that the term Paul uses for the Eucharist is "the Lord's Supper" (Greek kuriakon deipnon). This same expression was used in the mystery religions for the sacred meals dedicated to the saviour god. There is evidence that in the early Gentile Church, this ceremony was indeed regarded as a mystery, for an atmosphere of secrecy surrounded it, and non-Christians and even catechumens (those being inducted into Gentile Christianity) were not allowed to witness it. Paul's expression "the Lord's Supper" was so redolent of mystery religion that the early Fathers of the Church became embarrassed by it, and they substituted for it the name "Eucharist", which had Jewish, rather than pagan, associations. Thus the Fathers sought to align the Christian ceremony with the non-mystical, non-magical kiddush of the Jews, in which the wine and the bread were "blessed" (or, more accurately, God was blessed for providing them). Despite this change of name, however, the Eucharist continued to have magical associations, since it was believed that a miracle occurred every time it was celebrated: the bread and wine turned into the body and blood of Christ. This magical significance existed from the first institution of the rite by Paul, as can be seen from his expressions concerning the magical effect of the proper performance of it:

"For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep."

Nevertheless, even Paul had no wish to cut off his new religion, with its new rite of communion, from Judaism entirely. To do that would strip any authority he could have from the Jerusalem church which was promoted as the authorities who backed Paul's mission (when in reality they had strong reservations concerning it). Even though he gave authority to the new rite by a vision, it was not his own authority that he cited, but that of Jesus. He would thus have approved of the effort later put into the Gospels and Acts to derive Paul's doctrines, including the Eucharist, from Jesus, and thus to play down the role of Paul himself. Paul had no wish to be acclaimed as the founder of a new religion; on the contrary, he wished his doctrines to be accepted as the logical continuation of Judaism, and therefore to have the backing of the whole panoply of history contained in the Jewish scriptures. Consequently, even in his institution of the Eucharist, he seeks to stress biblical antecedents. Thus he relates the sacrifice of the Eucharist and the eating of the body and blood of Christ to the sacrifices of the Temple (1 Corinthians 10: 18), and the imbibing of Christ's blood to the imbibing of miraculous water by the Israelites in the wilderness (1 Corinthians 10: 4). By surrounding what was, in fact, an audaciously pagan ceremony with a web of scriptural allusions, Paul hoped to attach his cult of Jesus as a saviour-god to the Jewish background which he still cherished as a convert and in which he had aspired to reach great heights. In this way he could think of himself as a prophet, like Jeremiah. He had not broken from the Pharisees whom he had hoped to conquer through his gifts; instead, he had transcended them, and so conquered them in a different way. His abject failure had been turned into triumph. The Gamaliels and Hillels on whom his youthful admiration had been bestowed were now small fry: mere shadows of the prophets, among whom Paul took his place. If the Pharisees now wished to achieve any eminence, they could do so only by attaching themselves to him, and seeking salvation by the route which only he could show.

DID THE JERUSALEM APOSTLES AND MOTHER CHURCH PARTAKE OF PAUL'S EUCHARIST?

It remains to demonstrate that the Eucharist ceremony was not practised by Jesus' followers in Jerusalem, who were led by the disciples of Jesus himself, who would surely have known whether Jesus had given them this new foundation rite.

As the celebrated scholar Hans Lietzmann indicated long ago, the evidence of the book of Acts points to the conclusion that the Eucharist was not practised by the Jerusalem Nazarenes. Instead, a sense of community was instilled simply by having communal meals, as in the case of other Jewish fellowships. Thus, we find the following:

"They met constantly to hear the apostles teach, and to share the common life, to break bread, and to pray. . . . With one mind they kept up their daily attendance at the temple, and, breaking bread in private houses, shared their meals with unaffected joy, as they praised God and enjoyed the favor of the whole people" (Acts 2:42-46).

The expression "to break bread" (Hebrew betzo'a) simply means to initiate a meal in a ceremonious way; the host or some prominent guest makes a blessing over a loaf of bread and then breaks the loaf, giving a piece to each person present. This was done (and still is done) by Jews at all communal or celebratory meals, whether on a week day or a festival day, and nothing is said to suggest that the bread has any symbolic or mystical significance.

If these communal meals of Jesus' followers in Jerusalem had had a Eucharistic character (i.e. if they were sacraments with a mystical significance of eating the body and drinking the blood of Jesus), something would surely have been included to indicate this: at the very least, the wine would have been mentioned, which it is not. It may be asked why Luke, who did not scruple to include in his Gospel a Eucharistic element in his account of the Last Supper, did not venture to give a Eucharistic coloring to his account of the communal meals in Acts. Luke himself must have been familiar with Eucharistic practice, since at the time of the writing of Acts (about AD 90), the Eucharist was an established rite of the Church. Yet he did not think of inserting into his account of the practices of the "Jerusalem Church" that they performed the Eucharist. This is merely an example of how difficult it is to rewrite history without leaving tell-tale traces of the original story. One alteration always implies others; but the redactor does not always think of the repercussions of an alteration he has inserted, and so leaves other parts of his work unaltered and inconsistent with his pattern of adaptation of the original.

A survey of the evidence thus confirms that Paul and no one else was the creator of the Eucharist.

He gave authority to this new institution, which he actually derived from mystery religion, by adducing a vision in which he had seen Jesus at the Last Supper, giving instructions to his disciples about performing the Eucharistic rite. This vision of Paul's was later incorporated as historical fact into the Gospels, in the Gentile written accounts given there of the Last Supper, and thus has been accepted as historical fact by the vast majority, but not all, of New Testament scholars. The followers of Jesus in Jerusalem, who were pious Jews and would have regarded the idea of eating Jesus' body and drinking his blood as repugnant, never practised this rite, but simply took communal meals prefaced by the breaking of bread, in the manner sanctioned by Jewish tradition for fellowships within the general community of Judaism.

There is no need to go on. I will leave you with a thought from a real Prophet of God and not a rejected Sadducee/Pharisee want to be:

Jer 10:2 2 Thus saith the LORD, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. (KJV)

OSIRIS...A WATER G-D

Among a people like the Egyptians it would not be very long before the annual rise, and inundation, and fall of the Nile would be compared to the chief periods in the lives of men, and before the renewed rise of the Nile in the following year would be compared to man's immortality, which in Egypt was taken for granted from the earliest times; and that this exactly is what happened the hierglyphic texts supply abundant proof. Unfortunately, however, we find nowhere in Egyptian works a connected narrative of the life, acts and deeds, and sufferings and death, and resurrection of Osiris, the man-god, but we possess a tolerably accurate account of them in Plutarch's De Iside et Osiride. According to these Osiris was the son of Rhea, the Egyptian Nut, the wife of Helios, the Egyptian Ra, by Kronos, the Egyptian Seb. When Helios found his wife was with child by Seb he declared that she should not be delivered of her child of any month or on any year. By a stratagem, Hermes, the Egyptian Thoth, played at tables with Selene, and won from her the seventieth part of each day of the year, i.e., in all five days Osiris was born, and a voice was heard to proclaim that the lord of creation was born. In due course he became king of Egypt and taught men agriculture, and established a code of laws, and made men worship the gods. When Egypt had become peaceful and prosperous he set out to instruct the other nations of the world, and Isis riled Egypt during his absence. On his return Typhon, the Egyptian Set, and his seventy-two comrades, made Osiris to lie down in a chest, which was immediately closed by them, and cast into the Nile, which carried it down to its Tanaitic mouths. When Isis heard what had befallen her husband she cut off the lock of her hair as a sign of grief, and then set out to find his dead body. At length she traced it to Byblos, where it had been carried by the sea, and she found that the waves had gently laid it among the branches of a tamarisk tree, which had grown to a magnificent size, and had enclosed the chest within its trunk. The Babylos here referred to is not Byblos in Phoenicia, but the papyrus swamps of Egypt, which are carried in Egyptian Athu, a name meaning "papyrus plants;" the Greeks rendered the Egyptian word for "papyrus" the Greeks rendered the Egyptian word for "papyrus" by BuBros, and some copyist of the Greek text misunderstood the signification of the word in this passage, and rendered it by the name of the city of Phoenicia.

The king of the country, admiring the tree, had it cut down and made a pillar for the roof of his house; it is this tree trunk which is referred to by the hierhlyphic sign tet, and which is continually used in the texts with reference to Osiris. It has been said to represent a mason's table, but the four cross-bars have nothing to do with such a thing, for they are intended to indicate the four branches of a roof-tree of a which were turned to the four cardinal points. When Isis heard that the tree had been cut down, she went to the palace of the king, and through the good offices of the royal maidens she was made nurse to the king's son. Instead of nursing the child in the ordinary way, Isis gave him her finger to suck, and each night she put him the fire to consume his mortal parts, changing herself all the while into a swallow an bemoaning her fate. On one occasion the queen saw her son in the flames, and cried out, and thus deprived him of immortality. Then Isis told the queen her story, and begged for the pillar which supported the roof. This she cut open, and took out the chest and her husband's body, and departed with them to Egypt; having arrived there she hid the chest and set in quest of her son Horus.

One night, however, Typhon was out hunting by the light of the moon, an he found the chest, and recognizing the body, tore it into fourteen pieces [from the lunar theology], which he scattered up and down throughout the land. When Isis heard of this she took a boat made of papyrus --- a plant abhorred by crocodiles--- and sailing about she gathered together the fragments of Osiris's body, wheresoever she found one, and buried it and built a tomb over it. Meanwhile Horus had grown up, and being encouraged in the use of arms by Osiris, who returned from the other world, he went out to do battle with Typhon the murderer of his father. The fight lasted some days, and Typhon was made captive, and was given over to the custody of Isis who, however, set him free. Horus in his rage tore from her head the royal diadem, but Thoth gave her a helmet in the shape of a cow's head. In two other battles fought between Horus and Thphon Horus was the victor. The great battle between Horus and Thphon took place, we are told in the Ivth Sallier Papyrus, on the 26th day of the month Thoth [midnight of the 25th of Dec. the Sun begins it rise northward from the winter solstice indicative of its victory over Darkness/personified as Set]; they first fought in the form of two men, but afterwards changed themselves into two bears, and they passed three days and three nights in this form.

VICTORY OF HORUS

From the above summary it is clear that the Egyptians believed that Osiris was the sun of a god and lived a good life upon earth as a wise and just king, that he was slain by the malice of evil men [Jesus?], that his body was mutilated, and that his wife Isis collected his limbs [like Jesus' body was retrieved] which had been scattered throughout Egypt by Set, or Thphon, and that Osiris by some means obtained a new life in the next world, where he reigned as god and king. The hieroglyphic texts contain abundant testimony that the statements of Plutarch are substantially correct, and from first to last Osiris was to the Egyptians the god-man who suffered, and died, and rose again, and reigned eternally in heaven. They believed that they would inherit eternal life, just as he had done, provided that what was done for him by the gods was done for them, and they made use of amulets, and magical texts of all kind, and performed ceremonies connected with sympathetic magic in order that they might compel Osiris and the gods who had brought about his resurrection {i.e., Thoth, "lord of divine words, the scribe of the gods," and Isis, who made use of the words with which Thoth supplied her, and Horus and his companion gods who performed the symbolic ceremonies which were effectual in producing the reconstruction of the body of Osiris and its revivifcation} the act on their behalf even as they had acted for the god. The species of the amulets used were constant, and they appear to have sixteen in number, four figures of the children of Horus each with his characteristic head, four lapis-lazuli Tet pillars, two bulls, a figure of Horus a figure of Thoth, two carnelian Tet pillars, and two lapis-lazuli utchats.

According to Plutarch the number of portions into which Set tore the body of Osiris was fourteen, but the hieroglyohic texts give at tomes fourteen and at others sixteen ; the cities and sanctuaries these were buried are:

1. Ament of Koptos.
2. Aa-ab in Elephantine.
3. At-rut-f in Herkaleopolis Magna.
4. Kusae.
5. Heliopolis.
6. An-Ament in Sma-behutet {Diopolis of Lower Egypt}.
7. Letopolis.
8. Pa-Thuhen in Sais.
9. Meh-ta-f in Hermoplis of Lower Egypt.
10. Athribis.
11. Aq {Scedia}.
12. Ab, in the Lybyan nome.
13. Het-sera in the city of Netert.
14. Apis

In the late period of Egyptian history, i.e., in Graeco-Roman times, the sanctuaries of Osiris were fourty-two in number; in other words, each nome possessed its central shrine of Osiris, which was called a "Serapeum," or the place where Serapis was worshipped, but this happened because Osiris Khent Amenti was identified with Serapis, who was not the god Osiris himself, but only a dead Apis bull which had become an Osiris. It has already been said that in some lists the sanctuaries of Osiris are stated to be sixteen, because in the inscriptions at Dendera which refer to the "mysteries" of Osiris, the statue of Seker-Osiris, which played such a prominent part in the ceremonies performed there, was made up to fourteen pieces, although sixteen members of the body of Osiris are :--- his head, the souls of his feet, his bones, his arms, his heart, his interior, his tongue, his eye, his fist, his fingers, his back, his ears, his loins, his body, his head with the face of a ram, and his hair.

OSIRIS THE MAN-G-D

All the evidence in the subject now available goes to prove, as the paragraphs above show, that the early Egyptians believed that Osiris was a man-god who was murdered and whose body was mutilated, and that various members of his body were reconstituted; and we know from very interesting text at Dendera that during the month of Khoak a number of festivals were celebrated at all the chief sanctuaries of Osiris in Egypt, and that elaborate ceremonies were performed in them in commemoration of every event which took place in the life, death, and resurrection of the god. In this text the uses of the various sanctuaries are described, and detailed instructions are given for the making of the funeral chest, and the model of the god which was to be buried in the coffin, and of the incense, and the amulets, and of the fourteen divine members, and all the materials, etc. which were employed in the ceremonies. On the xiith day of Khoiak the Festival of the Ploughing of the Earth and the Festival of the Tena, were celebrated; on the xivth day the Great Festival of Pert ; on the xvith day the Festival of Osiris Khent Amenti; on the xxivth day the model of the god of the preceding year was taken out from its place and buried suitably, and the new Osiris was embalmed in the sanctuary; on the last day of the month the Tet was set in Tettu, because on this day the divine members of Osiris were brought. The new Osiris remained for seven days because of the tradition which declared that the god had remained for seven days in the womb of his mother Nut when she was with child.

In connection with the ceremonies in the great sanctuaries, e.g., Dendera, thirty-four papyrus boats were employed, and these were lit up with 365 lights [the days of the solar year], or lamps, The gods of Mendes, with Anubis, occupied one boat; the remaining twenty-nine boats were dedicated to the following gods: ---- Mestha, Hapi, Tuamutef, Qebh-Sennuf, Sah-heq, Armauai, Maa-tef-f, Ast-sen-ari-tcher, Sem, Her-a-f, Sent, Ari-maat-f-tchesef, Sebakhsen, Heqes, Neter-bah, Qetet, Khenti-heh-f, Aq-her-am-unnut-f, Netcheh-Netcheh, Asbu, Per-em-khet-khet, Er ta-nef-nebt, Tesher-matti, Khent-het-Anes, Maa-em-qerh, An-f-em-hru-seksek. The above facts prove that in the Ptolemaic period the views which were held generally about Osiris were substantially the same as those which were in vogue in the times when the Pyramid Texts were composed, and it is clear that the cult of Osiris was widespread even in the Vth Dynasty, or about B.C. 3500.

FORMS OF OSIRIS

From the Pyramid Texts we learn that the dead kings were already identified with Osiris, and that Osiris was identified with the sun-god, but we have no means of knowing when he was merged in Seker, the god of the Memphite Underworld. The Heliopolitian priests declared that he was the son of Seb and Nut, but it is much to be regretted that they did not preserve for us the genealogy of the god according to the priests of the predynastic period. The festivals which were celebrated in the month of Khoiak were, no doubt, founded upon very ancient tradition, but the elaboration of detail given in the texts as Dendera, to which reference has already been made, does not suggest a primitive antiquity, although it shows how deeply seated was the cult of Osiris in the hearts of the people. The numerous aspects under which the god was worshipped also show how that some of the original conceptions of the attributes of the god were forgotten in comparison to early days, both of the foreigners and Egyptians, and it is this fact which explains how he came to be identified with the sun and moon, and with the great creative and rejuvenescence, resurrection, and of life of every sort and kind which has the power of renewing itself.

We must now consider the various forms in which Osiris is represented on the monuments, and in papyri, etc. The common form of the god is that of a mummy, who wears a beard, and has the White Crown, and his head, and a menat, hanging from the back of his neck. In a scene reproduced by Lanzone he appears in a group with the Hawk-god Seker, the Beetle-god Kheprer, and the goddess Shent, and has two forms, i.e., Osiris, lord of Khut, and Khent Amenti, and. In another scene he appears in the form of the Tet pillar, and is called "Osiris Tet," and stands at the head of a bier, on which lies the god Seker in mummied form. On a stele at Turin Osiris appears in mummified form, seated, and holding in his hands the sceptre, and the flail or whip; on his head is the White Crown with plumes, to which the name Atef is usually given. His titles are "Osiris Khenti-Amentet, Un-nefer, lord of Tatcheser, the great god, king of the living." Behind him are seated Ptah-Sekri, "the lord of the hidden chest," Anpu, "dweller in the city of embalment," Horus, son Isis, and Hathor. As a form of Khnemu-Ra he has the head of a ram, the horns of which are surmounted by the solar disk and by four knives. A common symbol of the god is the box which contained the head and hair of Osiris and which was preserved at Abydos, where these relics were buried. Elsewhere we see the body of the god bent round backwards in such a way as to form the region of the Tuat or Underworld. Sometimes the god is seated on a throne, which is supported on the back of a monster serpent that rests on the top of the mythological flight of steps, at Henen-Su; he is accompanied by Maat, Horus, son of Isis, Thoth, Heka, who holds a serpent in each hand, and the snake-headed goddess Heptet. The exact part which last-named deity played in connection with Osiris is unknown, but it is certain that it was of considerable importance, and that the goddess assisted in bringing about his resurrection. Heptet has the body of a woman with the head of a bearded snake; on her head is a pair of horns which is surmounted by a solar disk, Atef Crown, and uraei with disks and horns, In each hand she holds a knife.

OSIRIS AS THE SOLAR AND MOON GOD

The god Osiris meant many different things to the ancient Egyptians. His rituals and myths have woven into them several threads from the sky, and these celestial connections linked the various aspects of Osiris together. We understand him best by understanding his celestial symbolism.

First and foremost, Osiris was the ruler of the dead. Depicted as a mummy, he presided over the judgment of souls and offered new life, through resurrection, to those who earned immortality by their proper conduct in this life. We need to take just a second and focus upon the Egyptian's belief in obedience to the Laws of God and personal righteous as necessary for inheriting Eternal Life. Notice also that one "earns" this gift of immortality. Osiris shows up, therefore, in numerous funerary papyri, in tomb paintings, on coffins, and on temple walls. Inscriptions identify him with a variety of titles, and they tell us he was much more than a god of the underworld and funeral rites. He was, as well, a god of kingship and the pharaoh's vitality, a personification of the land's fertility, the spirit or force of the cycle of vegetation, a god of life-sustaining water, and, in fact, the Nile itself. His most appropriate title is "Lord of Everything." He was also the sun, the moon, and the stars of Orion.

OSIRIS AS THE SOLAR GOD

The myth of Osiris involves his own death and resurrection, a theme that echoes the daily cycle of the sun's death at sunset and its rebirth at dawn. In this aspect Osiris was a personification of the sun in both its rising and setting and therefore interpreted as "death and rebirth." Osiris was the pattern of this cycle of "death and rebirth." As ruler of the dead, Osiris was "First of the Westerners;" a term referring to those who dies in the "west" with the sun only to be reborn in the "east" with the next days rising of the sun. As a vegetation god Osiris was again a picture of the cycle of "life, death, and rebirth" as seen in Mother Nature.

A fertility ceremony, recorded on the walls at Dendera, 417 miles upriver from Cairo, involved Osiris and 365 lighted lamps. Certainly this refers to the annual cycle of 365¼ days and links Osiris with the solar year. His temples were said to be surrounded by 365 trees, planted in his honor.

OSIRIS AS THE MOON GOD

Osiris is connected even more closely to the moon, but to see how, we have to know his myth. There is no single source for it, but numerous partial versions exist, preserved from many different eras of Egyptian civilization. Plutarch, the Greek historian and biographer, collected material from Egyptian sources in the first century after Christ and retold the story of Osiris in his treatise, On Isis and Osiris. Despite the late date of this composition, many traditions of considerable antiquity seem to be preserved. At least parts of Plutarch's version are verified in the hieroglyphic inscriptions that remain.

Fathered by Geb, the earth, and born of Nut, the sky, Osiris became king of Egypt and brought civilization to the land and its people. He taught the people how to plant and harvest grain, how to lay out fields and measure their boundaries, and how to irrigate the land with canals and dams. Laws, religion, and urban life were all gifts of Osiris. He was Egypt's organizer and its spirit. He made Egypt what it was. Clearly, he is connected with order, and we should not be surprised to find him associated with the sky which portrayed God's order to mankind through its patterns and cycles observable to all.

Success in Egypt made a missionary out of Osiris, but when he returned from his travels to his sister and consort, Isis, he was killed by conspirators led by his brother, Set. Set was a troublesome figure among the Egyptian gods. He was associated with the northern stars of the Big Dipper-what the Egyptians called the constellation of Meskhetiu, the "bull's leg and haunch." As the adversary of Osiris, Set stood for sterility, the desert, mindless force, and violence. In the Osirian cycle, Set is the personification of chaos.

At a banquet, Set and his co-conspirators tricked Osiris into reclining inside a box, built like a coffin, exactly to his measure. Swarming around him, they closed the lid, nailed it down, and dumped it in the Nile. According to Plutarch, Osiris was slain-suffocated in the box-on the seventeenth day of the month of Athyr, when the sun was in Scorpius, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign.

The numbers are significant. Although the moon completes its phases in 29½ days, the number 28 was used symbolically for this interval. And an intricate logic links the moon with the Nile through the number 28. At Aswan, the traditional southern limit of Egypt, a nilometer measured the height of the river's maximum rise as 28 cubits. This peak occurred in the fall, in the month of Athyr, just as the Nile was about to decline. Osiris was slain on the seventeenth day of Athyr. Full moon was counted as the month's fifteenth day, but the moon looks full the day before and the day after. By day 17, it is obvious the moon has started to wane. So, the death of Osiris marked the "death," or fall, of the Nile from its annual flood height and coincided with the day of the moon's monthly "death." Osiris, the god of the Nile and Egypt's life, was a moon god because the river, the land, and the moon wax and wane, cycle after cycle.

Other lunar symbolism also threads through the Osiris myth. His casket floated downstream, out of the Nile, into the Mediterranean. Isis followed it, found his body at Byblos, in Syria, and carried it back to Egypt. Although unable to revive him, she managed through magic to conceive a child by him. She hid his body in the thickets of the Delta marshes and nursed, in secret, the newborn son of Osiris. One night, while hunting by moonlight, Set chanced upon the body of Osiris. He tore it into 14 parts and scattered them up and down the Nile. Once again Isis set out to retrieve the body of her husband, now dismembered and dispersed throughout the land. With patience and perseverance she sought the far-flung parts of Osiris; all but his sexual member were retrieved. The symbol of his vitality remained lost in the Nile.

The 14 pieces of the body of Osiris sound like the 14 days of the waning, or "dying" moon, and on the main ceiling of the Dendera temple are inscriptions and pictorial reliefs that leave no doubt. In one panel, an eye, installed in a disk, is transported in a boat. The eye, we know, was a symbol of the sun or moon. Thoth, the ibis-headed scribe god of wisdom and knowledge, pilots the barge. Thoth was closely associated with the moon and counted the days and seasons. The text for this panel refers to the period after full moon, and 14 gods accompany the eye in the disk.

Next to the portrayal of the waning moon, another carved panel represents the 14 days of the waxing moon. A staircase with 14 steps, a god on each, leads up to the same eye and disk, and hieroglyphics verify the god's association with days of the growing moon. Osiris, it is written, is "luminous," as the god of the moon.

Finally, a third, adjacent panel shows Osiris in a boat with Isis and her sister Nephthys. Goddesses of the four cardinal directions support the sign of heaven, on which the boat floats, and the inscription says Osiris is the moon.

The myth of Osiris continues with his resurrection. Isis embalmed and mummified him, and through her help he was restored to everlasting life. In numerous tombs and temples this aspect of his myth is incorporated into one more celestial identity-the constellation Orion. Orion and Sirius, the night's counterpart to Isis, are often shown sailing in celestial boats, usually with Orion in the lead looking back at his wife, who follows him in the nightly journey from east to west.

The sky is the pattern for the rest of the myth as well. Just as the dead Osiris floated out of Egypt, followed by Isis, Orion eventually leaves the nighttime sky, followed by Sirius a little later.

Sirius was the key calibrator of the Egyptian calendar. The earth's orbital motion eventually puts the sun in the same direction as Sirius, and even the night's brightest star is lost in the glare of day. After disappearing from the night sky, however, Sirius eventually reappears in the dawn, before the sun comes up. The first time this occurs each year is called the star's heliacal rising, and on this day Sirius remains visible for only a short time before the sky gets too bright to see it. In ancient Egypt this annual reappearance of Sirius fell close to the summer solstice and coincided with the time of the Nile's inundation. Isis, as Sirius, was "the mistress of the year's beginning," for the Egyptian new year was set by this event. New Year's ceremony texts at Dendera say Isis coaxes out the Nile and causes it to swell. The metaphor is astronomical, hydraulical, and sexual, and it parallels the function of Isis in the myth. Sirius revives the Nile just as Isis revived Osiris. Her time in hiding from Set is when Sirius is gone from the night sky. She gives birth to her son Horus, as Sirius gives birth to the new year, and in texts Horus and the new year are equated. She is the vehicle for renewal of life and order. Shining for a moment, one morning in summer, she stimulates the Nile and starts the year,

In Egypt, Orion, like Sirius, is absent from the night sky for 70 days. This period is equated with the time Osiris spent in the transitional underworld. It is also equal to the stipulated period for the process of mummification. Orion's heliacal rising occurred a few weeks before the reappearance of Sirius and the Nile flood. Egyptian agriculture depended on the Nile. Without the river there would be no Egypt-only desert, the sterile domain of Set. With the summer's flood, life and water returned to the soil. Seeds were planted and nourished by the Nile. For Egyptians, the three seasons of farming and the seasons of the Nile were the same, and they named them accordingly. Each marked an important change in the landscape: Inundation, Emergence, and Low Water. There is a simple cycle here-birth, growth, death-and, with the next annual flood and new year, rebirth. This cycle is the essence of Egypt. It is paralleled by the myth. It is played out in the sky.

What we see in the lights overhead is the itinerary of cosmic order. Because it governs everything, it is reflected in the entire world. It is the core of our consciousness. It defines what is sacred and makes the sky the domain of gods.

THE OSIRIS MYTH AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO THE CHANGING OF THE SEASONS

As we have enumerated elsewhere the Osiris myth was first taken from the Egyptian Priest's observations of the Heavens and its correlations to Mother Nature. The study of the Osiris myths in relationship to the corresponding changing of the seasons provides, in a human narrative, the message of God as understood by the Ancients. This message was expressed through the Osiris myth as it related to the changing of the seasons: Birth, Live, Death, and Rebirth. This cyclical message was spoken by God over and over again both in the Heavens, in Nature, and in our bodies as well. Truly the Ancients understood that man was made in the image of God and as we approach such a study it is important to remember that this message was understood allegorically and not literally. Sadly we have lost this understanding today and apply such beliefs literally to Jesus when they were only understood by the Ancients who coined them in an allegorical fashion. Let us study the equinoxes and solstices and follow the Osiris story as it evolves from season to season and recover the true meanings behind the Osiris myth.

UNDERSTANDING THE SOLAR BIRTH CYCLE

In the prior articles we have laid the foundation for the direction of this study. It is time now to examine the facts that all of the ancient saviors of the Gentile sun-worshipping nation were alleged to have been born on December 25.

If we are to fully understand why Dec. 25th was chosen as the date for the birth of the sun-gods then we must attain some understanding of the Transit Cycles of the Sun.

THE SOLAR CYCLES

In astronomy/astrology, the beginning of cycles, that is to say, the Conception of a cycle is determined by a Conjunction, the point where elements of the universe Intersect, or Pivot, or Join, or Come together, or Cross paths, or Occult each other.

The moon cycle begins at the new moon, the point at which the path of the moon around the earth intersects between the sun and the earth. This point of Conjunction commences a new moon cycle.

The Summer cycle (Summer Solstice) begins when the Sun reaches it's highest point in the celestial heavens at 23 1/2 degrees north declination, and pivots so as to retreat southward toward it's Fall. Thus, a Pivotal point commences a new cycle.

The Fall Cycle (Autumn Equinox) begins when the ecliptic of the sun crosses the celestial equator in the west. This point of intersection is the Genesis for fall type weather, a seasonal change. Thus this Crossing commences a new cycle.

The Winter Cycle (Winter Solstice) takes control when the sun bottoms out at it's lowest point south of the celestial equator and pivots so as to return to it's former position. Thus, the struggle of the sun to regain that (position) which was lost is the dawn of a new cycle.

The Spring Cycle (Spring Equinox/Vernal Equinox) the point and time at which the ecliptic of the Sun intersects the celestial equator (at the Vernal Equinox).

THE MOST IMPORTANT CYCLE OF THEM ALL

The most important Solar Cycle for the ancients was the cycle of the new year or the Spring Cycle (Vernal Equinox). The point and time at which the ecliptic of the Sun intersects the celestial equator at the Vernal Equinox. Following this day when the day has equal light and darkness then the sun begins its northward travels above the celestial equator and the daylight gets longer along with higher temperatures. Summer is on it way.

This date March 21, was traditionally the commencement of the New Year. In ancient times, as well as today, they celebrated the victory of the Sun over the forces of the nether world, the Sun' emergence into it's glory by defeating the powers of the great Typhon, that evil serpent that lurked and prowled in the perilous celestial waters, beneath the celestial equator. Until the Sun won its fight over darkness then winter had prevailed along with the cold and the lack of crops and food. Man's life was threatened and many died because of the Devil (Darkness was Evil; D-Evil; DEvil or the Devil). This mythological battle between light and darkness, the Sun verses the Darkness, was personified into various stories consisting of battles between forces of evil and darkness and light. Typhon was just one of many. The Devil fighting God is one that today's Christianity is concerned with while most of these other mythological battles have fallen into disuse. But the popularity of Christianity has ensured the survival of the Devil and his fight against the God of light.

This point of crossing of the Sun of the celestial equator in its travels northward at the vernal equinox was the forecaster of new life, of Spring, fresh vegetation, greenery and relief from the oppressions of winter. It was the time , or beginning of the time (season) to plant new seed under the bosom of the earth, to Impregnate her, so that she may bring forth new life in her time. The Sun was rising higher in the sky and the temperatures were warming up and the daylight each day increasing.

But not only did man Impregnate the soil of the earth by implanting her with his seed, the ancients surmised that the SUN, on this date of March 21, was indeed Impregnating the Cosmos with the Seed of Life for a New Sun, an Heir to His Throne of Glory.

On this date, March 21 (the beginning of spring at the Vernal/Spring Equinox), the ancients saw (perceived) the celestial Sun (a symbol for God the Father) Impregnating the Cosmos (Virgin Mother) with the Sperm of Life (Rejuvenating Element) that would one day produce a New Sun (the Sun was the ancient's Savior, A Christ) to replace and Renew the Kingdom of the Sun, once this present Sun's time had passed.

In these myths the Sun was often personified as a "Son" of the Sun. This prophesied Son of God (in the form of the personification of the Sun) whose Egg of Life was Fertilized at the Vernal Equinox of March 21, when his Father (the Sun, it's ecliptic), in all his Glory Conjugated or connected with the celestial equator. Primitive man saw in this the Sun impregnating the Virgin Mother Earth with it's life and sperm. If you followed me up to now then understand that this date, March 21 (the times of the Spring/Vernal Equinox when the earth's path around the Sun [elliptic] is intersected with the celestial equator of the Earth] is the beginning of spring) and as such marked the commencement of the period of Gestation for the future Savior (Sun) of the World.

GESTATION....OF THE SUN AND THE SON

The term "gestation" refers to the carrying of young in the uterus and likewise carries the idea of conception and development of the fetus to birth. We know that human gestation last for 280 days and so it is also, with the Sun God. The period of Gestation for the Macrocosm (Celestial Sun-God) is the same as his Microcosm (Created Image) of the Son Of God, as well as the human species in total. Let me explain.

Let us count the days leading from March 21, (the vernal equinox where the sun connects with the celestial equator of the Earth in its ecliptical path) to see where 280 days will take us - 11 days (Including March 21) brings us to the end of March, now we must add 30 days for April, 31 for May, 30 for June, 31 for July, 31 for August, 30 for September, 31 for October, 30 for November, and let's try 25 for December. That adds up to 280 days! There is 280 days from the Spring/Vernal Equinox where the Sun impregnates the Earth when it intersects the Earth's celestial equator in its path above the equator moving to spring and summer until December 25th!

In mankind the ancients knew that gestation of a baby was 280 days. Most people think that human pregnancy lasts for 9 months, but that is an approximation. If you will take the time to check your encyclopedia or medical book then you will discover that the actual time of gestation for the human species is 280 days. The ancients noticed the same correlation in the Heavens. Truly mankind knew that he was created in the image of the only God he knew; the God of the Heavens. Now, we can easily see how all the personified gods and god-men and solar-saviors were born on December 25th, right on time, 3 days after the winter solstice, at the stroke of midnight on December 25th. This is taught by the supposed inspired, infallible, and inerrant New Testament and applied to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua as well.

Answer for yourself: Seeing how the ancients arrived at Dec. 25 as the birthday of their solar gods then how likely is it that Jesus was born on the same day?

Answer for yourself: Now is there any doubt that the prophecy of the birth of a Coming Savior was Astronomical, in Origin as found in the Bible? Most likely you need more proof and the pages that follow as well as our other website exposing the paganization of Jesus and the astro-theology behind the Christ Myth will beyond any doubt prove our point.

The ancient Sages personified (gave human names and characteristics) to the elements of the Cosmos, in order to produce a Theology (Mythology) that was intellectually compatible to every level of human society, preservable throughout history, because of it's Esoteric quality, and soundly based on Natural (Godly) Truth. Sadly today these allegories which often expressed Divine Truth have been soundly misunderstood and taught as if they were literal and applied to a Jewish Rabbi names Yeshua. In so doing not only Jesus but the Jewish Messiah has become God Himself which is the outright idolatrous and blasphemous.

More to follow.

A DEEPER UNDERSTANDING OF THE EQUINOXES AND SOLSTICES

Spring Equinox

March 19-21

Northern Hemisphere

The Spring or Vernal Equinox, is when the equator is in the direct path of the sun, day and night are of equal length, North and South Poles receive equal light, thus the name equinox. It is a time of rebirth, an awakening of the earth, a time to plant, new beginnings. Understand that it has both an "astral" and an "agricultural" meaning associated with it. This is applied to Osiris by the ancients in shaping the Osiris myth and we find this in the evolution of the Osiris belief in the later mystery cults and their gods and godmen.

In many cultures New Years Day was traditionally in late March. Most of the Roman republic and Medieval Europe celebrated New Years in March. It was not until 1582 and the institution of the Gregorian calendar that January 1st became the date to begin a New Year in the Western world.

Festivals and rites, a time to celebrate the renewal of life, generally preceded by a period of fasting. The Babylonians celebrated Akitu at the spring equinox. Ostara, German Goddess of Fertility, and Eostre, Saxon Goddess of Fertility, both represent the awakening of the earth. Christians celebrate Easter, the resurrection of godman called the "Christ."

The Jewish people, being on a lunar calendar, prior to Equinox celebrate Purim, a festival mainly for children. It is a time when even the strictest Orthodox sects allow some foolishness and merriment to reign. The Celtic tradition has the April Fool, a holdover from the 'Great Fool', Dalua, the Green Man of the spring festival. According to Aleister Crowley "The Green Man is a personification of the mysterious influence that produces the phenomena of spring . . .The world is always looking for a saviour . . ." Parsifal is such a figure in the opera by Wagner, but the tale is much older, from ancient Pagan Druid and Nordic mythology.

Festivals occurring around the Spring Equinox are the Festival of Trees, Alban Eilir, Passover, Rites of Eostre, Easter, Ostara, Rites of Spring, Holikadehan, Lent, Buddha's birthday, St.Patrick's Day, and April Fools Day.

Many, perhaps most, Pagan religions in the Mediterranean area had a major seasonal day of religious celebration at or following the Spring Equinox. Cybele, the Phrygian fertility goddess, had a fictional consort who was believed to have been born via a virgin birth. He was Attis, who was believed to have died and been resurrected each year during the period Mar. 22 to Mar. 25. About 200 B.C. mystery cults began to appear in Rome just as they had earlier in Greece. Most notable was the Cybele cult centered on Vatican hill...Associated with the Cybele cult was that of her lover, Attis ([the older Tammuz, Osiris, Dionysus, or Orpheus under a new name). He was a god of ever-reviving vegetation. Born of a virgin, he died and was reborn annually. The festival began as a day of blood on Black Friday and culminated after three days in a day of rejoicing over the resurrection. This 3 day celebration of new birth was connected with the birth of the Sun from the dead the winter solstice where the sun lied motionless in the sky for 3 days but yet celebrated in the spring with the new greenery of the season which typified "new life" from death.

Wherever Christian worship of Jesus and Pagan worship of Attis were active in the same geographical area in ancient times, Christians used to celebrate the death and resurrection of Jesus on the same date; and pagans and Christians used to quarrel bitterly about which of their gods was the true prototype and which the imitation.

Many religious historians believe that the death and resurrection legends were first associated with Attis, many centuries before the birth of Jesus. They were simply grafted onto stories of Jesus' life in order to make Christian theology more acceptable to Pagans. Ancient Christians had an alternate explanation; they claimed, when exposed by non-Christians who called their hand on such plagarism, suggtested that Satan had created counterfeit deities in advance of the coming of Christ in order to confuse humanity.

Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread were observed by the ancient Israelites early in each new year. The Jewish people followed the Persian/Babylonian calendar and started each year with the Spring Equinox circa Mar. 21. The name Passover was derived from the actions of the angel of death as described in the book of Exodus. The angel 'passed over' the homes of the Jews which were marked with the blood obtained from a ritual animal sacrifice. The same angel exterminated the first born son of every family whose doorway was not so marked - perhaps the greatest act of genocide mentioned in the Bible following the killing of infants, children, men and women in Sodom.

The ancients gathered different colored eggs from a variety of birds. These eggs were then used as amulets for fertility, prosperity, and protection. Ostara were the hare (rabbit) and the egg. Both represented fertility. From these, we have inherited the customs and symbols of the Easter egg and Easter rabbit. Dyed eggs also formed part of the rituals of the Babylonian mystery religions. Eggs were sacred to many ancient civilizations and formed an integral part of religious ceremonies in Egypt and the Orient. Dyed eggs were hung in Egyptian temples, and the egg was regarded as the emblem of regenerative life proceeding from the mouth of the great Egyptian god.

Easter Sunrise Service: This custom can be traced back to the ancient Pagan custom of welcoming the sun God at the vernal equinox - when daytime is about to exceed the length of the nighttime. It was a time to celebrate the return of life and reproduction to animal and plant life as well.

Lastly we all know of spring cleaning which was also associated with the Spring Equninox and "new beginnings."

Summer Solstice

June 20-22

Northern Hemisphere

Summer Solstise is when the North Pole is pointed most toward the sun, the longest day and shortest night. The Summer Solstice, Midsummer, is linked with fertility and sexuality. June is the most popular wedding month.

6,000 years ago, people began to form into groups or communities. Food, clothing, and shelter were essential. Man learned that certain foods grew during certain times of the year - the solar year. So keeping tract of time became necessary in order to know when to plant and when to harvest. The time and season of the migration of animals became equally important. When the work was done and things went well, people celebrated (early holidays). Many of the ways (traditions) we celebrate during holidays can be traced back to early civilization. Not many solar holidays were celebrated at this time. (1) People were busy working the fields (2) People knew that for the next six months, daylight would be less and less each day (3) As stated before, this was a time for fertility and sexuality. Work and mating occupied most of the people's time.

Autumn Equinox

September 20-23

Northern Hemisphere

The Autumn Equinox, is when the equator is in the direct path of the sun, day and night are of equal length, North and South Poles receive equal light, thus the name equinox. It is a time of harvest and getting ready for Winter. The Autumn Equinox is when the grapes are fermented and wine is made, a time to butcher weak livestock (which will not make it through the Winter),

Festivals occurring around the Autumn Equinox are Mabon, Festival of Dionysus, Fest of Michaelmas, Wine Harvest, Cornucopia, Feast of Avalon, Rosh Hashanah/Yom Kippur, and Alban Elfed

We also see the German harvest festival - Octoberfest - two weeks through the First Sunday in October. Observed with food, beer, music, and dance.

Last, but not least we find the Jewish celebration of Sukkoth -the Jewish harvest festival and time for giving thanks.

Winter Solstice

December 22-24

Northern Hemisphere

The Winter Solstise is when the North Pole is at it's furthest point away from the sun, the shortest day and longest night.

Festivals connected with the Winter Solsctice include Festivals of the Sun's rebirth (days increasing in daylight), Koleda, Day of Hathor, Laurentina, Kutuja, Chaomos, Hanukkah, Kwanzaa, Junkanoo, Yule, and Christmas.

Solstice rites are one of our oldest celebrations, dating back to the dawn of modern civilization some 30,000 years ago. For ancient peoples, the winter solstice was an awesome, mysterious, and powerful phenomenon. Those of us today who have ever pondered the ramifications of a cataclysmic event such as a "nuclear winter" or the aftermath of a giant meteor impact can understand how frightening it must have been to see the sun slip away every fall. Harsh winter conditions and scare food supplies made survival risky. Vegetation was dormant, migratory birds had long since disappeared to warmer climates, and many animals had vanished into hibernation. As the weeks drew closer to the solstice, it was a time of anxiety over ever-darkening days. What if the sun lost its vigor and never came back? Would light and warmth simply fade away forever? Would the earth be wrapped in eternal night and cold?

Early peoples, living at the mercy of a hostile environment- and also highly sensitive to natural phenomena-held supplicating rites to the forces of nature as a way of ensuring the return of longer, warmer days. To early cultures, the winter solstice represented the death of the old solar year and the birth of the new. Yule festivities, accordingly, marked this planetary turning point away from darkness and the blessed return to light. And although the comforts of today's modern civilization now shield us from winter's harsh effects, Western cultures continue-knowingly or unknowingly-to honor this tradition through Yule celebrations.

Interestingly, Christmas (and its attendant holiday, Easter) actually have roots in ancient beliefs going back tens of thousands of years. Many folk holidays and celebrations were absorbed into Christian culture in the early days of Christianity to make the new religion more acceptable. There was no consensus among early Church fathers over the date to use for Christ's birth. In fact, as devout Christians know, there is no certain date for the birth of Christ. A December festival to celebrate the birth of Christ didn't exist until the fourth century when Christians simply adopted the popular Yule celebrations for their own use. Roman churchmen favored the Mithraic winter solstice festival, which they themselves had adopted from the Persians which is called the Birthday of the Unconquered Sun. On the old Roman calendar, December 25 (not December 21 because the sun only began its northward journey once again in the heavens on this day after motionless 3 days in the sky) was the date of the winter solstice. The winter solstice was also the traditional date to honor the birth of the pagan Divine Child, and Norsemen celebrated the birthday of their lord, Frey, at the winter solstice. After much argument, Pope Julius selected December 25 as Christ's Mass, or Christmas, in 350 A.D.-in part to counter persistent pagan solstice rites, but also because people of the time were already used to calling it a god's birthday. This proclamation was not without objection, however. The date was so controversial that eastern churches refused to honor it for another hundred years, and the church of Jerusalem ignored the date until the 7th century. And in an interesting twist, the fifth-century Bishop of Constantinople firmly believed December 25 was selected so Christians could celebrate Christ's birthday undisturbed while "the heathen were busy with their profane ceremonies"!

Even today, pagan and Christian belief is intermingled with Christmas celebration. Many traditions that are now a part of the mainstream Christian culture actually come from ancient pagan celebrations-rites such as decorating with evergreens, hanging ornaments on a tree, partaking of sweet confections, processions, gift giving, wassailing or singing carols, and the burning of the yule log.

Solstice Traditions Winter solstice observances were held by virtually every culture in the world. Solstice rites were practiced among such diverse groups as Native South Americans, Celts, Persians, Orientals, and Africans. Solstice was known as Sacaea to the Mesopotamians, as the Festival of Kronos to the ancient Greeks, and as Saturnalia to the Romans. According to Norse traditions, the Valkyrie looked for souls to bring to Valhalla during Yule. Norwegians abstained from hunting or fishing for the twelve days during Yule as a way of letting the weary world rest and to hasten the revived sun's appearance. In old Russia it was traditional to toss grain upon the doorways where carolers visited as a way of keeping the house from want throughout the rest of the winter. Ashes from the Yule log were mixed with cows' feed in France and Germany to promote the animals' health and help them calve. In Baltic regions today, corn is scattered near the door of the house for sustenance and ashes of the Yule log are given to fruit trees to increase their yield. Romanians bless the trees of the orchard on Yule with sweetened dough to bring good harvests. Serbs toss wheat on the burning Yule log to increase livestock bounty.

The most significant Yule tradition to persist over the centuries is the Christmas tree. Although the origin of the Christmas tree is generally ascribed to Martin Luther, its beginnings actually go back to pre-Christian times. Christmas trees are thought to have evolved from the rite of symbolically selecting and harvesting a "sacred tree," a practice found in many ancient cultures. Evergreens and firs were sacred to early peoples, including the ancient Greeks, Celts, and Germans. The first Yule trees were born when pagans went into the forests during the winter solstice to give offerings to evergreens. Pines and firs remained green while other vegetation lost their leaves and appeared lifeless during the bitter winter cold. Their mysterious survival and vigor seemed to signify a life force within which carried with it the hope of renewed life that was hoped for and expected in the Spring at the Vernal Equinox.

The pinea silva or sacred pine groves that were attached to pagan Roman temples also pre-figured the Christmas tree. On the night before a holy day, Roman priests called "tree- bearers" cut one of the sacred pines, decorated it, and carried it into the temple. In fact, the German word for Christmas tree is not Kristenbaum, or Christmas tree, but Tannenbaum, or sacred tree.

Church leaders from the early centuries of the Church all the way through Puritan society in 17th century Massachusetts condemned the custom of bringing decorated evergreens into the home at Yule time. The custom was so beloved and persistent, however, that repeated attempts to eradicate 'heathen' practices ultimately failed-and now these pagan traditions, which largely celebrate nature, are among the most treasured elements of the season.

Decorating the tree with objects resembling fruits, nuts, berries, and even flowers is thought to be a symbolic act designed to bring about the return of summer's bounty. In this way early cultures hoped to hurry the return of spring, and ensure survival through the rest of the harsh winter months.

Christmas wreaths are also ancient, and were traditionally made of evergreens, holly, and ivy. The wreath's circle symbolizes the wheel of the year and the completion of another cycle. Holly represents the female element; ivy represents the male. Like evergreens, holly was believed to contain a mysterious life force because it bore berries in the middle of winter. Both holly and ivy were thought to have magical properties, and were used as protection against negative elements.

Kissing under the mistletoe is an old Druid tradition. Mistletoe was considered highly sacred by this culture because, as a parasitic kind of vegetation, it never touched the earth (growing instead on oaks and other trees), and also because it bore berries in winter when everything else appeared dead. Druids gathered the leaves and berries from special oaks with sickles made of gold. They called mistletoe "all-heal" because they felt it had the power of protection against illness and bad events, and also because they believed mistletoe spread goodwill. Legend has it that enemies meeting under the mistletoe cast their weapons aside, greeted each other amicably, and honored a temporary truce. White linen clothes were spread beneath the mistletoe as it was being gathered so none of it would touch the ground, lest its power be accidentally released back to the earth. Mistletoe berries were considered to be a powerful fertility substance. A kiss under the mistletoe meant love and the promise of marriage. Standing under a sprig of mistletoe sometimes subjected a person to more than just a kiss.

Burning the Yule log is perhaps the oldest of all Yule traditions, possibly dating back eons. Since the winter solstice was a solar holiday, fire in different forms was closely associated with it. Fires and candles were lit during Yule to give the waning sun renewed power and vigor- and also surely to provide sources of cheery heat and light during the darkest part of the northern winter. Even the burning brandy on plum pudding symbolized the sun's rebirth. Traditionally the Yule log was made of oak; in northern European countries, the log was massive enough to burn for the entire twelve days of Yule. It was selected early in the year and set aside, then at winter solstice decorated with sprays of fir, evergreen, holly, ivy, or yew. A piece of the previous year's Yule log was used to light the new Yule log. Once the ashes were cold they were gathered into powerful amulets, or scattered throughout the garden and fields to ensure fertility and bounty in the coming year.

The spiritual ramifications of yule are profound for both neo-pagans and Christians. For Christians, the birth of Christ means a turning point between eternal death and eternal life. Devout Christians celebrate Christmas as the beginning of a new spiritual age of eternal life. For neo-pagans, Yule is also a time of spiritual beginnings. Jul, or Yule, is an old Anglo-Saxon word meaning "wheel." The winter solstice is the turning point in the natural cycle of the year. Because Yule signifies the completion of the wheel of the year, the period around the winter solstice is considered to be a good time for spiritual work. Some neo-pagans believe the dark nights of winter are when the veil between the spirit world and the living world is the thinnest. It is therefore an appropriate time for self-examination and meditation on hidden energies-both the energies lying dormant within the earth, and also those within ourselves. Yule traditions celebrate nature's renewal, and help affirm our connection to the energy and power of the earth and the cosmos.

SOLAR MYTHS...NATURE WORSHIP AND CHRISTIAN FESTIVALS

Well it is time to get our feet wet so to speak as we dig into the paganization of the faith of Yeshua.

To the ordinary public-notwithstanding the immense amount of work which has of late been done on this subject - the connection between Paganism and Christianity still seems rather remote. Indeed the common notion is that Christianity was really a miraculous interposition into and dislocation of the old order of the world; and that the pagan gods (as in Milton's Hymn on the Nativity) fled away in dismay before the sign of the Cross, and at the sound of the name of Jesus. Doubtless this was a view much encouraged by the early Church itself - if only to enhance its own authority and importance; yet, as is well known to every accomplished student of comparative religion, it is quite misleading and contrary to facts at hand. The unbiased facts of the matter is that main Christian doctrines and festivals, besides a great mass of affiliated legends and ceremonies, are really quite directly derived from, and related to, preceding Nature worships; and it has only been by a good deal of deliberate mystification and falsification that the facts concerning the origins of such Christians beliefs and rituals has been kept out of sight of most of Western Christianity.

In these Nature-worships there may be discerned three fairly independent streams of religious or quasi-religious enthusiasm:

- That connected with the phenomena of the heavens, the movements of the Sun, planets and stars, and the awe and wonderment they excited;
- That connected with the seasons and the very important matter of the growth of vegetation and food on the Earth; and
- That connected with the mysteries of Sex and reproduction.

THE INTERMINGLING OF ASTRO-THEOLOGY...NATURE WORSHIP...PHALLIC WORSHIP IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

It is obvious to the seasoned student of Christian origins that these three streams of though mingle and interfuse with each other a good deal; but as far as they were separable the first would tend to create Solar heroes and Sun-myths; the second Vegetation-gods and personifications of Nature and the earth-life; while the third would throw its glamour over the other two and contribute to the projection of deities or damons worshipped with all sorts of sexual and phallic rites. All three systems would of course have their special rites and times and ceremonies; but, as I say, the rites and ceremonies of one system would rarely be found pure and unmixed with those belonging to the two others. In other words Christianity is a synergistic faith of astro-theology, nature worship, and phallic worship as allegory is applied in a literal way to the depiction of Jesus in the New Testament. The whole subject is a very large one; but for reasons given in the previous introductory articles I shall in this and the following articles - while not ignoring phases connected with nature worship and phallic worship-lay most stress on astro-theology and it's relationship to the growing seasons and the phenomena of the heavens and the movement of the Sun, planets, and the stars and the awe and wonderment they excited before us.

IN AND BEFORE THE DAYS OF JESUS....

At the time of the life or recorded appearance of Jesus of Nazareth, and for some centuries before, the Mediterranean and neighboring world had been the scene of a vast number of pagan creeds and rituals. There were Temples without end dedicated to gods like Apollo or Dionysus among the Greeks, Hercules among the Romans, Mithra among the Persians, Adonis and Attis in Syria and Phrygia, Osiris and Isis and Horus in Egypt, Baal and Astarte among the Babylonians and Carthaginians, and so forth. Societies, large or small, united believers and the devout in the service or ceremonials connected with their respective deities, and in the creeds which they confessed concerning these deities. And an extraordinarily interesting fact, for us, is that notwithstanding great geographical distances and racial differences between the adherents of these various cults, as well as differences in the details of their religious services, the general outlines of their creeds and ceremonials were - if not identical - so markedly similar as we find them to astonish the student to the unbelievable similarities.

Answer for yourself: Why do you suppose that around the globe we find the same general pattern of pagan religious ritual and rites although separated by vast distances and racial guidelines? The answer is really simple; primitive man saw the same things in the heavens and in nature and the consciousness of mankind and his species reasoned on the same level similar thoughts about what he both saw and observed both in the heavens, nature, and in his own physical body. These observations were later personified and developed into various tales and legends concerning various characters and heroes specific to each's culture. Much later these same personifications of the Heavens and Nature were applied to Jesus in a literal way; first by the Essenes who converted to the Jesus Movement in Acts 6 and later by the Greek Fathers whom they instructed.

THE RECURRENT PATTERN OF PAGAN WORSHIP.....NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN...PARDON THE PUN

I cannot of course go at length into these different cults at this time, but I may say roughly that of all or nearly all the deities above-mentioned it was said and believed that:

- They were born on or very near our Christmas Day of December 25th
- They were born of a Virgin-Mother.
- They were born in a Cave or Underground Chamber.
- They led a life of toil for Mankind.
- And were called by the names of Light-bringer, Healer, Mediator, Saviour, Deliverer.
- They were however vanquished by the Powers of Darkness (Dark/Evil...or the D-Evil..the Devil)
- And descended into Hell or the Underworld for 3 days
- They rose again from the dead, and became the pioneers of mankind to the Heavenly world (revealed salvation to their followers)
- They founded Communions of Saints, and Fellowships (Churches) into which disciples were received by Baptism.
- And they were commemorated by Eucharistic meals in which their followers "ate their body" and "drank their blood"

Answer for yourself: On the surface does this not sound remotely like the Jesus story in the New Testament?

Connected with each event above is extensive theology and tenants of religious beliefs particular to Christianity; many of which are deemed necessary to be believed in order to be "saved" by Christianity. When one come to the knowledge of the origin of such Christian religious doctrines and dogmas and their pagan origins one cannot help be struck to the core of the ludicrousness of such beliefs foisted upon an unsuspecting people whose only fault is that turned to Christianity in their search for truth and God. More on that later.

LET US GIVE SOME EXAMPLES TO PROVE OUR POINT...THE JESUS STORY AS TOLD THOUSANDS OF YEARS BEFORE HIS TIME...OVER AND OVER AGAIN

In the following legends we find the mixture of Astro-theology, Nature worship, and Phallic worship as indicated in prior articles.

OSIRIS

Osiris was born (Plutarch tells us) on the 361st day of the year, say the 27th December. He too, like Mithra and Dionysus, was a great traveler. As King of Egypt he taught men civil arts, and "tamed them by music and gentleness, not by force of arms" (Plutarch, on Isis and Osiris); he was the discoverer of corn and wine. But he was betrayed by Typhon, the power of darkness, and slain and dismembered and the recombination of his body in resurrection lacked only his penis. "This happened," says Plutarch, "on the 17th of the month Athyr, when the sun enters into the Scorpion" (the sign of the Zodiac which indicates the oncoming of Winter and longer and darker days). His body was placed in a box, but afterwards, on the 19th, came again to life, and, as in the cults of Mithra, Dionysus, Adonis and others, so in the cult of Osiris, an image placed in a coffin was brought out before the worshipers and saluted with glad cries of "Osiris is risen" (Plutarch, on Isis and Osiris). "His sufferings, his death and his resurrection were enacted year by year in a great mystery-play at Abydos" (Ancient Art And Ritual, by Jane E. Harrison, chap. 1).

MITHRA

Mithra was born in a cave, and on the 25th December. The birthfeast of Mithra was held in Rome on the 8th day before the Kalends of January, being also the day of the Circassian games. which were sacred to the Sun. (See F. Nork, Der Mystagog, Leipzig.) He was born of a Virgin (Robertson, Pagan Christs, p. 338). He traveled far and wide as a teacher and illuminator of men. He slew the Bull (symbol of the gross Earth which the sunlight fructifles). His great festivals were the winter solstice (Christmas on Dec. 25th) and the Spring equinox (Easter). He had twelve companions or disciples (the twelve months as symbols of the Zodiac). He was buried in a tomb, from which however he rose again; and his resurrection was celebrated yearly with great rejoicings. He was called Saviour and Mediator, and sometimes figured as a Lamb; and sacramental feasts in remembrance of him were held by his followers. This legend is apparently partly astronomical and partly vegetational; and the same may be said of the following about Osiris.

The two following legends have more distinctly the character of Vegetation myths.

ADONIS/TAMMUZ

Adonis or Tammuz, the Syrian god of vegetation, was a very beautiful youth, born of a Virgin (Nature), and so beautiful that Venus and Proserpine (the goddesses of the Upper and Underworlds) both fell in love with him. To reconcile their claims it was agreed that he should spend half the year (summer) in the upper world, and the winter half with Proserpine below. He was killed by a boar (Typhon...symbol of darkness) in the autumn. And every year the maidens "wept for Adonis" (see Ezekiel 8:14). In the spring a festival of his resurrection was held-the women set out to seek him, and having found the supposed corpse placed it (a wooden image) in a coffin or hollow tree, and performed wild rites and lamentations, followed by even wilder rejoicings over his supposed resurrection. At Aphaca in the North of Syria, and halfway between Byblus and Baalbec, there was a famous grove and temple of Astarte, near which was a wild romantic gorge full of trees, the birthplace of a certain river Adonis-the water rushing from a Cavern, under lofty cliffs. Here (it was said) every year the youth Adonis was again wounded to death, and the river ran red with his blood, while the scarlet anemone bloomed among the cedars and the walnuts. A discorloration caused by red earth washed by rain from the mountains, and which has been observed by modern travelers accounts for the "red blood" in this legend. For the whole story of Adonis and of Attis see Frasier's Golden Bough, part IV.

ATTIS

The story of Attis is very similar. He was a fair young shepherd or herdsman of Phrygia, beloved by Cybele (or Demeter), the Mother of the gods. He was born of a Virgin -Nana-who conceived by putting a ripe almond or pomegranate in her bosom. He died, either killed by a boar, the symbol of winter, like Adonis, or self-castrated (like his own priests); and he bled to death at the foot of a pine tree (the pine and pine-cone being symbols of fertility). The sacrifice of his blood renewed the fertility of the earth, and in the ritual celebration of his death and resurrection his image was fastened to the trunk of a pine-tree (compare the Crucifixion). But I shall return to this legend presently. The worship of Attis became very widespread and much honored, and was ultimately incorporated with the established religion at Rome somewhere about the commencement of our Era.

The following two legends dealing with Hercules and with Krishna have rather more of the character of the solar, and less of the vegetational myth about them. Both heroes were regarded as great benefactors of humanity; but the former more on the material plane, and the latter on the spiritual.

Hercules or Heracles was, like other Sun-gods and benefactors of mankind, a great Traveler. He was known in many lands, and everywhere he was invoked as Saviour. He was miraculously conceived from a divine Father; even in the cradle he strangled two serpents sent to destroy him. His many labors for the good of the world were ultimately epitomized into twelve, symbolized by the signs of the Zodiac. He slew the Nemaean Lion and the Hydra (offspring of Typhon) and the Boar. He overcame the Cretan Bull, and cleaned out the Stables of Augeas; he conquered Death and, descending into Hades, brought Cerberus thence and ascended into Heaven. On all sides he was followed by the gratitude and the prayers of mortals.

As to Krishna, the Indian god, the points of agreement with the general. divine career indicated above are too salient to be overlooked, and too numerous to be fully recorded. He also was born of a Virgin (Devaki) and in a Cave (Cox's Myths Of The Aryan Nations, p. 107), and his birth announced by a Star. It was sought to destroy him, and for that purpose a massacre of infants was ordered. Everywhere he performed miracles, raising the dead, healing lepers, and the deaf and the blind, and championing the poor and oppressed. He had a beloved disciple, Arjuna, (cf. John) before whom he was transfigured (Bhagavat Gita, ch. xi). His death is differently related-as being shot by an arrow, or crucified on a tree. He descended into hell; and rose again from the dead, ascending into heaven in the sight of many people. He will return at the last day to be the judge of the quick and the dead.

Such are some of the legends concerning the pagan and pre-Christian deities-only briefly sketched now, in order that we may get something like a true perspective of the whole subject; but to most of them, and more in detail, I shall return as the argument proceeds.

WHAT SHOULD WE HAVE SEEN IN THESE BRIEF SKETCHES OF PAGAN GODS AND THEIR LEGENDS?

What we chiefly notice so far are two points:

- On the one hand the general similarity of these stories with that of Jesus Christ as depicted in the supposedly infallible and inerrant New Testament

- On the other their analogy with the yearly phenomena of Nature as illustrated by the course of the Sun in heaven and the changes of Vegetation on the earth through the various seasons of growth as influenced by the Sun itself

HOW HAS CHRISTIANITY...WHEN CALLED ON THE CARPET FOR COPYING PAGANISM BY THE PAGANS NO LESS...EXPLAINED SUCH SIMILARITIES AWAY OVER THE CENTURIES?

The similarity of these ancient pagan legends and beliefs with Christian traditions was indeed so great that it excited the attention and the undisguised wrath of the early Christian fathers when accused by Pagans that Christianity was little more than paganism "copied." They felt no doubt about the similarity, but not knowing how to explain it fell back upon the innocent theory that the Devil - in order to confound the Christians - had, centuries before, caused the pagans to adopt certain beliefs and practices! Very crafty, we may say, of the Devil (understood as the personification of darkness..the Dark - Evil...the D-Evil) but also very innocent of the Fathers to believe it!

Justin Martyr for instance in his I Apol. c. 66, describes the institution of the Lord's Supper as narrated in the Gospels, and then goes on to say: "Which the wicked devils have imitated in the mysteries of Mithra, commanding the same thing to be done. For, that bread and a cup of water are placed with certain incantations in the mystic rites of one who is being initiated you either know or can learn."

Tertullian also says in his De Praescriptione Hereticorum, c.40, De Bapt. c. 3 and his De Corona, c. 15 that "the devil by the mysteries of his idols imitates even the main part of the divine mysteries." . . . "He baptizes his worshippers in water and makes them believe that this purifies them from their crimes.." . . . "Mithra sets his mark on the forehead of his soldiers; he celebrates the oblation of bread: he offers an image of the resurrection, and presents at once the crown and the sword; he limits his chief priest to a single marriage; he even has his virgins and ascetics." If one would like references to both these examples see J. Robertson's Pagan Christs, p. 321-322).

What boggles the mind is what the Spanish Conquistadors found in the Americas upon their arrival. Cortez, too, it will be remembered complained that the Devil had positively taught to the Mexicans the same things which God had taught to Christendom. Such comment came after the monks arrived with Cortez to find that these Mexicans in the Americas had the same religion and similar doctrines and dogmas that these Catholic Christians were brining with them from Europe (crucified sun-godmen on crosses for example....all this from astro-theology). We will get into crucified godmen in just a few moments so bear with us.

Justin Martyr again, in his Dialogue with Trypho says that the Birth in the Stable was the prototype of the birth of Mithra in the Cave of Zoroastrianism; and boasts that Christ was born when the Sun takes its birth in the Augean Stable (the Zodiacal sign of Capricornus) coming as a second Hercules to cleanse a foul world; and St. Augustine says "we hold this (Christmas) day holy, not like the pagans because of the birth of the Sun, but because of the birth of him who made it." There are plenty of other instances in the Early Fathers of their indignant ascription of these similarities to the work of devils; but we need not dwell over them. There is no need for us to be indignant. On the contrary we can now see that these foolish explanations of these Christian writers are the evidence of how and to what extent in the spread of Christianity over the world it had become fused with the Pagan cults previously existing.

THE FIXING OF THE DATE OF JESUS BIRTH....IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE WINTER SOLSTICE

It was not till the year A.D. 530 or so-five centuries after the supposed birth of Christ-that a Scythian Monk, Dionysius Exiguus, an abbot and astronomer of Rome, was commissioned to fix the day and the year of that birth. A nice problem, considering the historical science of the period! For year he assigned the date which we now adopt (see Ency. Brit. art. "Chronology") and for day and month he adopted the 25th December -a date which had been in popular use since about 350 B.C., and the very date, within a day or two, of the supposed birth of the previous Sun-gods. There is however a difficulty in accepting the 25th December as the real date of the Nativity, December being the height of the rainy season in Judaea. when neither flocks nor shepherds could have been at night in the fields of Bethlehem"!. Encycl. Brit. art. "Christmas Day." According to Hastings's Encyclopedia, art. "Christmas," "Usener says that the Feast of the Nativity was held originally on the 6th January (the Epiphany), but in 353-354 the Pope Liberius displaced it to the 25th December . . . but there is no evidence of a Feast of the Nativity taking place at all, before the fourth century A.D." It was not till 534 A.D. that Christmas Day and Epiphany were reckoned by the law-courts as the official dates which are accepted to this very day by Christianity. It helps to know that the winter solstice is at this time when the three days of the longest darkness of the year are Dec. 22, 23, and 24; the sun lingering motionless in it's southern trek across the sky where it settles in its course across the sky in no lower position. Men reasoned that the Sun had died since the darkness triumphed over the light. Yet there is hope of salvation. It is on Dec. 25th that the sun begins to inch northward in the heavens one again with hope of darkness shrinking and light lengthening which brings with it the hope of spring time and summer time harvests which meant "life" and "food" to these primitive people. So we see the Sun on Dec. 25th was no longer submitted to darkness any longer but was raised from the D-Evil (dark/evil..the Devil after these 3 days of intense darkness) as it begins to ascend in it's travels across the sky once again. So the legends grew; the Sun had died and was raised in newness of life after 3 days. It is somewhat premature to get into this here but over time the Sun become the "Son" through it's personification as described in prior articles. This day of birth was Dec. 25 and known worldwide as the birthday of the Sun or Sun-godmen. There were many of them. Jesus was to be no exception. So we have in this example a perfect example of the fusion of Astro-theology and solar worship intermixed with Nature worship as applied to Jesus. I wish I could say that this was the only example of such in the New Testament but I cannot. Although this example is somewhat innocent many religious doctrines in Christianity that originate with such Astro-theology and Nature worship are anything but innocent and affect critical doctrines like atonement, the forgiveness of sin, idolatry, and blasphemy which we will eventually get to momentarily on this site.

From that fact alone we may fairly conclude that by the year 530 or earlier the existing Nature-worships had become largely fused into Christianity. In fact the dates of the main pagan religious festivals had by that time become so popular that Christianity was obliged to accommodate itself to them.

Let us look at some other examples in passing:

- The festival of John the Baptist in June took the place of the pagan midsummer festival of water and bathing
- The Assumption of the Virgin in August the place of that of Diana in the same month
- The festival of All Souls early in November, that of the world-wide pagan feasts of the dead and their ghosts at the same season.

SIMILARITIES BETWEEN CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS FESTIVALS AND NATURE WORSHIP

This brings us to the second point mentioned a few pages back - the analogy between the Christian festivals and the yearly phenomena of Nature in the Sun and the Vegetation that it promotes.

Let us take Christmas Day first. Mithra, as we have seen, was reported to have been born on the 25th December (which in the Julian Calendar was reckoned as the day of the Winter Solstice and of the Nativity of the Sun); Plutarch says (Isis and Osiris, c. 12) that Osiris was born on the 361st day of the year, when a Voice rang out proclaiming him Lord of All. Horus, he says, was born on the 362nd day (remember the three days of darkness and then the Sun's rising (birth or rebirth yearly) and longer daylight beginning on midnight of the 364th day....really being Dec. 25th). The same is said about Apollo as well.

Interesting questions that need to be answered:

- Why was all this..the births of Mithra, Apollo, Osiris and Horus at this time of year..the winter solstice? Was this coincidence? What about Jesus birth and it's dating?
- Why did the Druids at Yule Tide light roaring fires?
- Why was the cock supposed to crow all Christmas Eve ("The bird of dawning singeth all night long")?
- Why was Apollo born with only one hair (the young Sun with only one feeble ray)?
- Why did Samson (name derived from Shemesh, the sun) lose all his strength when he lost his hair?
- Why were so many of these gods -Mithra, Apollo, Krishna, Jesus, and others, born in caves or underground chambers (darkness)?

This same legend of gods (or idols) being born in caves has, curiously enough, been reported from Mexico, Guatemala, the Antilles, and other places in Central America (See C. F. P. von Martius, Ethnographic Amerika, etc. (Leipzig, I867), vol. 1, p. 758.

- Why, at the Easter Eve festival of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem is a light brought from the grave and communicated to the candles of thousands who wait outside, and who rush forth rejoicing to carry the new glory over the world (light emerging out of darkness)?

Compare the Aztec ceremonial of lighting a holy fire and communicating it to the multitude from the wounded breast of a human victim, celebrated every 52 years at the end of one cycle and the beginning of another-the constellation of the Pleiades being in the Zenith (Prescott's Conquest of Mexico, Bk. I, ch. 4).

Answer for yourself: Why indeed? The answer is simple. Older than all history and all written records has been the fear and wonderment of the children of men over the failure of the Sun's strength in Autumn - the decay of their God; and the anxiety lest by any means he should not revive or reappear.

Think for a moment of a time far back when there were absolutely no Almanacs or Calendars, either nicely printed or otherwise, when all that timid mortals could see was that their great source of Light and Warmth was daily failing, daily sinking lower in the sky. As everyone now knows there are about three weeks at the fag end of the year when the days are at their shortest and there is very little change.

Answer for yourself: What did primitive mankind reason when gazing into the heavens and seeing the occurrences in the heavens with the Sun sinking lower in the sky and light and warmth fading? What was happening?

The observance of natural phenomena was personified into stories unique to each culture who witnessed the same things in the heavens with the results bearing upon Mother Nature around them. Evidently the god had fallen upon evil times. Typhon, the prince of darkness, had betrayed him; Delilah, the queen of Night, had shorn his hair; the dreadful Boar had wounded him; Hercules was struggling with Death itself; be had fallen under the influence of those malign constellations - the Serpent and the Scorpion. Man wondered: "Would the god grow weaker and weaker, and finally succumb, or would he conquer after all?"

We can imagine the anxiety with which those early men and women watched for the first indication of a lengthening day (Dec. 25th); and the universal joy when the Priest (the representative of primitive science who was schooled in astronomy and astrology and understood such Heavenly happenings) having made some simple observations, announced from the Temple steps that the day was lengthening - that the Sun was really born again to a new and glorious career. It was such things as these which doubtless gave the Priesthood its power.

Let us look at the elementary science of those days a little closer.

Answer for yourself: How without Almanacs or Calendars could the day, or probable day, of the Sun's rebirth be fixed?

SOME EXAMPLES THAT PROVE OUR POINT

Go out next Christmas Evening, and at midnight you will see the brightest of the fixed stars, Sirius, blazing in the southern sky - not however due south from you, but somewhat to the left of the Meridian line. Some three thousand years ago (owing to the Precession of the Equinoxes) that star at the winter solstice did not stand at midnight where you now see it, but almost exactly on the meridian line (depending upon where you lived you might could see it above the horizon or it resided below the horizon and could not be seen). The coming of Sirius therefore to the meridian at midnight became the sign and assurance of the Sun having reached the very lowest point of his course, and therefore of having arrived at the moment of his re-birth. We need to understand that star gazing was often predictive of the later rising of the Sun and its' birth and this applies here.

Answer for yourself: Where then was the Sun at that moment?

Obviously in the underworld beneath our feet. Whatever views the ancients may have had about the shape of the earth, it was evident to the mass of people that the Sungod, after illuminating the world during the day, plunged down in the West, and remained during the hours of darkness in some cavern under the earth. Here he rested and after bathing in the great ocean of darkness renewed his garments before reappearing in the East next morning.

But in this long night of his greatest winter weakness, when all the world was hoping and praying for the renewal of his strength, it is evident that the new birth would come-if it came at all-at midnight. This then was the sacred hour when in the underworld (the Stable or the Cave or whatever it might be called) the child was born who was destined to be the Saviour of men; the Sun being the personified Savior of mankind for the reasons mentioned above. At that moment Sirius stood on the southern meridian (and in more southern lands than ours this would be more nearly overhead); and that star (Sirus) - there is little doubt - is the Star in the East mentioned in the Gospels. Let us not forget again that Sirius, when in those days rose to the meridian at midnight became the sign and assurance of the Sun having reached the very lowest point of his course, and therefore of having arrived at the moment of his re-birth.

To the right, as the supposed observer looks at Sirius on the midnight of Christmas Eve, stands the magnificent Orion, the mighty hunter, There are three stars in Orion's belt which, as is well known, lie in a straight line pointing to Sirius. They are not so bright as Sirius, but they are sufficiently bright to attract attention. A long tradition gives them the name of the Three Kings (thus the story of the three wise men who came to Jesus). These three stars were allegorized as "three kings" that attend the birth of the Sun; or the "Son" personified. This was later applied to the story of Jesus and when understood in a literal sense teaches untruths. This story is harmless but like I said other such literalizations of such personifications of Heavenly or Nature events lead to idolatry and blasphemy. We will get to them directly.

Immediately after Midnight then, on the 25th December, the Beloved Son personified (or Sun-god) is born. If we go back in thought to the period, some three thousand years ago, when at that moment of the heavenly birth Sirius, coming from the East, did actually stand on the Meridian, we shall come into touch with another curious astronomical coincidence. For at that same moment we shall see the Zodiacal constellation of the Virgin in the act of rising, and becoming visible in the East divided through the middle (her womb) by the line of the horizon...this division or intersection with her womb was understood as leading to the immaculate conception and later the virgin birth.

The constellation Virgo is a Y-shaped group, of which alpha, the star at the foot, is the well-known Spica, a star of the first magnitude. The other principal stars, gamma at the centre, and beta and epsilon at the extremities, are of the second magnitude. The whole resembles more a cup than the human figure; but when we remember the symbolic meaning of the cup, that seems to be an obvious explanation of the name Virgo, which the constellation has borne since the earliest times. [The three stars beta, gamma, and alpha lie very nearly on the Ecliptic, that is, the Sun's path -a fact to which we shall return presently.]

At the moment then when Sirius, the star from the East, by coming to the Meridian at midnight (after these three longest and dark days of the year as seen from yearly observations and just before Dec. 25th when the sun was seen year after year to begin it northward trek across the sky)....this star named Sirius signalled the forthcoming Sun's new birth the next day on Dec. 25th while the Virgin was seen just rising on the Eastern sky - the horizon line passing through her centre (her womb...the center of a woman being her midsection or reproductive organs). And many people think that this astronomical fact is the explanation of the very widespread legend of the Virgin-birth. I do not think that it is the sole explanation - for indeed in all or nearly all these cases the acceptance of a myth seems to depend not upon a single argument but upon the convergence of a number of meanings and reasons in the same symbol. Here we get into idolatry and blasphemy as such a teaching about Yeshua and a virgin birth removes him from the realm of normalcy and sets him up to be considered God like. This moves us to the verge of idolatry and blasphemy and coupled with other false teachings which were allegory taught as literal truth about Jesus then we fall smack dab into idolatry and blasphemy. But certainly the fact mentioned above is curious, and its importance is accentuated by the following considerations.

THE TEMPLE OF DENDERAH IN EGYPT

In the Temple of Denderah in Egypt, and on the inside of the dome, there is or was an elaborate circular representation of the Northern hemisphere of the sky and the Zodiac. Here Virgo the constellation is represented, as in our star-maps, by a woman with a spike of corn in her hand (Spica). Remember the birth of the Sun brings Spring and the crops; corn being one of them. But on the margin close by there is an annotating and explicatory figure - a figure of Isis with the infant Horns in her arms, and quite resembling in style the Christian Madonna and Child, except that she is sitting and the child is on her knee. This seems to show that-whatever other nations may have done in associating Virgo with Demeter, Ceres, Diana, etc.-the Egyptians made no doubt of the constellation's connection with Isis and Horus. For the harvest-festival of Diana, the Virgin, and her parallelism with the Virgin Mary, see The Golden Bough, vol. I, 14 and II, 121). Here we see the Jesus story in earliest antiquity; it has been repeated endlessly and lastly applied to Jesus as well..

But it is well known as a matter of history that the worship of Isis and Horus descended in the early Christian centuries to Alexandria, where it took the form of the worship of the Virgin Mary and the infant Saviour, and so passed into the European ceremonial. We have therefore the Virgin Mary connected by linear succession and descent with that remote Zodiacal cluster in the sky! Also it may be mentioned that on the Arabian and Persian globes of Abenezra and Abuazar a Virgin and Child are figured in connection with the same constellation.

A curious confirmation of the same astronomical connection is afforded by the Roman Catholic Calendar. For if this be consulted it will be found that the festival of the Assumption of the Virgin is placed on the 15th August, while the festival of the Birth of the Virgin is dated the 8th September. I have already pointed out that the stars, alpha, beta, and gamma of Virgo are almost exactly on the Ecliptic, or Sun's path through the sky; and a brief reference to the Zodiacal signs and the star-maps will show that the Sun each year enters the sign of Virgo about the first-mentioned date, and leaves it about the second date. At the present day the Zodiacal signs (owing to precession) have shifted some distance from the constellations of the same name. But at the time when the Zodiac was constituted and these names were given, the first date obviously would signalize the actual disappearance of the cluster Virgo in the Sun's rays - i.e.. the Assumption of the Virgin into the glory of the God where she/virgo could not be seen with the naked eye any longer - while the second date would signalize the reappearance of the constellation or the Birth of the Virgin. The Church of Notre Dame at Paris is supposed to be on the original site of a Temple of Isis; and it is said that one of the side entrances-that, namely, on the left in entering from the North (cloister) side-is figured with the signs of the Zodiac except that the sign Virgo is replaced by the figure of the Madonna and Child. So draw your own conclusion; coincidence or Sun-myth?

So strange is the scripture of the sky! Innumerable legends and customs connect the rebirth of the Sun with a Virgin birth. Dr. J. G. Frazer in his Part IV of The Golden Bough says: "If we may trust the evidence of an obscure scholiast the Greeks [in the worship of Mithras at Rome] used to celebrate the birth of the luminary by a midnight service, coming out of the inner shrines and crying, "The Virgin has brought forth! The light is waxing!" In Elie Reclus' little book Primitive Folk it is said of the Esquimaux that "On the longest night of the year two priests, of whom one is disguised as a woman, go from hut to hut extinguishing all the lights, rekindling them from a vestal flame, and crying out, "From the new sun cometh a new light!"

All this above-written on the Solar or Astronomical origins of the myths does not of course imply that the Vegetational origins must be denied or ignored. These latter were doubtless the earliest, but there is no reason - as said before - why the two elements should not to some extent have run side by side, or been fused with each other. In fact it is quite clear that they must have done so; and to separate them out too rigidly, or treat them as antagonistic, is a mistake. The Cave or Underworld in which the New Year is born is not only the place of the Sun's winter retirement, but also the hidden chamber beneath the Earth to which the dying Vegetation goes, and from which it re-arises in Spring. The amours of Adonis with Venus and Proserpine, the lovely goddesses of the upper and under worlds, or of Attis with Cybele, the blooming Earth-mother, are obvious vegetation-symbols; but they do not exclude the interpretation that Adonis (Adonai) may also figure as a Sun-god. The Zodiacal constellations of Aries (lamb/ram) and Taurus (bull) [to which we shall return presently] rule in heaven just when the Lamb and the Bull are in evidence on the earth; and the yearly sacrifice of those two animals and of the growing Corn for the good of mankind runs parallel with the drama of the sky, as it affects not only the said constellations but also Virgo (the Earth-mother who bears the sheaf of corn in her hand).

I shall therefore continue in the next articles to point out these astronomical references; many of which as I said previously are harmless and others not so harmless which when believed lead the uninformed believer into idolatry and blasphemy.

In closing I need to mention one more thing. Between Christmas Day and Easter there are several minor festivals or holy days:

- The 28th December (the Massacre of the Innocents),
- The 6th January (the Epiphany),
- The 2nd February (Candlemas Day),
- The period of Lent (German Lenz, the Spring),
- The Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin,

...and so forth-which have been commonly celebrated in the pagan cults before Christianity, and in which elements of Star and Nature worship can be traced; but to dwell on all these would take too long; so let us pass at once to the period of Easter itself. Concerning Candlemas day this is a festival of the Purification of the Virgin which corresponds with the old Roman festival of Juno Februata (i.e. purified) which was held in the last month (February) of the Roman year, and which included a candle procession of Ceres, searching for Proserpine. (F. Nork, Der Mystagog.)

So in this short presentation it is impossible to say that such accounts as applied to the Jesus of the New Testament are Divine and Unique Revelations; they are little more than Solar and Astro-theology coupled with Nature Worship as applied to Jesus...one more in a long line of Gentile godmen.

I wish I could say that these accounts above exhaust the plagiarism of paganism by Gentile Christianity...but I cannot as you will see in your further study on this website.

Shalom

THE WINTER SOLSTICE...THE RE-BIRTH OF THE SUN

Jer 10:2 2 Thus saith the LORD, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. (KJV)

The Winter Solstice is also known as Yule, Christmas, and Saturnalia, occurs in mid December.

It is when the ancients celebrated the birth of the new Solar year and the beginning of Winter. The Goddess manifests as the Great Mother and the God as the Sun Child (the pattern as applied to many personified gods and godmen as well as Jesus). The God also appears as Santa Claus and Old Man Winter. The colors connected with the Winter Solstice are Red, Green, and White. This is a festival of inner renewal.

Today, many people in Western-based cultures refer to this holiday as "Christmas." Yet a look into its origins of Christmas reveals its Pagan roots. Emperor Aurelian established December 25 as the birthday of the "Invincible Sun" in the third century as part of the Roman Winter Solstice celebrations. Shortly thereafter, in 273, the Christian church selected this day to represent the birthday of Jesus, and by 336, this Roman solar feast day was Christianized. January 6, celebrated as Epiphany in Christendom and linked with the visit of the Magi, was originally an Egyptian date for the Winter Solstice.

Most of the customs, lore, symbols, and rituals associated with "Christmas" actually are linked to Winter Solstice celebrations of ancient Pagan cultures. While Christian mythology is interwoven with contemporary observances of this holiday time, its Pagan nature is still strong and apparent.

Winter Solstice has been celebrated in cultures the world over for thousands of years. This start of the solar year is a celebration of Light and the rebirth of the Sun. In old Europe, it was known as Yule, from the Norse, Jul, meaning wheel.

Today, many people in Western-based cultures refer to this holiday as "Christmas." Yet a look into its origins of Christmas reveals its Pagan roots.

The primary, motivating factor that inspired early man to worship god, was his fear and dread of the potential fierceness of his environment. His (primitive man) major impetus for worshipping and sacrificing to the Sun God was to assure that the Sun God would continue protecting mankind from the ravages of the dreaded winter.

So for primitive man, the inception of winter, Dec. 22, was the worst day of every year for him. This day, Dec.

22 was the start of winter and marked the beginning of the worst stage of his yearly struggle for survival. This day, Dec. 22, is referred to by astronomers as the Winter Solstice. This word, Solstice, according to Webster's Dictionary means "to stand still, pause, a turning point." Primitive man even believed the Sun had died as he could detect no movement of the Sun in the sky for 3 days and and these 3 days were days having the shortest daylight of the year. This day, Dec. 22, the start of winter, was the harbinger of his potential perdition.

On Dec. 22 of each year, the Sun reached its Winter Solstice, the lowest point of the trajectory (angle of rays) of the entire year. After Dec. 22 (the turning point), the Sun again rises northward, which is a sign that summer shall come again!

Even though Dec. 22 marks the beginning of winter and the weather turns progressively worst from that point (Dec. 22) until the spring (March 21), all is not lost. Because the fact that the angle of the Sun's rays projecting on the earth, was moving progressively northward told early man that the warmth and comfort of the summer Sun would eventually prevail. But there was a period of doubt, for early primitive civilization. Primitive man did not understand our universe and solar system as we do today. We, today, know exactly what causes the four seasons of the year. But early man did not. He did not possess knowledge of our Solar System, the axis of the earth, its rotation and revolving around the Sun. He did not understand that these forces operated by a Natural, Providential Law, that would stay its course, no matter what. Early man only understood the result, not the cause. Because of this he would "reason" such events as best he could and these resulting "myths" would be handed down among mankind until Science would advance to replace such foolishness. The problem is that such foolishness would be later personified into acts of each nation's heroes and later ascribed to Jesus by the Sun-worshipping Romans who had control over the New Testament.

Now you can better understand that each year, early society awaited the approach of Dec. 22, with foreboding. Dec. 22, the day of the Winter Solstice (definition is to stand still) was a day of reckoning for them. Because it seemed to them, as they observed and tracked the North to South movement of the Sun, that on this day DEC 22, the sun entered its grave. The sun dies or the sungod dies. The North to South progression of the Sun can be likened to a swinging pendulum. You know that when a pendulum reaches its solstice (the point where it swings back - its turning point), that for a slight imperceptible moment, it actually stands still. But in terms of our vast solar system, the point of solstice is not imperceptible. It lasts for days, three days to be exact. For three days, after the sun reaches its solstice, it appears to stand still. This period of pause, between the Suns descent and ASCENT, wrought paralyzing dread and fear into the hearts and minds of the early pre-Christians. Over time, they established rituals and traditions concerning this period (DEC 22 to DEC 25). They passed the word through oral tradition, and eventually, after their societies established writing, wrote it down, concerning their Sun God: the sun shall lay in a grave (point of solstice) for 3 days. But after 3 days the sun shall rise, be resurrected, (according to Webster's Dictionary, the word resurrect is linked to the word resurge, which means "To Rise Again", to revive), and ascend toward heaven, (progressively ascend northward to the position of the summer Sun). And when the sun completes its ascent upward toward the point of its summer solstice, it will comfort us and bless us with warm weather and long days and will save us (be a savior) from the ravages of winter. So, this, that I have explained to you here, is the ORIGINAL, authentic, true CONCEPT of the resurrection. As the revelation of God would grow among Mankind, men could see how the God of the Universe has spoken such to them in the Cosmos.

When the pre-Christians spoke and wrote of the resurrection of the Sun; they meant exactly that. It did not refer to a person, but to the SOLAR SUN. That would come later. We see the the culminating of it in the teachings later connected to Jesus.

What you, the reader must be sharp enough to see, is that many "untruths" have been mixed with "truths" in the life of Jesus as portrayed in the New Testament and "cast out the leaven."

But, when the Gentile Church broke from their Jewish Roots the Gentile priesthood began to associated with the inherited traditions about Jesus their older "religious traditions" of the Sun-gods. Long ago their Gentile ancestors had changed the Sun to Son. The priesthood told the pagans that the SON (Christ) was born on DEC 25, just like their SUN. They told them that the Son had been dead in a grave for three days and then was resurrected (revived) and ascended to heaven (upward) just like their Sun. This is totally a matter of faith for you, the reader.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE AND OSIRIS

The Winter Solstice is the shortest day of the year, when the sun reaches its lowest point on the horizon. ("Solstice" literally means "sun stop.") In ancient times, pagans celebrated this day as a "rebirth" of the sun or a sun god, and the beginning of a new year. In some cultures, the Winter Solstice was also a time to celebrate the birth or rebirth of a savior man-god (who was often connected with the sun). He was usually believed to be the offspring of a god father and a goddess or human mother, who was often a virgin. In ancient Egypt, the god-man/saviour Osiris died and was entombed on December 21st. At his moment of death, the priests brought out a baby, indicating his immediate rebirth; the Christians celebrate a birth of a god just after this time as well.

About 3000 B.C.E., Egyptians began worshipping the god Osiris, who was associated with the sun. He was portrayed as a trinity: a heavenly god, an earthly god, and a falcon. (Later, Christians depicted their trinity as God, Jesus, and a Holy Spirit dove). The king of Egypt claimed to be the earthly god. He acted as a link between humanity and the heavenly god. It was believed the earthly god king became the heavenly god after death. Later, the heavenly god, Osiris, was said to have fathered (through Isis, a virgin) an earthly god son, Horus, who was actually a rebirth of Osiris. According to legend, this birth of Osiris/Horus was announced by Three Wise Men, symbolized by three stars in Orion's Belt pointing to Osiris' star in the east. Angelic voices hailed his arrival. His birth was often depicted in a manger, with Isis as the Madonna standing over him, and was said to have occurred on the Winter Solstice. Belief in Osiris, Horus, and Isis became popular in the Roman Empire, until believers began to be persecuted under Christianity.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE AND MITHRA

About 2000 B.C.E., Persians began worshipping the man-god Mithra, who was supposedly born from a god father and a human virgin mother. Mithra's birth was said to have occurred in a cave or stable, and was witnessed by shepherds who brought him gifts. Later, his followers celebrated this event with a ceremony at midnight on the eve of the Winter Solstice. Mithra was viewed as a Redeemer. He was believed to have performed miracles, such as raising the dead, healing the sick, making the blind see and the lame walk, and casting out devils. According to legend, Mithra celebrated a Last Supper with his twelve disciples before he ascended to heaven. In memory of this, his worship-pers partook of a sacramental meal of bread marked with a cross. In subsequent years, a stone image symbolizing Mithra was buried in a tomb. It was then withdrawn and he was said to live again. Followers of Mithra believed a person had to be baptized in order to ascend into the heavens after death. Mithra is supposed to return at the end of time to judge the human race. In 67 B.C.E., Mithraism was introduced into the Roman Republic. Later, Mithraism stood as a powerful rival to the newly emerging Christianity. In fact, by 307 C.E., Mithra was officially designated the "Protector of the Roman Empire." However, by 358 C.E., followers of Mithra began to be persecuted under Christianity. In addition to being a man-god savior, Mithra was connected to the sun god. Later, Christians began referring to their own man-god savior, Jesus, as the "Light of the World" and the "Sun of Righteousness." Christians moved their Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday (sun-day). The Seventh-Day Adventists, however, are an example of one modern Christian group which has kept its Sabbath on Saturday.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE AND KRISHNA

The Hindu man-god Krishna was believed to have been born c. 1200 B.C.E. He was said to be an incarnation of the god Vishnu, born of a human mother, Devaki. Krishna's birth was celebrated on the Winter Solstice.

According to legend, Krishna's birth was announced by a star and angelic voices. Shepherds and wise men hailed him as the Redeemer and gave him gifts. King Kansa tried to kill Krishna by ordering the death of all male infants born on the same night as Krishna. A heavenly voice warned his earthly foster father (a carpenter) to flee with his family. Krishna was said to have taught moral lessons, forgiven sins, performed miracles, and defeated demons. It was believed that the Lord and Savior Krishna atoned for the world's sins by pouring out his blood while lying on a cross-shaped temple rock. However, some Indian art depicts Krishna hanging from a cross and being pierced by an arrow. It was also believed Krishna rose from death and ascended to heaven.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE AND CHRISTMAS

The Winter Solstice is the shortest day of the year, when the sun reaches its lowest point on the horizon. ("Solstice" literally means "sun stop.") In ancient times, pagans celebrated this day as a "rebirth" of the sun or a sun god, and the beginning of a new year. In some cultures, the Winter Solstice was also a time to celebrate the birth or rebirth of a savior man-god (who was often connected with the sun). He was usually believed to be the offspring of a god father and a goddess or human mother, who was often a virgin. Tammuz of Babylon, Attis of Phrygia, Horus of Egypt, Mithra of Persia, Krishna of India, Heracles of Greece and, last of all, Jesus of Nazareth are just some of the ancient man-gods whose births were celebrated on the Winter Solstice. In 46 B.C.E., Julius Caesar adopted the Julian calendar. The Winter Solstice and the beginning of the new year fell on December 25th. Caesar declared this date the "Birthday of the Unconquered Sun." (Later, Christians called it the "Birthday of the Unconquered Son.") The ancient Roman festival of the Saturnalia (honoring Saturn, the god of agriculture) lasted from December 17th to December 24th. The event concluded with a great feast, the Brumalia, held on December 25th. Pagan celebrations of the Winter Solstice included social gatherings, lights, singing, gifts, feasts, yule logs, mistletoe, holly, and decorated trees. These festivities were later adopted by many Christians. The Christian Bible acknowledges that decorating trees is a pagan idea. Jeremiah 10.2-4 states: "Learn not the way of the heathen... For the customs of the people are in vain: for one cutteth a tree out of the forest... They deck it with silver and with gold; they fasten it with nails and with hammers, that it move not." It seems it is not proper for a Christian to have a Christmas tree! The 1911 edition of the Catholic Encyclopedia admits: "Christmas was not among the earliest festivals of the Church... the first evidence of the feast is from Egypt." Again it finds it's origin with Osiris.

JESUS, CHRISTIANITY AND CHRISTMAS

There are many parallels between these and other pre-Christian savior man-gods and Jesus. Indeed, so much of Jesus' legend has been plagiarized that a few scholars doubt whether he ever actually existed! Others claim that if he existed, his life is obscured in myth and we know virtually nothing about him. Most of the Roman persecution of Christianity occurred from 250 to 313 C.E. In 380, the Roman emperor Theodosius ordered all pagan temples to be destroyed and forced pagans to accept Christianity. The Roman celebration of the sun god's rebirth was still held on December 25th. However, due to imperfections in the Julian calendar, the actual Winter Solstice had drifted to December 21st. Pagan sun god celebrations proved too popular for early Christians to overcome. Therefore, they decided to superimpose their story of Jesus (which contained many pagan elements anyway) onto the sun god festi-vals of the Winter Solstice (Christmas) and the Spring Equinox (Easter). In 354, Bishop Liberius of Rome decreed that the birth of Jesus should be celebrated on the same day as the birth of the sun gods - December 25th. Before this, the Christian church had no official observance of the birth of Jesus. From 1652 to 1659, Oliver Cromwell and the Puritans in the English Parliament outlawed Christmas because it was not sanctioned in the Bible. Churches were ordered to be closed and shops were ordered to be open on this day. Clergymen were imprisoned for preaching on Christmas, and some parish officers were fined for decorating the church. From 1659 to 1680, Puritans in the colony of Massachusetts prohibited the observance of Christmas, imposing a five shilling fine on anyone caught celebrating this pagan festival. It wasn't until 1856 that Georgia became the first state to make Christmas a legal holiday. In 1894, Christmas was included in the first group of federal holidays. Previously, Congress had met, and mail was delivered, on Christmas Day. The Worldwide Church of God, the Seventh-Day Adventists, and the Jehovah's Witnesses, all Christian religions, do not celebrate Christmas.

WHAT CAN WE LEARN...AND WOULD GOD WANT US TO?

Emperor Aurelian established December 25 as the birthday of the "Invincible Sun" in the third century as part of the Roman Winter Solstice celebrations. Shortly thereafter, in 273, the Christian church selected this day to represent the birthday of Jesus, and by 336, this Roman solar feast day was Christianized. January 6, celebrated as Epiphany in Christendom and linked with the visit of the Magi, was originally an Egyptian date for the Winter Solstice. If you have ever studied the Jewish Roots of Christianity you can easily see that Yeshua was conceived at Hanukkah (the Festival of Lights...light to the world) and was born at the High Holy Days (9 months later). This is why Bet Emet exists for we desire to help the readers to sanctify themselves before the L-RD and one day meet Him with truth in their lives instead of paganism passed off as truth!

Most of the customs, lore, symbols, and rituals associated with "Christmas" actually are linked to Winter Solstice celebrations of ancient Pagan cultures. While Christian mythology is interwoven with contemporary observances of this holiday time, its Pagan nature is still strong and apparent. Pagans today can readily re-Paganize Christmas time and the secular New Year by giving a Pagan spiritual focus to existing holiday customs and by creating new traditions that draw on ancient ways.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE..THE BIRTH/REBIRTH OF THE SUN AND THE GODS

To our earliest ancestors, who could only guess at the "meaning" of natural events, winter solstice was the time when the sun came back to earth. Light and warmth were restored, and another fertile season could begin. Life could go on. The cycle would repeat, after all.

There are more celebrations and festivals between the end of November and early January than any other time of year. Many of these celebrations have overlapped and been combined, and lost their origins of nationality and purpose. Best known to Americans are Thanksgiving (the harvest festival), Christmas and New Year's. These are all vestiges of earlier, simpler holy days.

This important winter celebration has been adapted and adopted by many people in all parts of the world. It (the winter solstice) has been incorporated into the major religions. It has been purified, and it has prospered. Today, in America, as in most of the developed world, we don't celebrate winter solstice, that time when the sun is on its lowest point on the horizon, and seems poised, unable to return to its position high in the sky of summer and plenty. Today, we celebrate Christmas. The birth of the Savior, the King of Light.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE AND SOLAR SAVIORS/DYING GODS

There is a tradition of December as the month of the birth of many solar saviors and dying gods. They include:

- Osiris
- Thy Syrian Baa
- Attis
- Adonis
- Helios
- Apollo
- Dionysus
- Mithras
- Jesus
- Balder
- Frey

In the Roman tradition, 25 December was Dies Natalis Solis Invictus, the Day of the Birth of the Undefeated Sun. All of these deities were given similar titles:

- the Light of the World

Sun of Righteousness

- Savior

The festival of Christmas is a wonderful amalgam of many religious traditions, ancient and modern, Pagan, Zoroastrian, Jewish, Mithraic and Christian. But have you ever stopped to wonder where all our Christmas customs came from? Their origins are as wonderful and colorful as presents under the Christmas tree!

The earliest winter solstice celebrations were part of the year of a largely agricultural society. If there is the right amount of sunshine (and water) crops will grow, the animals will eat and get fat, and there will be grain for the long winter. As every farmer knows, nothing affects crop success like the right amount of light. If you're a backyard gardener who buys your vegetable seeds in little packets, information listed first on growing instructions tells you "plant in full sun. 90 days to maturity." Without 90 days of eight hours or more of sun, that vegetable will not mature into nutritious, life-giving food, regardless of any other existing conditions.

Earliest recorded history recounts celebrations of the return of light. And so, many celebrations and festivals, while pagan in their beginnings, have been adopted over the millennia to fit the needs of the people and their level of technology. The Romans celebrated Saturnalia, a festival to honor Saturn, the god of harvests. He civilized the Romans and taught them agriculture.

On his festival, which occurred then around December 17 and continued for seven days, work ceased, gifts were exchanged, and war was outlawed. Beyond that, Saturnalia was known for its extravagant decadence. Slaves were allowed to meet their masters on equal terms, and festivities were marked by drinking and being drunk, gaming, singing naked, noise-making, and all manner of debauchery! The god Saturn represented the "golden age" of the innocence of mankind, therefore, there were no classes, no slaves or masters, no right or wrong.

The Kalends of January also had major influence in the Latin countries. I quote here, Libanius, the famous Greek sophist of the fourth century:--
"The festival of the Kalends is celebrated everywhere as far as the limits of the Roman Empire extend. . . . Everywhere may be seen carousals and well-laden tables; luxurious abundance is found in the houses of the rich, but also in the houses of the poor better food than usual is put on the table. The impulse to spend seizes everyone. He who the whole year through has taken pleasure in saving and piling up his money, becomes suddenly extravagant. . . . People are not only generous toward themselves, but also toward their fellow men. A stream of presents pours itself out on all sides. . . ."

Well, I don't know about you, but I recognize something of the season here!

The Druids, thriving in the harsh northern Atlantic, rather than the more temperate climate of sunny, Mediterranean Italy, were a little more basic. The symbols they assembled to celebrate this most important holy day were also simple. Evergreens: symbols of life everlasting, and flame: symbol of light and warmth. Evergreens were used for everything from door decorations (inviting life everlasting into the home) to "Christmas" trees, to "Yule" logs. Holly was planted on either side of the doorway and the prickly leaves guarded the household from evil spirits. Evergreen trees were brought into the home and decorated with candles (encouraging the return of the Sun God) and fruits and grains (celebrating the past harvest and the hope for a good harvest in the new year).

Yule logs, not only giving out warmth against the midwinter cold, but possessing magical properties of healing, prosperity, protection, fertility and good fortune, were reverently brought into the home and tended to in a most serious fashion. Usually, there was great significance placed on keeping the log burning for a certain period of time. And during that time, should your fire go out, great misfortune was portended. Not only were you without the warmth and light of flame, but your neighbors would not help you rekindle your fire, for it was very bad luck to let the light go out of your house. Some traditions mandated that the yule log's flame be kept alive for the entire year, till the lighting of the next log; others allowed for keeping charcoal or unburnt pieces of the log for use in the following year's ceremonial lighting. There are obvious practical applications for these beliefs within context. Today, they have become charming rituals and superstitions.

And what about the most popular "superstition" of all -- Santa Claus? Where did he come from? Santa's real name, is, of course, St. Nicholas. And he is a relative newcomer to the scene, patterned around the fourth century bishop of Myra in Asia Minor, who, for some unknown reason, became the patron saint of boys. It's uncertain whether his wondrous works for the benefit of young people gave rise to, or are due to his connection with children. Most likely, he is a product of improved agriculture and other causes which made early December, rather than mid-November, the time for final harvest and its attendant rejoicing. (St. Nicholas Day is December 6.) His origin, which was well after the establishment of the Christian Church, is patterned after a real-life saint, and his traditional dress of red, trimmed with white fur also seems to have been established very early.

St. Nicholas went largely unnoticed in much of the world, but he caused quite a stir in Holland and Belgium. There, on December 6th, when night falls, people dress up as St. Nicholas and "check their lists," whether the children have been naughty or nice. Children, in hopes of a reward, place their wooden shoes (sabots) at the foot of their beds, and fill them with straw or carrots for Santa's horse or ass (reindeer hadn't been invented yet). When morning comes, they find treats in place of the fodder, or, if they've been bad, they'd find sticks.

Now here's an interesting twist. It seems that Santa Klaus is known to every English child, but, according to Clement Miles, author of Christmas Customs and Traditions, "as an incarnation of Christmas as a saint with a day of his own. Santa Klaus, probably, has come to us via the United States, whither the Dutch took him, and where he still has immense popularity."

And this was supposed to be a story on winter solstice. Well, it is. A pagan holiday (holyday) has been incorporated into the calendar of nearly every major religion in the world. We all celebrate the birth (or rebirth) of the sun, as it returns to its position in the southern sky. We celebrate the birth of Christ, the Son of God, the God of Goodness and Light, at the same time every year. This year, on December 21, take notice of the sun. Look how low it is in the sky. This is the shortest day of the year. But from this day forth, the sun will rise higher in the sky, bringing us closer to summer. And once again, we can look forward to a season of warmth, light and fertility.

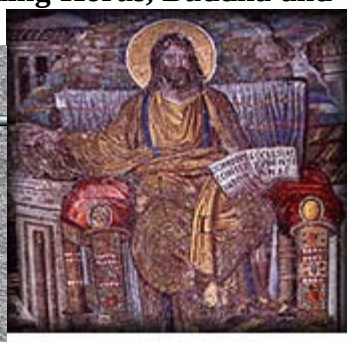
THE BIRTHDAY OF THE SON OF THE SUN GOD

The Aryans looked up to the sky and gave it the name Dyaus, from a root-word which means "to shine." When, out of the forces and forms of nature, they would later fashion other gods, this name of Dyaus became Dyaus Pitar, the "Heavenly Father," or "All-Father." The earth they worshipped as the Mother of all.

Their reasoning let them to believe that the Sun was the "off-spring" or product of the Sky god; the Heavenly Father. This "offspring of the Sky-god was none other than "the Son of the Sky", or that the Sun was the "Son of the Heavenly Father", the "Son of the Sun-God", and that the immaculate virgin, the Earth (sometimes it was the dawn or the night), was the Mother of the Sun. Hence we have the Virgin, or Virgo, as one of the signs of the Zodiac.

As the Sun begins the apparent annual northward journey on the 25th of December, this was said to be the birthday of the Sun (all movement commences with birth). This special day, the birthday of the Sun, was observed with great rejoicings. On this day the sign of the Virgin is rising on the eastern horizon, the Sun having reached the winter solstice.



For instance, many of the world's crucified god-men have their traditional birthday on December 25th ("Christmas"). The logical question arises: Why, if Jesus is a historical character, are there are presently two dates for both Christmas and Easter? This purportedly well-known character, who set the world on fire, has no birth date whatsoever, and the "historical" references and genealogies found in the gospel accounts differ from each other. The gospels are not history at all but a retelling of the Mythos that find their origin in Sun Worship. The historical Jesus is a phantom. "These, which cannot both be historical, are based on the two birthdays of the double Horus in Egypt." In addition, early Christian "doctors" were constantly contradicting themselves as to when exactly "the Lord" died or "ascended to heaven" after "he" was resurrected. Two of the most powerful early bishops, Irenaeus and Papias record that Christ lived to be very old, "flatly denying as 'heresy' the Gospel stories as to his crucifixion at about thirty years of age." (J. Wheless, Forgery in Christianity).

As concerning the above dates, the ancients recognized that (from an earthcentric perspective) the sun makes an annual descent southward until December 21st or 22nd, the winter solstice, when the sun stops moving southerly for three days and then starts to move northward again. During this time, the ancients declared that "God's sun" had "died" for three days and was "born again" on December 25th. The ancients realized quite abundantly that they needed the sun to return every day and that they would be in big trouble if the sun continued to move southward and did not stop and reverse its direction. Thus, these many different cultures celebrated the "Sun of God's" birthday on December 25th. InThe Truth about Jesus, M. Mangasarian states: "The selection of the twenty-fifth of December as his birthday is not only an arbitrary one, but that date, having been from time immemorial dedicated to the Sun, the inference is that the Son of God and the Sun of heaven enjoying the same birthday, were at one time identical beings [notice the Son is identified with the Sun...here comes the Trinity again as the Son is of the same essence as the Sun...reminds us of Nicea Council..right?].The fact that Jesus' death was accompanied with the darkening of the Sun, and that the date of his resurrection is also associated with the position of the Sun at the time of the vernal equinox, is a further intimation that we have in the story of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus, an ancient and nearly universal Sun-myth, instead of verifiable historical events."

THE FOLLOWING ARE THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE "SUN OF GOD":

- The sun "dies" for three days on December 22, the winter solstice, when it stops in its movement south, to be born again or resurrected on December 25th, when it resumes its movement north.
- In some areas, the calendar originally began in the constellation of Virgo, and the sun would therefore be "born of a Virgin."
- The sun is the "Light of the World."
- The sun "cometh on clouds, and every eye shall see him."
- The sun rising in the morning is the "Savior of mankind."
- The sun wears a corona, "crown of thorns" or halo. Many of the sun-gods, including Horus, Buddha and Krishna (as seen in is ascension), are depicted with halos, hundreds to thousands of years before it became fashionable in Christianity.

Mosaic of Christ enthroned

- The sun "walks on water."
- The sun's "followers," "helpers" or "disciples" are the 12 months and the 12 signs of the zodiac or constellations, through which the sun must pass.
- The sun at 12 noon is in the house or temple of the "Most High"; thus, "he" begins "his Father's work" at "age" 12.
- The sun enters into each sign of the zodiac at 30°; hence, the "Sun of God" begins his ministry at "age" 30.
- The sun is hung on a cross or "crucified," which represents its passing through the equinoxes, the vernal equinox being Easter, at which time it is then resurrected.

Answer for yourself: Does this remotely sound like what you have been taught or read about Jesus in the New Testament?

Answer for yourself: Where does fable end and truth begin?

Mangasarian states: "Like the dogmas of the Trinity, the virgin birth, and the resurrection, the sign of the cross or the cross as an emblem or a symbol, was borrowed from the more ancient faiths of Asia." Walker states: "Early Christians even repudiated the cross because it was pagan. . . . Early images of Jesus represented him not on a cross, but in the guise of the Osirian or Hermetic 'Good Shepherd,' carrying a lamb." In Christianity, the original occupant of the cross was a lamb, not a man. The man hanging on the cross did not occur until the 7th cent. C.E. "The stave, stake, prop or stay of the suffering sun was the Stauros, which was primarily a stake for supporting, shaped as a cross." This image can be found in crosses that have a circle on them (the circle is representative of the Sun).

Taylor: "On a Phoenician medal found in the ruins of Citium, and engraved in Dr. Clarke's Travels, and proved by him to be Phoenician, are inscribed not only the cross, but the rosary, or string of beads, attached to it, together with the identical Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." Graves: ". . . the consecrated twenty-fifth of March is also the day marked in our calendars as the date of the conception and annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary." March 25th was considered the end of the sun's passing through the vernal equinox, when the sun was "resurrected," i.e., the day was now longer than the night.

Contrary to popular belief, the ancients were not an ignorant and superstitious lot who actually believed their deities to be literal characters. Indeed, this slanderous propaganda has been part of the conspiracy to make the ancients appear as if they were truly the dark and dumb rabble that was in need of the "light of Jesus." "The picture of the New Beginning commonly presented is Rembrandt-like in tone. The whole world around Judea lay in the shadow of outer darkness, when suddenly there was a great light seen at the centre of all, and the face of the startled universe was illuminated by an apparition of the child-Christ lying in the lap of Mary. Such was the dawn of Christianity, in which the Light of the World had come to it at last! That explanation is beautifully simple for the simple-minded; but the picture is purely false - or, in stronger words, it is entirely false." Jacolliot: "We have repudiated Greek and Roman mythologies with disdain. Why, then, admit with respect the mythology of the Jews? Ought the miracles of Jehovah to impress us more that those of Jupiter? . . . I have much more respect for the Greek Jupiter [Zeus] than for the God of Moses; for if he gives some examples not of the purest morality, at least he does not flood his altar with streams of human blood."

The reality is that the ancients were no less advanced in their morals and spiritual practices, and in many cases were far more advanced, than the Christians in their own supposed morality and ideology, which, in its very attempt at historicity, is in actuality a degradation of the ancient Mythos. Indeed, unlike the "superior" Christians, the true intelligentsia amongst the ancients were well aware that their gods were astronomical and atmospheric in nature. Socrates, Plato and Aristotle surely knew that Zeus, the sky god father figure who migrated to Greece from India and/or Egypt, was never a real person, despite the fact that the Greeks have designated on Crete both a birth cave and a death cave of Zeus. As it had with so many preceding purveyors of wisdom and ideologies, the Church ripped off both Aristotle and Plato, presenting their known accomplishments in philosophy. The "Logos" is pure Platonism, which refined the "Word" aspect of the extant Mythos, the Logos in Greece being Hermes, who is also found in Egypt as the "Trismegistus." Cardinal Palavicino is quoted as saying, "Without Aristotle we should be without many Articles of Faith." It is amusing to consider that the omniscient "Lord," who came to deliver a "New Dispensation," needed the writings of Aristotle to determine doctrine for his Church.

In addition, all over the world are to be found sites where this god or that allegedly was born, walked, suffered, died, etc., a common and unremarkable occurrence that is not monopolized by, and did not originate with, Christianity. As concerns the "Jesus Lived in India" theory by Kersten, et al., it is claimed that in Kashmir is a tomb of a traveling prophet named "Yuz Asaf," which is an Arab name that some have attempted to link to "Jesus." Notovich claimed to have found a text in Tibet about the "Life of Saint Issa." It is also claimed that the tombs of "Moses" and "Thomas" are in India. And there are several places where the "Virgin Mary" purportedly rested and/or died. It should be noted that there were innumerable "traveling prophets" throughout the ancient world, all spouting the same parables and platitudes and doing the standard bag of magic tricks, as do the countless Indian yogis of today. It is difficult to believe that the Indians or Tibetans would be very impressed by such stories, since they have had numerous miraculous god-men of their own. It has also been claimed by the Athenians that the olive tree alive today on the Acropolis was miraculously planted by the goddess Athena, an act for which she was honored by having that city-state named after her; and, there are numberless "footprints" of this Buddha and that throughout Buddhist countries. In addition, in the Notovich text concerning the "Life of Saint Issa," which is of late date, it says at the very beginning, "This is what is related on this subject by the merchants who have come from Israel," thus demonstrating both that it is not an eyewitness account of a visit by the Jewish god-man and that there was an extensive trading and brotherhood network which would readily allow for such stories to spread. Again, all around the globe are stories of where this god or that set foot, did miracles, was born or died. This is standard in the world of mythmaking, and it is not an indication or evidence of historicity.

It is evident that there was no single historical person upon whom the Christian religion was founded, and that "Jesus Christ" is a compilation of legends, heroes, gods and god-men. In other words, there is a big difference between the Jesus of History and the Jesus Christ of Faith! There is not adequate room here to go into detail about each god or god-man that contributed to the formation of the Jewish Jesus character; suffice it to say that there is plenty of documentation to show that this issue is not a question of "faith" or "belief." The truth is that during the era this character supposedly lived there was an extensive library at Alexandria and an incredibly nimble Essene brotherhood network that stretched from Europe to China, and this information network had access to numerous manuscripts that told the same narrative portrayed in the New Testament with different place names and ethenicity for the characters. This become the "Greatest Story Ever Told." In actuality, the legend of Jesus nearly identically parallels the story of Krishna, for example, even in detail, as was presented by noted mythologist and scholar Gerald Massey over 100 years ago, as well as by Rev. Robert Taylor 160 years ago, among others (Gnostic and Historic Christianity by Massey). See also The Diegesis by Rev. Robert Taylor, The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors by Kersey Graves, Pagan Christs by J.M. Robertson, any works by Hilton Hotema, Pagan and Christian Creeds by Edward Carpenter, and Deceptions and Myths of the Bible by Lloyd Graham. Although some historicizers may glob onto these dates as proof that the research is outdated, this is simply not true. These numbers are provided here to demonstrate that this truth has been known, and has been suppressed by vested interests, for a long time.

HOW DID THE CHRISTIANS ANSWER THE CHARGES OF THE PAGANS THAT THEY ONLY "COPIED THEIR ALREADY EXISTING PAGAN RELIGIONS"?

Justin explain this in the following manner: "It having reached the Devil's ears that the prophets had foretold that Christ would come...he [the Devil] set the heathen poets to bring forward a great many who should be called sons of Jove [that is, the sons of God]; the Devil laying his scheme in this to get men to imagine that the true history of Christ was of the same character as the prodigious fables and poetic stories" (Justin, Apol 2).

Julius Frimicus says, "The Devil has his Christs" (Taylor, Diegesis, p. 164).

Answer for yourself: Now don't you think that these Christian Fathers, when cornered by these Pagans and charged with "mimicking" their Pagan Religions, could be more honest than blaming the whole thing on the Devil as counterfeiting the Christian faith in the beginning? I would hope so.

DECEMBER 25TH, BIRTH OF THE SUN GODS AND JESUS...COINCIDENCE?

Humanity has, since time immemorial looked upon December 25, as the birth of the Sun God. We have seen in the first two articles in this series that personification of the Sun, stars, and Nature were very important for the ancients in order to preserve for all posterity the wisdom and knowledge that they received from the God of the Cosmos. That being said then it is a small step from the birth of the Sun God to the birth of the SON God!

In a book by Malik Jabbar, entitled The Biggest Lie Ever Told, he states:

the key to the connection between the Sun God and the Son of God is the number 3. The bible is replete with verses stating that the major sign for identifying the Son of God is that he would lay in a grave for three (3) days and then be resurrected-BORN AGAIN

THE JESUS CHRIST OF THE NEW TESTAMENT IS A PERSONIFICATION OF THE SUN-G-D

It is not easy to say or admit what I will say next but I will let the facts speak for themselves. I struggle with this fact as do many who were raised as Christians and followers of Jesus but the fact remains that if you searched from now till doom's day, you will not find any SECULAR HISTORY of a person living 2,000 years ago, in Palestine, by the name of Jesus Christ, that accomplished the feats that are attributed to him, in the bible. The source of all knowledge concerning a person (prophet) called the Christ or Jesus are Rome's biblical scriptures and other literature that was derived from the original biblical sources. Furthermore the bible was compiled and translated and revised by proponents of the Christian faith who established that religion, during the early centuries of this era (this era began approximately 2,000 years ago).

Accompanying the above fact is another fact. Much of the depiction of this Jesus of the New Testament is not Jewish in many of the sayings and accounts describing his life as given to us by Rome New Testament. If you are familiar with Biblical or Rabbinical Judaism in the least then when reading the New Testament the non-Jewish Jesus jumps off the pages and screams "this is not a Jew." What we have here is a false representation in many places of the Historical Jesus. Christianity today answers such charges by pointing out that the Jesus of the New Testament is the "Christ of Faith" and not the Historical Jesus. That might be true but understand in so doing that this "Christ of Faith" of Gentile Christianity is a Sun-God personified. Let me prove it to you.

THE PERSONIFICATION OF THE SUN AS THE "SON"

The pre-Christian Europeans practiced a variety of paganistic rituals that culminated each year, at the dawning of the winter type weather, on Dec. 25. They celebrated this day as the day of the Birth or Resurrection of the Sun God. If you remember I mentioned earlier that the ancients looked to the Heavens and noticed cycles and patterns in the Cosmos as well as in Nature which told then what the Creator was doing. They then applied these observations to their own lives as well. These observations remained with them as metaphors of Divine Spiritual Realities they saw and understood through Revelation. Later Mankind would take these "metaphors" and make them "literal" and these were no longer understood as symbols. These observations and dates were no longer symbols. Losing this knowledge later Gentiles actually looked upon Dec. 25 as the day when the Sun was Born anew - Resurrected into new life. This ritual worship of the resurrection (birth) of the Sun-God on Dec. 25 goes back thousands of years into pre-history.

The primary, motivating factor that inspired early man to worship God, was his fear and dread of the potential fierceness of his environment. His (primitive man) major impetus for worshipping and sacrificing to the Sun God was to assure that the Sun God would continue protecting mankind from the ravages of the dreaded winter.

So for primitive man, the inception of winter, DEC 22, was the worst day of every year for him. This day (DEC 22, the start of winter) marked the beginning of the worst stage of his yearly struggle for survival. This day (DEC 22, the start of winter) was the harbinger of his potential perdition.

This day DEC 22, is referred to by astronomers as the Winter Solstice. This word, Solstice, according to Webster's Dictionary means "to stand still, pause, a turning point". On DEC 22 of each year, the Sun reached its Winter Solstice, the lowest point of trajectory (angle of rays) of the entire year. The Sun had been steadily settling lower in the horizon as the days of light became shorter and the days of darkness became longer. It benefits the reader to understand that primitive man was afraid of the dark. In the darkness man's life was threatened by predator animals, quarreling tribes, poisonous snakes, accident, and the cold. Primitive man made a correlation between the dark with his near death and often died in the dark as he fell prey to the above dangers. When the Sun arose each morning then the new light brought warmth and security. With the Sun's light man was "saved" from his enemies, wild animals that wished to eat him for lunch, and poisonous creatures who bit would take his life. Light for man was his salvation and he connected such ideas with the Sun which was picture to him of God and His salvation. On the other hand darkness was connected with evil and in doing so man understood that the dark was evil and invented a word for it: dark/evil or d/evil or devil! Now we have another religious doctrine...the devil which originally was personified darkness which later became a real entity for some and the world had been fighting the devil or darkness ever since. After DEC 22 the Sun and its rays remained motionless in it's southern trajectory neither sinking any lower on the horizon or rising any higher. The ancients reasons that the Sun was submitted to the darkness for these 3 days. Said another day the Sun fought the darkness/Devil for 3 days. On December 25, after this 3 days of fighting the darkness/Devil the Sun again Rises northward and had triumphed over the works of the Devil which is a sign that summer shall come again! I hope you understand once the Sun was personified into the "Son" we end up with this:

I Jn 3:8 8 He that committeth sin is of the devil [darkness]; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. (KJV)

Even though DEC 22 marks the beginning of winter and the weather turns progressively worst from that point (DEC 22) until the start of spring (March 21), all is not lost. Because the fact that the angle of Sun's rays projecting on the earth, was moving progressively northward told early man that the Warmth and Comfort of the summer Sun would eventually prevail. But there was a period of doubt not only for these 3 days but until Spring and new greenery appeared, for early primitive civilization. Primitive man did not understand our universe and solar system as we do today. We, today, know exactly what causes the four seasons of the year. But early man did not. He did not possess knowledge of our solar system, the axis of the earth's rotation and revolving around the sun. He did not understand that these forces operated by a Natural, Providential Law, that would stay it's course, no matter what. Early man only understood the result, not the cause.

So each year, early society awaited the approach of DEC 22, with foreboding. DEC 22, the day of the Winter Solstice (definition is to stand still) was a day of reckoning for them. Because it seemed to them, as they observed and tracked the North to South movement of the Sun, that on this day DEC 22, the sun entered its grave.

The North to South progression of the Sun can be likened to a swinging pendulum. You know that when a pendulum reaches its solstice (the point where it swings back - its turning point), that for a slight imperceptible moment, it actually stands still. But in terms of our vast solar system, the point of solstice is not imperceptible. It lasts for days, three days to be exact. For three days, after the sun reaches its solstice, it appears to stand still. This period of pause, between the Suns descent and ASCENT, wrought paralyzing dread and fear into the hearts and minds of the early pre-Christians.

Over time, they established rituals and traditions concerning this period (DEC 22 to DEC 25).

They passed the word through oral tradition, and eventually, after their societies established writing, wrote it down, concerning their Sun God:

the sun shall lay in a grave (point of solstice) for 3 days. But after 3 days the sun shall rise, be resurrected,* (according to Webster's Dictionary, the word resurrect is linked to the word resurge, which means To Rise Again, to revive), and ascend toward heaven, (progressively ascend northward to the position of the summer sun). And when the sun completes its ascent upward toward the point of its summer solstice, it will comfort us and bless us with warm weather and long days and the Sun [also Son as the personification of the Sun] will save us (be a savior) from the ravages of winter.

So, this, that I have explained to you here, is the ORIGINAL, authentic, true CONCEPT of the resurrection*.

When the pre-Christians spoke and wrote of the resurrection of the Sun; they meant exactly that: not only the daily rising and falling of the sun but the winter solstice where the Sun entered the grave and fought the Devil/darkness for 3 days only to triumph in the resurrection of the Sun (on December 25). The lack of greenery at that time required the celebration of this resurrection being postponed until Spring and then we encounter the Vernal/Spring equinox at Easter. The rest is Roman heresy and history. Originally the resurrection did not refer to a person, but to the SOLAR SUN. But, when the Roman priesthood founded and established Christianity, they changed the Sun to Son. The priesthood told the pagans that the SON (Christ) was born on DEC 25, just like their SUN.

They told them that the Son [the Sun personified] had been dead in a grave for three days and then was resurrected (revived) and ascended to heaven (upward) just like their Sun.

The reverence for December 25, as the Day of Birth for the Sun (Son of God) goes back into pre-history. The hollowed reckoning for this day did not begin two thousand years ago with the Christ. Jesus Christ, so called , was simply the latest personage to be linked to this ancient date of December 25, depicted as the birth of the Sun God.

EXAMPLES OF OTHER CHRISTS AND THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO DEC. 25:

Krishna, of India, born on December 25, his mother was a virgin, mother's name was Maia. The name Krishna means Black or Dark. His uncle , Kamsa, the ruler at the time of his birth sought to kill him (Krishna) because he had heard a Prophecy that Krishna would overthrow him. Krishna escaped death by being smuggled out of the area to safety.

Mithra, of Persia, born on December 25, his birth was witnessed by Shepherds that brought gifts to honor him. He was styled as a Mediator between God and Man. Witness this quote from the Encyclopedia Encarta,

"Mithraism was similar to Christianity in many respects, for example, in the ideals of humility and brotherly love, baptism, the rite of communion, the use of holy water, the adoration of the shepherds at Mithra's birth, the adoption of Sundays and of December 25 (Mithra's birthday) as holy days, and the belief in the immortality of the soul, the last judgment, and the resurrection. Mithraism differed from Christianity in the exclusion of women from its ceremonies and in its willingness to compromise with polytheism. The similarities, however, made possible the easy conversion of its followers to Christian doctrine" "Mithraism," Microsoft ® Encarta. Copyright © 1994 Microsoft Corporation. Horus, of Egypt, born on December 25. His mother, Isis, gave birth to him in the swamp, she was warned by the God Thoth, to flee and conceal the child from the evil Set. Set had killed the father of Horns, whose name was Osiris, and sought to kill Horns, also. Isis was able to keep Horns hidden from Set, till he (Horns) grew to manhood. Horns sought to avenge the murder of his Father, and made war against Set, and defeated him.

Buddha, of India, born on December 25, his mother's name was Maya, she was a virgin. He was immaculately conceived, and at birth , he announced that he was a savior to the world. His birth was announced by a star. At his birth, he was visited by Wise Men who declared that they had seen Signs of his birth, that is to say, signs of the royal birth.

Beddou (Fot), was a God of the orient born 1027 BC, his mother was a virgin, he was born of royal blood. The king sought to kill him at birth, because he felt the newborn infant posed a future threat to his Throne. The God child was saved by shepherds, and lived in the desert till he reached the age of thirty, at which time he commenced teaching his spiritual doctrine to that region.

Quetzalcoatl, a God the Western Hemisphere, was born of a virgin. He sojourned in the wilderness, fasted forty days and was crucified. He was variously represented as the God of light that struggled against the God of darkness called Tezcatlipoca.

Hercules, son of the God Zeus, predestined by birth to inherit the throne of Argos. Hera, the jealous wife of Zeus desired the throne for another and sought to delay the birth of Hercules, and subsequently tried to kill Hercules while in his crib , by sending two snakes to strangle him. Hercules killed the snakes, though he was less than a year old. Later, He was sent away to the countryside where he became a shepherd.

Attis, of Phrygia, His mother was a virgin, her name was Nana. He was a shepherd, and reported to have died by self emasculation under a pine tree. He was alleged to have risen from the dead at Easter i.e. The vernal Equinox.

Tammuz. hailed as the only begotten son of the God Ea. His mother was a virgin, by the name of Ishtar. As an infant he was hidden in a chest by Aphrodite, the Goddess of love and entrusted to Persephone, the Goddess of the nether world. Persephone later opened the chest and was so stricken by the beauty of the babe, that she refused to return the child to Aphrodite. The two Goddesses fought each other for possession of the child, till finally the God Zeus mediated the matter, and declared that the child shall spend half it's year with Aphrodite and the other half in the nether world with Persephone.

There were many, many more Gods and saviors born of virgin mothers, than I have listed here. To explore this subject in detail, read The World's Saviors, by Charles Vail - The Worlds Sixteen Crucified Saviors, by Kersey Graves, and The Golden Bough, by George Frazer.

The fact that so many saviors were alleged to have been born on the same day of the year, under the same and similar circumstances, in vastly scattered locations of the world, throughout thousands of years of history, indicates a worldwide dissemination of a common mythology.

The similarity of these various myths that are widely separated geographically and in language and racial affiliation indicates an extremely ancient source as well as a coalescence of thought and philosophy within the ancient world that, perhaps many of us had not envisioned. Indeed ancient society was evidently nourished from the same spiritual fountain (Religious Philosophy). We see, that over the millennium, minor superficial descriptive differences have entered the ancient Myths, But nevertheless we can easily recognize the original core that pervades all of the various tales.

We should not assume that all people from the various regions of the world possessed the same interpretation of this symbolism. Nor should we assume that all the people within any given society, at the various strata (levels) of which all societies are layered possessed the same interpretation of this allegory. It is evident that the ancient sages, in their wisdom, devised a very refined and uniquely adaptable religious system that was distinctively compatible to an individuals level of understanding.

IN CONCLUSION

It might be well to summarize what we have said up to this point. We saw that the ancients and primitive peoples of thousands of years ago were surrounded by a hostile environment and had little if any science or developed understanding of their predicament. Such a lack of intellectual development led to their reasoning the development of Gods and Demons as the Controllers of the forces and elements within their environment. This being the case then primitive man found the need to establish rituals and sacrifices to appease or please their imagined deities and demons. Later as society progressed intellectually it became aware of the fact that they should know better than to continue such "pagan" rites and traditions but because of an ingrained mentality cultivated over the millennia and habitually perpetuated then society continually finds itself locked into such traditions unable to free itself due to the influence of the priestcrafts and pastors who control religion. Today we have evolved further from the truth due to the efforts of organized establishments of religion as well as the alliances between political and financial factions within organized religion that desires to perpetuate the ignorance of the laity for the purpose of control, organization, defense, aggression, and the accumulation and protection of their leadership and the wealth it provides.

The priesthoods have always been privy to a certain esoteric knowledge concerning the Heavens and the movements of its objects. The general public, unkowledgeable of these "mysteries," by and large, accepted the Priest's ancient mythology as LITERAL and or HISTORICAL. The general public, in so doing and not being able to discern the difference between the "literal" from "historical" fell prey to believing everything as "literal." Understand that the ancients had used the method of symbolism to preserve esoteric knowledge and in so doing preserved it since any ruling power or enemy that was adverse to preserving anything this gnosis could not destroy that which they could not find. Being that the gnosis, mysteries, and this knowledge was shielded in myth and fable, it has weathered the storms of time throughout thousands of years intact and remains interpretable today by those who possess acute insight and are who are not blinded by society's prejudices, traditions, or popular religious concepts.

Among the laity many of the myths were taken literally, as actual history, just at it is today with many of our religious myths. Many of us actually believed that Jesus walked on water, that he actually brought a corpse back to life after 3 days of decomposition, that he actually healed and brought sight to people with only a touch of his hand. It is the fate of those who lack the gnosis and knowledge concerning interpreting this ancient mythology to accept more religious myths as historical truths about the Jesus of history. Without this knowledge of the personification of the cosmos and it's application to sun-gods and sun-godmen then it is likewise their fate to continue to accept religion as the literal truth and moral truth on the basis of faith when to do so is not warranted when one possesses all the facts.

All of the Savior gods and godmen, including Jesus, can be referred to as Solar Gods or Gods of the Sun. In other words their births, lives, and deaths can be correlated to the Transit Cycles of the Sun.
When the ancients formulated their religious beliefs, they used the larger image of the Creator God [the Cosmos] as their example and pattern. They personified elements of the Cosmos, and record the movements of the stars and planets as personified deities and demons. They contrived fables and tales that hold exact correlation to the planetary and stellar movements within the celestial heavens,

These Transit Cycles of the Sun and Stars were in time applied to a Jewish rabbi named Yeshua/Jesus in the News Testament. On the surface you might think that there is little harm in a story applied to Jesus but when you realize that many of the religious doctrines taught as essential to Eternal Life in the New Testament come from such solar Transit Cycles then it dawns upon you that Christianity has the wrong message of salvation and atonement. That is not to say as well the wrong ideas and beliefs of and associated with the Jewish Messiah.

Time to look at more of this information as we prepare ourselves to learn the truth from fiction as it applied to the Jesus of History. Shalom.

EXAMPLES OF FAMOUS BIRTHS ON DEC. 25 BESIDES THAT OF JESUS

The reverence for December 25, as the Day of Birth for the Sun (Son of God) goes back into pre-history. The hollowed reckoning for this day did not begin two thousand years ago with the Christ. Jesus Christ, so called, was simply the latest personage to be linked to this ancient date of December 25, depicted as the birth of the Sun God.

Some of the others that were revered on this day are as follows:

The two goddesses fought each other for possession of the child, till finally the g-d Zeus mediated the matter, and declared that the child shall spend half it's year with Aphrodite and the other half in the nether world with Persephone.

There were many, many more g-ds and saviors born of virgin mothers, than I have listed here. To explore this subject in detail, you need to read only 3 books in detail:

1. The World's Saviors, by Charles Vail

2. The Worlds Sixteen Crucified Saviors, by Kersey Graves

3. The Golden Bough, by George Frazer.

The fact that so many Gentile "Saviors" were alleged to have been born on the same day of the year, under the same and similar circumstances, in vastly scattered locations of the world, throughout thousands of years of history, indicates a worldwide dissemination of a common mythology.

The sameness of these various myths that are widely separated geographically and in language and racial affiliation indicates an extremely ancient source as well as a coalescence of thought and philosophy within the ancient world that, perhaps many of us had not envisioned. Indeed ancient society was evidently nourished from the same spiritual fountain (Religious Philosophy). We see, that over the millennium, minor superficial descriptive differences have entered the ancient Myths, But nevertheless we can easily recognize the original core that pervades all of the various tales.

It is evident that the ancient sages, in their wisdom, devised a very refined and uniquely adaptable religious system that was distinctively compatible to an individuals level of understanding.

The problem is that we have come to believe the same "myths" about Jesus as Christians!

It is time to wise up. Whether you want to admit it or not if you are a Christian then your religious philosophy and belief system is directly descended from the Mythical allegories of the ancient world. When in Rome do as the Romans, right? Well you have and not know it. All along you have been falsely assured by those you "trust" as spiritual leaders that you are "right with G-d." You better rethink that because if half or more of what you believe about Jesus can be shown to be lies, myths, and pagan superstitions derived from their fear and worship of Nature, then you better study for yourself and repent and learn how a non-Jew relates to G-d within Biblical Judaism, the religion and faith of the Jesus you love and say you follow.

For sharing such things I am often chastised severely by well-meaning simple Christian shepherds thinking they have all truth because they read the New Testament. Understand there are people that know more than they and most spiritual Christian Gentile leaders will reject such knowledge outright because they fear being proved wrong. The facts speak for themselves. When you take the time to look for yourself you only need ask yourself two questions:

Do you want to know the truth before you die?

In the face of such overwhelming facts and overwhelming evidence then is the Christian faith I have followed as inherited from my parents truly a "Divine and unique revelation from G-d" or should I begin a serious investigation into the faith of Jesus, Biblical Judaism, and the place for the non-Jewish God-fearer within it who sets at the feet of the teachers of Israel and receive the "light to the world"?

JESUS CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO HELL AS RECORDED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT....TRUTH... OR A SUN-MYTH RETOLD?

The doctrine of Christ Jesus' descent into hell is emphatically part of the Christian belief, although not alluded to by Christian divines excepting when unavoidable. In the first place, it is taught in the Creed of the Christian Church.

The Nicene Creed was created at the Synod at Nicea in 325 A.D. and set forth this Creed: We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the only-begotten of his Father, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father. By whom all things were made, both which be in heaven and in earth. Who for us men and for our salvation came down [from heaven] and was incarnate and was made man. He suffered and the third day he rose again, and ascended into heaven. And he shall come again to judge both the quick and the dead. And [we believe] in the Holy Ghost. And whosoever shall say that there was a time when the Son of God was not, or that before he was begotten he was not, or that he was made of things that were not, or that he is of a different substance or essence [from the Father] or that he is a creature, or subject to change or conversion--all that so say, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes them (From The Seven Ecumenical Councils, ed. H. Percival, in the Library of Nicene and Post Nicene Fathers, 2nd series (New York: Charles Scribners, 1990), Vol XIV, 3).

Notice if you will the "third day" portion; this is a clear reference to the New Testament doctrine of Jesus' descent into hell prior to the resurrection.

The gospels pretend to be matter of fact stories of some events in the life of the Christian God. The various "Creeds" reflect such a story. They tell what people saw or heard. They claim they saw Jesus rise to heaven, but it is difficult to know how they could have known he descended to hell, unless they simply had the risen Jesus confessing it in one of his mysterious post mortem appearances. Anyway, it was not expressly written into the gospels. Nevertheless, it became and remains a firm belief among Christians that Jesus did descend to Hell. A Christian writer explains that the early Christians were united on the doctrine of Christ's underground mission. It was too well settled to admit of dispute

The Apostles' Creed teaches the doctrine explicitly and it was once thought of as equal in authority to the gospels, being supposedly written by the apostles themselves.

The New Testament attests to this as well: Peter (1 Peter 3:18) is thought to be referring to the descent into Hell when he writes: being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit, by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison. Prison must mean Hell.

In Acts 2:31 we find that his soul was not left in hell. The writer plainly considered Jesus's soul had been there. The most positive declaration that Christ did descend into hell could not make it more certainly a scriptural Christian doctrine.

WHERE DID SUCH A BELIEF ARISE?

Answer for yourself: Where then did such a belief arise?

You need to know that the most important event in the lives of Pagan Saviours, after their crucifixion, is that of their descent into the infernal regions. In the Hindu bible, written more than three thousand years ago, the Saviour Krishna:

…went down to hell to preach to the inmates of that dark and dreary prison, with the view of reforming them, and getting them back to heaven, and was willing himself to suffer to abridge the period of their torment.

Elsewhere we find that Krishna even descended into hell to teach souls in bondage. We have references to prison and to bondage. Hell is a prison and souls are in bondage. Souls are therefore in prison just as Peter says. The writers of the Gospel of Luke and the first epistle of Peter seem greatly indebted to the Hindu bible in these passages.

Another God who descended into hell was Quexalcoatl of Mexico (300 BC). The story will be found in the Codex Borgianus, wherein is related the account of his death, and burial after crucifixion, his descent into hell, and subsequent resurrection. After Adonis descended into hell, he rose again to life and immortality. Prometheus of Caucasus (600 BC) also suffered and descended into hell, rising again from the dead, and ascending to heaven. Horus first reigned a thousand years, then died, and was buried for three days, at the end of which time he triumphed over Typhon, the evil principle, and rose again to life evermore. And Osiris of Egypt also descended into hell and after a period of three days rose again. Homer and Virgil speak of Hercules, Ulysses and AEneas descending into Hades. The Gods became incarnate, and descended into hell to teach humility and set an example of suffering. The story of their descent into hell was doubtless invented to occupy them during their three days in the tomb.

THE EARLY CHURCH FATHERS TEACH THE SAME DOCTRINE ABOUT THE CHRIST

The doctrine was also taught by the Fathers of the Church. St. Chrysostom (born 347 A.D.) asks:

"Who but an infidel would deny that Christ was in hell?" (quoted by Bonwick; Egyptian Belief, p. 46).

And St. Clement of Alexandria, who flourished at the beginning of the third century, is equally clear and emphatic as to Jesus' descent into hell. He says:

"The Lord preached the gospel to those in Hades, as well as to all in earth, In order that all might believe and be saved, wherever they were. If, then, the Lord descended to Hades for no other end but to preach the gospel, as He did descend, it was either to preach the gospel to all, or to the Hebrews only. It accordingly to all, then all who believe shall be saved, although they may be of the Gentiles, on making their profession there"

Origen, who flourished during the latter part of the second, and beginning of the third centuries, also emphatically declares that Christ Jesus descended into hell (Origen, Contra Celsus, bk.ii. c. 48).

Ancient Christian works of art represent his descent into hell (Jameson, Hist. Of Our Lord in Art, vol. ii. pp. 364-365).

The apocryphal gospels teach the doctrine of Christ Jesus' descent into hell, the object of which was to preach to those in bondage there, and to liberate the Saints who had died before his advent on earth.

On account of the sin committed by Adam in the Garden of Eden, all mankind were doomed, all had gone to hell excepting those who had been translated to heaven—even those persons who were "after God's own heart," and who had belonged to his "chosen people." The coming of Christ Jesus into the world, however, made a change in the affairs of man. The saints were then liberated from their prison, and all those who believe in the efficacy of his name, shall escape hereafter the tortures of hell. This is the doctrine to be found in the apocryphal gospels, and was taught by the Fathers of the Church (Jameson, Hist. Of Our Lord in Art, vol. ii. pp. 250-251).

THE GOSPEL OF NICODEMUS

In the Gospel of Nicodemus (apoc.) is to be found the whole story of Christ Jesus' descent into hell, and of his liberating the saints. It goes like this:

Satan, and the Prince of Hell, having heard that Jesus of Nazareth was almost to descend to their domain, began to talk the matter over, as to what they should do, etc. While thus engaged, on a sudden, there was a voice as of thunder and the rushing of winds, saying: " Lift up your gates, O ye Princes, and be ye lifted up, O ye everlasting gates, and the King of Glory shall come in."

When the Prince of Hell heard this, he said to his impious officers: "Shut the brass gates . . . and make them fast with iron bare, and fight courageously."

The saint having heard what had been said on both sides, immediately spoke with aloud voice, saying: "Open thy gates, that the King of Glory may come in." The divine prophets, David and Isaiah, were particularly conspicuous in this protect against the intentions of the Prince of Hell.

Again the voice of Jesus was heard saying: " Lift up your gates, O Prince; and be ye lifted up, ye gates of hell, and the King of Glory will enter in." The Prince of Hell then cried out: " Who is the King of Glory" upon which the prophet David commenced to reply to him, but while he was speaking, the mighty Lord Jesus appeared in the form of a man, and broke asunder the fetters which before could not be broken, and crying aloud, said: " Come to me, all ye saints, who were created in my image, who were condemned by the tree of the forbidden fruit . . . live now by the word of my cross."

Then presently all the saints were joined together, hand in hand, and the Lord Jesus laid hold on Adam's hand, and ascended from hell, and all the saints of God followed him (Nicodemus; Apoc. Ch. xvi and xix).

When the saints arrived in paradise, two " very ancient men " met them, and were asked by the saints: " Who are ye, who have not been with us in hell, and have had your bodies placed in paradise?" One of these " very ancient men" answered and said: " I am Enoch, who was translated by the word of God, and this man who is with me is Elijah the Tishbite, who was translated in a fiery chariot" (Nicodemus; Apoc. Ch. xx).

THE NEW TESTAMENT'S WITNESS

The doctrine of the descent into hell may be found alluded to in the canonical books; thus, for instance, in I Peter:

"It is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing. For Christ also bath suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit: by which he also went and preached unto the spirits in prison" (I Peter 3:17-19).

Again, in "Acts," where the writer is speaking of David as prophet, he says:

"He, seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption" (Acts 2:31).

The reason why Christ Jesus has been made to descend into hell, is because it is a part of the universal mythos, even the three days' duration. The Saviors of mankind had all done so, he must therefore do likewise. The Gentile redactors and writers of the New Testament only "patterned" the life of Jesus after their own pagan beliefs. Events in the life of the pagan Sun-gods and Saviors were transposed into the life of Christ.

Crishna, the Hindu Savior, descended into hell, for the purpose of raising the dead (the doomed), before he retired to his heavenly seat (Asiatic Researches, vol. i. p. 237; Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 168).

Zoroaster, of the Persians, descended into hell (Monumental Christianity, p. 286).

Osiris, the Egyptian Savior, descended into hell (Dupuis, Origin of Religious Belief, p. 256; Bonwick Egyptian Belief, pp. 125).

Horus, the virgin-born Savior, descended into hell.

Adonis, the virgin-born Savior, descended into hell (Bell, Pantheon, vol. i. p. 12).

Bacchus, the virgin-born Savior, descended into hell (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. i. p. 322; Dupuis, Origin of Religious belief, p. 257; Dunlap, Mysteries Adoni, p. 33).

Hercules, the virgin-born Savior descended into hell (Taylor, Mysteries, p. 40; Mysteries of Adoni, pp. 94-96).

Mercury, the Word and Messenger of God, descended into hell (Bell, Pantheon, vol. ii. p. 72).

Baldur, the Scandinavian god, being killed ,descended into hell (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 169).

Quetzalcoatle, the Mexican crucified Savior, descended into hell (Mexican Antiquities, vol. i. vi. P. 166).

All these gods, and many others that might be mentioned remained in hell for the space of three days and three nights. "They descended into hell, and on the third day rose again."

SO WHY THE THREE DAY TIME PERIOD THAT THEY HAD TO REMAIN IN HELL?

One only need look at the stars to know the story. Also, this explains why nation after nation had the same story of the Sun-gods. They all studied the stars.

Thus the story of the three days' entombment has an astronomical explanation...the winter soltice. The sun lies still and apparently motionless, neither ascending nor descending, for nearly three days at the midwinter solstice. It was thought by primitive man that the sun was in a tomb for three days having descended to Hell, the lowest point of its annual cycle. In tracking the course of the sun man could detect the time when the sun shown least every year. For 3 days when the sun is the lowest in the horizon it appears to be motionless for 3 days then beings it northward ascent again. These 3 "shrortest" days of the year provided the least amount of light of the whole year. The sun was believed to have died. The prayer was that it would rise again and the prayer always worked, the sun was born-again each year at midwinter (raised from the dead) as it began it northward track in the sky. However the battle of light with darkness (temptation) continued until the vernal equinox and only when the days became longer than the nights were the ancient astrologer priests happy to celebrate the sun's rebirth. So, the birth of god was at the midwinter solstice but he was fully born again at the vernal equinox (spring). Hence, spring was chosen to represent this "three days' descent of the gods into hell and death because very shortly the days would get longer and spring would arrive with its new life and vegetation after the "death" of winter. The Persians had an astronomical figure representing the descent of a god into hell and returning at the time that Orsus, the goddess of spring, had conquered the god of winter. The author of Revelation describes the Lamb of God (Rev 12) as conquering the dragon, which is the Scorpion or Dragon of the first month of winter, October, being conquered by the Lamb of March or spring.

NOW FOR SOME TOUGH QUESTIONS

If you are a "thinking believer" then you can easily see that the above story concerning Jesus is pure fiction based upon the primitive fears and suspicions of mankind. Hopefully today we know better. But to the point.

We possess a document that is touted to be "inspired, infallible, and inerrant;" the New Testament. As you can see we have a sever problem here both in I Peter and Acts let alone the doctrines emanating from such a book as expressed in the "Creed" of the Church.

Answer for yourself: If I Peter can be shown to be in error, what other "errors" are contained within it let alone other books in the New Testament?

Answer for yourself: If the writer of I Peter got it wrong about the descent into hell, what about other doctrines within the same verse: atonement, redemption, etc? Could he be wrong about these as well?

Answer for yourself: What about the book of Acts as well as it represents the Pauline mission with its doctrines as well?

WHAT DOES A JEWISH JESUS WHO PREACHED REPENTANCE AND OBEDIENCE TO THE COMMANDMENTS OF GOD GOT TO DO WITH SUN-MYTHS AND PAGAN SAVIORS?

DID GOD SEND HIS MESSIAH INTO THE WORLD IN PAGAN "DRAG?"

SOL INVICTUS...THE RELIGION OF ROME...THE LEGACY OF GENTILE CHRISTIANITY

The official recognition of sun worship in the Roman Empire began during the time of Aurelian when he instituted the cult of "Sol invictus". The cult of Sol Invictus and that of Mithra are virtually the same. In the year 307 A.D. Emperor Diocletian, a sun worshipper, was involved in the dedication of a temple to Mithra and was responsible for the burning of scripture which made it possible for later emperors (like Constantine) to formulate their own version of "Christianity." After the rein of Diocletian, Emperor Constantine, while claiming to be a Christian maintained the title "Pontifus Maximus" the high priest of paganism. Constantine's coins were were inscribed: "SOL INVICTO COMITI" (COMMITTED TO THE INVINCIBLE SUN). During his reign pagan sun worship was blended with the worship of the Creator, and officially entitled "Christianity." Cybele the Phrygian g-ddess, known to her followers as "the mother of g-d", was closely related to the worship of Mithra. As Mithraism was a man's religion, the worship of Cybele was practiced by the women. The priests of Mithra were known as "Fathers" and the Priestesses of Cybele as "Mothers." After baptism into the Mysteries of Mithra, the initiate was marked on the forehead. The sign of the cross formed by the elliptic and the celestial equator was one of the signs of Mithra. Sunday (Deis Solis), the day of the sun, was considered by Mithraist a sacred day of rest. December 25th was celebrated as the birth of the sun, given birth by the "Queen of Heaven" - "Mother of g-d." The Mithraists celebrated a mithraic love feast. This feast consisted of loaves of bread decorated with crosses with wine over which the priest pronounced a mystic formula. Mithra was considered mediator between g-d and man. Mithraists also believed in eternal life in heaven and in the torture of the wicked after death. Many of these beliefs and rituals were exclusive to Mithraism and up until the fourth century were not a part of the Christian faith. Only those in accordance with the commandments of G-d could possibly be in honor of Christ. In the 4th century, through confusion and manipulation, rituals of "sun worship" were pronounced, by the followers of Satan to be "Christian" in nature. There is no Biblical support for the inclusion of Mithraic ritual, which is the worship of Satan, in the worship of the G-d of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the Creator of heaven and earth. It is a Satanic scheme to disguise the transgression of G-d's laws under the title of "Christianity". This same system, characterized by the shrouding of truth in secrecy and the manipulation of the truth in order to achieve its ends, has been working for two millennia to combine paganism with Christianity. The mystery of iniquity is at work and it only takes a little leaven to leaven the whole lump.

Let us continue in the next article.

THE WINTER SOLSTICE AND MAN'S VARIED CELEBRATION OF IT THROUGHOUT HISTORY

HOLIDAYS AND THE LEGACY OF SUN-WORSHIP

Among all peoples of the world, the most common times for celebration are the Winter Solstice and the Vernal Equinox. Considering that the austerity and bleakness of Winter (in contrast to the relative abundance and warmth of Summer) would be so impactful upon the lives of primitive peoples living in temperate climates, these festival times -- and even Sun-worship -- should come as no surprise.

In the Northern Hemisphere, the Winter Solstice occurs around December 21st, when the Sun is at its greatest distance below the celestial equator. The Vernal Equinox occurs around March 21st when the sun crosses the celestial equator and days have the same duration as nights ("equinox" comes from a Latin word meaning "time of equal days and nights"). The Vernal Equinox marks the beginning of Spring. The constellation (Zodiac sign) visible at dawn on the day of the Vernal Equinox has been regarded as of special significance (currently changing from Pisces to Aquarius due to the 26,000 year precession of the Earth).

The chief holiday for the ancient Hebrews was celebrated at the first full moon after the Vernal Equinox. Although this holiday was originally a celebration of Spring, it was later celebrated in remembrance of the Exodus from Egypt and was called Passover. The holiday entered Christian celebration by the fact that Christ was reputedly arrested and crucified at Passover. Because Christians insisted that Easter should be celebrated on a Sunday, the Council of Nicea decreed that Easter be the first Sunday after the fourteenth day of the moon (which is approximately the full moon) following the date of the Vernal Equinox (which is assumed to be March 21st).

The word for "Easter" in most of the Romance Languages is a variant of the Hebrew "Passover", but the English word is unrelated to these forms. Possibly, the English word "Easter" is derived from the name of an Anglo-Saxon goddess of Spring, "Eostre". Or it may have come from "Ishtar/Astarte" the Babylonian/Chaldean Venus who was the consort of the sun-god. Sunrise service, painted eggs and rabbits have all symbolized rebirth and fertility in Spring celebrations from ancient times. Celebration of motherhood (mother's day) is also most often in the Spring, another possible association with fertility.

DIVINITY AND THE VIRGIN BIRTH

Claims of divinity were commonly associated with virgin birth in the ancient world. The Hindu god Krishna, Gautama Buddha and Zoroaster were reputedly the product of virgin births. Alexander the Great, Constantine and Nero claimed to have virgin births. Admirers of Plato, Socrates, Aristotle and Pythagoras claimed virgin births for these sages.

In ancient Egypt, Osiris and his wife Isis were reputed to have been divine secular rulers of Egypt until Osiris was murdered by his jealous brother Seth. Seth cut the body of Osiris into 14 pieces and strew them about the land. Isis gathered up the pieces -- with the exception of the genitals, which had been eaten by a fish -- and restored Osiris to life. Osiris then dwelled in the underworld as the king & judge of the dead. Isis nonetheless gave birth to the divine child "Horus the younger" (presumably a virgin birth). In fourth-century Alexandria, "Madonna" could have been a reference to the mother goddess Isis or Saint Mary. The last Egyptian Temple of Isis was converted to a Christian Church in the sixth century AD.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM AND THE WISE MEN

The birth of Christ is described in only two of the four gospels -- Luke & Matthew -- and only Matthew mentions wise men and the Star of Bethlehem. Since the wise men were following a star from the East, they may have been Babylonian astrologers -- renowned in the ancient world for their wisdom. A legend of wise men honoring the baby Jesus was the equivalent of academic certification.

Stars had also signalled the birth of Krishna, Lao-Tze, Moses and Abraham. Several attempts have been made to give explanations for the Star of Bethlehem. In the 14th century Albert Magnus (teacher of Thomas Aquinas) noted that the constellation Virgo rose above the horizon at midnight on December 24th at the reputed time of Christ's birth. In 1606 the German astronomer Johann Kepler suggested that the "star" was the conjunction of Jupiter & Saturn on May 29th, 7 B.C. But Jupiter & Saturn would have been separated by a relative distance greater than two diameters of the moon -- so they could not have appeared as a single star. Jupiter & Venus actually overlapped on June 17th, 2 B.C., but this would have been after the death of King Herod. A supernoval explosion occurred in the constellation Capricorn in 5 B.C. and Halley's comet was visible in 11-12 B.C.

Natural explanations cannot account for a star being directly above a 20-meter radius on the surface of the earth such that it could be followed to such a specific location, unless the star was not high above the earth: "... and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was." (Matthew 2:9). A natural explanation for a supernatural event may undermine the claim that there was anything supernatural about the event at all.

Modern scholars now date Christ's birth between 6 BC and 4 BC. But the exact day is not known. Some historians doubt that the story of Christ in the New Testament is really a description of the activities of a single man. There were likely many, perhaps even hundreds, of individuals claiming to be saviors and prophets during that period. Thus, the Gospels could have been a compilation of stories and folklore that arose around the activities of many such persons.

CHRISTMAS IN ANCIENT ROME

Saturn was the Roman god of agriculture, after whom Saturday was named. In Italy, December was a time of harvesting, sowing and Thanksgiving. Saturnalia was the most popular of Roman holidays, with "Marti-Gras"-like street celebrations occurring between December 17th and December 24th, ending with feasting on December 25th. There was an exchange of gifts, principally wax candles and little clay dolls. Authority figures, however, were given tribute in the form of urns, jewelry, coins or gold.

The Sun god Mithras was worshipped in Persia from before the 6th century before Christ. Mithra was a divine being borne of a human virgin on December 25th (the Winter Solstice by Roman reckoning). As an adult, Mithras healed the sick, made the lame walk, gave sight to the blind and raised the dead. Mithraism had emerged from Zoroastrian beliefs in the struggle between good & evil, symbolized as darkness & light. This militaristic morality -- including a final judgement affecting the afterlife -- probably accounted for the popularity of Mithraism among Roman soldiers.

Despite the intense persecutions of Christians in the Roman Empire, Christianity continued to win many converts from paganism. The Roman Emperor Constantine was said to have accepted Christianity in 312 AD on the eve of a battle, after having a dream or vision that his troops would prevail under the banner of Christ. Possibly, massive conversions of his soldiers to Christianity and a case of pre-battle jitters provide the explanation for Constantine's decision. Further evidence for the idea that Constantine was motivated by political expediency can be found in the fact that he was not baptized until he was on his deathbed. In any case, the Christianization of Rome was accompanied by the Romanization of Christianity.

Pope Julius I adopted December 25th as the date of Christ's birth in 350 AD, probably as a means of co-opting the "pagans". If shepherds near Bethlehem were watching their flocks at night during the birth of Jesus (as described in Chapter 2 of Luke), then the birth would probably not have been in a winter month like December. Mithraism is probably also the reason why Christianity moved the sabbath from the Jewish Saturday to the Mithric Sunday.

In Greece, January 6th was the birthday celebration of the child-god Dionysus, borne of the virgin goddess Kore. Dionysus was also known as Jesus. The Eastern Christian Churches celebrated January 6th as the date of both the Nativity and the Epiphany (Greek for "manifestation") -- the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles (the wise men). In the 4th century, the Eastern Churches began to accept December 25th as the date of Christ's birth and the Roman Church began to introduce the January 6th feast of Epiphany. In 567 AD the Council of Tours proclaimed December 25th to January 6th as a 12-day holy festival -- the Twelve Days of Christmas.

FROM SAINT NICHOLAS TO SANTA CLAUS

A wealthy orphan whose parents died in an epidemic, Saint Nicholas was made the bishop of Myra (now the city of Demre on the south coast of Turkey) when he was quite young -- near the beginning of the fourth century. Soon after his appointment, the government of Rome jailed all Christian bishops who did not publicly sacrifice to the gods of Rome. Nicholas remained in prison for nearly ten years until edicts of toleration were issued. So many Christians had defected that the sacrament of confession was created, so that the "traitors" could cleanse their souls before re-entering the Christian Church.

Saint Nicholas became the subject of many legends. A sailor who fell overboard was reputedly saved by Nicholas when the saint walked on water, retrieved the sailor and carried him back to the ship. After an innkeeper had robbed & dismembered some students, Nicholas reputedly re-assembled them and restored them to life. Nicholas took pity on a poverty-stricken family with 3 daughters who faced the threat of being forced into prostitution without wedding dowries. For two daughters he crept-up to their house at night and threw bags of gold through a bedroom window. For the last daughter, he threw a bag of gold down the chimney -- which landed in a stocking she had set by the fireplace for drying. Nicholas was also noted for his generosity with children, who he would reward with treats if they had studied their catechism & behaved well.

The legend of Nicholas made him so popular that more European churches bore his name than that of any of the apostles. He was made patron saint of Greece and Russia. He was also made patron saint of banking & pawnbroking at a time when the two trades were closely related. The 3-ball symbol of pawnshops represents the three bags of gold he threw as dowries. The date of Nicholas's death -- reputedly on December 6th, 326 AD -- was widely celebrated as the feast of Saint Nicholas, but was removed from the Roman Catholic calender in 1969 because the legends about Saint Nicholas are so incredible.

The transformation of Saint Nicholas (in his red & white bishop's robes) to Santa Claus happened largely in America -- with inspiration from the Dutch. Even today, December 6th (Saint Nicholas Day) is the day children in Holland receive their gifts. In the early days of Dutch New York, "Sinterklass" became known among the English-speaking as "Santa Claus".

Washington Irving, a leading figure in the New York literary world, created a tale of a pipe-smoking Saint Nicholas who road a magic horse through the air visiting all houses in New York with gifts for the good children and switches for the bad ones. The poem The Night Before Christmas (reputedly by Clement Moore) replaced the horse with a sleigh drawn by flying reindeer. Thomas Nast -- head cartoonist for Harper's Weekly magazine (the man who invented both the Democratic donkey and the Republican elephant) -- depicted Santa Claus as a jolly, bearded fat man who lived at the North Pole and wore a furry suit & sleeping cap. Rudolf the Red-Nosed Reindeer was invented in 1939 by a staff copywriter for Montgomery Ward. The story was patterned after The Ugly Duckling, but turned a genetically defective glowing nose into a foggy-night navigation asset.

In the fall of 1897 an 8-year-old girl named Virginia O'Hanlon wrote a letter to the New York Sun asking if Santa Claus really exists. Francis Church, one of the Sun's editorial writers wrote a "Yes, Virginia" reply which has become a classic example for adults fostering children's belief in Santa Claus.

According to one study, 85% of 4-year-olds believe in Santa Claus. Belief drops to 65% by age 6 and to 25% by age 8. As children begin to question how Santa can visit every house, how a large man can fit in a chimney, how Santa can be in so many shopping malls at the same time, etc -- many parents resort to increasingly strained explanations to maintain the fiction. The uncritical belief of children can be touchingly cute. The temptation to build a poetic fantasy-world in formative minds -- removed from the harsh realities of life -- can be great. But potential damage can result from erosion of trust in teaching that Santa Claus is a fact rather than a fairy tale.

Some Christians can become uncomfortable with the God-like qualities of Santa Claus. He is all-knowing, has magical powers and distributes reward or punishment (but nearly always reward).

OTHER CHRISTMAS TRADITIONS

Ancient Egyptians used palms in their Winter Solstice festivals -- and the Romans used firs -- in anticipation of the lush greenery of Spring with the return of the Sun. Bringing an evergreen tree into the house at wintertime was a tradition among the Germans from at least 700 AD. When Victoria became Queen of England in 1837 at age 18, she married the German Prince Albert. Newspaper illustrations of the Christmas tree in Windsor Castle with the teenage monarch fired the popular imagination in Britain.

Mistletoe is a parasitic plant that attaches itself to trees and never touches the ground. The Druids regarded mistletoe as sacred. The Scandinavians associated it with the goddess of love. Ancient Babylonian legend regarded mistletoe as a divine branch from heaven which was grafted to earthly trees. Mistletoe was a token of peace & reconciliation -- with a kiss symbolizing pardon.

From the time of the ancient Egyptians, goose was the main course of Winter Solstice feasts. Henry VIII of England is credited with replacing goose with turkey -- the exotic new bird from North America. Fruit from an exotic American plant -- the cranberry -- was also added to Christmas dinners.

In olden times a huge log was carried into the house to serve as the foundation for holiday fires. Bringing in the yule log was once an important part of Christmas tradition. Lighted candles and winter fires were used by sun-worshippers to encourage the rebirth of the Sun. Tying fruit to the branches of trees symbolized the coming of Spring.

The song "Jingle Bells" was composed in 1857 by James Pierpoint, who became a Confederate soldier in the Civil War. Although Pierpoint never rose out of poverty, his nephew James Pierpoint Morgan (J.P.Morgan) became one of the wealthiest businessmen in America.

The Greek word for Christ is Xristos. The shortening of Christmas to Xmas has been common since the sixteenth century.

A FORBIDDEN CHRISTMAS

Christmas as celebrated by Catholics and early Protestants a few hundred years ago was not the secular holiday we recognize today. It was a "Christes Maesee" (Old English for Christ's Mass) or Nativity service plus a large family dinner. But celebration of birthdays -- even including that of Christ -- was rejected as a pagan tradition during the first three hundred years of Christianity.

In 1583 the Presbyterian church suppressed the observation of Christmas in Scotland because there are no biblical references to Christmas celebrations nor any biblical commandments to celebrate the birthday of Christ. The English Puritans also felt that there was "no biblical sanction" for Christmas -- regarding the holiday as popish and bacchanalian. Oliver Cromwell's government abolished English Christmas celebration by an act of Parliament in 1644. A similar law forbidding Christmas celebration in New England was passed by the Massachusetts Bay Colony Puritans ("Pilgrams") in 1659.

Although Christmas was not widely celebrated in New England until 1852, it was popular in the American South beginning with the Anglican settlement of Jamestown, Virginia in 1607. The Virginian colonists were the first to establish eggnog as a holiday beverage. Dutch influence in the settlement of New York City (New Amsterdam) helped make New York a mostly pro-Christmas state, although there was still an anti-Christmas New England influence.

THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT

Charles Dickens wrote A Christmas Carol in 1843. This popular book had an extremely powerful influence on undermining opposition to Christmas, especially among those influenced by Puritans in England and New England. Dickens used Scrooge to symbolize the idea that those who don't celebrate Christmas are uncharitable, twisted, mean-spirited and socially isolated. In 1957 Dr.Seuss reinforced this view with his picture-book How the Grinch Stole Christmas. The Grinch -- a nasty mountain hermit -- steals Christmas paraphernalia and plans to destroy it. But his heart is touched by the sound of Christmas carols, and he becomes transformed (as happened to Scrooge).

Gallop polls have shown that over 90% of Americans regard Christmas to be their favorite holiday. Many love the fun of giving and receiving presents. Christmas has become, above all, a celebration of family. For most, the feelings of sharing, togetherness and love experienced at Christmastime is a special joy. But the expectations some family members project upon other members often have the character of "familial moral duty". The season thus frequently occasions reopening old hurts and conflicts. This forces many people to re-examine their lives, especially since Christmas is a period which interrupts routing daily living. Resolutions for the New Year are often the result.

Perhaps no modern institution apart from Christmas elicits such ritualistic behavior from so many people. And the pressures to conform to these rituals can be very great. Suicide rates at Christmastime exceed those of any other time of year, although the explanation for these deaths can as easily be impediments to conformity as reaction against conformity.

Hard liquor sales are 30% greater in December than in September. Although alcoholic toasting is part of the holiday tradition, a large number of consecutive non-working days appeals to some people as a drinking opportunity.

Growing numbers of non-Christian immigrants exposed to Christmas traditions find it easier to adapt when the religious aspects of Christmas are de-emphasized. The modern celebration of Christmas tends to emphasize commercial activity. The time to Christmas is measured by "shopping days" rather than "prayer days". For retailers, it is "the season to be jolly" (except when their expectations are too high). In the 18th century gifts tended to be made by the giver, and practical (eg, mittens or food), but modern gifts tend to be more "frivolous" or "fun". Half of the year's sale of diamonds, furs and luxury watches happen in December. Christmas shopping is increasingly procrastinated. Since 1990 the busiest shopping day of the year has shifted from the day after Thanksgiving to the Saturday before Christmas.

Some non-religious people have attempted to combine conformity and rebellion by celebrating Isaac Newton's birthday. But it is doubtful that Isaac Newton was born on Christmas Day. Isaac's Anglican parents listed December 25th on the birth certificates of all their children as a protest against the anti-Christmas Cromwell government. Other non-believers who celebrate the Winter Solstice risk promoting paganism. Pagan Wiccans, of course, exult in their Solstice celebrations.

As all elements of society become increasingly politicized, with particular emphasis on toleration of diversity, it is difficult to predict what changes the future will bring to the way Christmas is observed (or not observed).

THE VERNAL/SPRING EQUINOX (AROUND 19TH/21ST MARCH)...OSTARA....EASTER

Jer 10:2 2 Thus saith the LORD, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. (KJV)

ALTERNATE NAMES

Eostre's Day, Celtic 'Bird Festival'

DRUIDIC NAME

Alban Eilir or Alban Eiler (Light of the Earth)

CHRISTIAN EQUIVALENT

Lady Day or the Annunciation (25th March), Easter (moveable date)

PLACE IN THE NATURAL CYCLE

Ostara is the solar festival that marks the transition from the dark to the light half of the year: day and night are of equal length. On this day, the sun rises due east and sets due west. The spring quarter of the year runs from Imbolic to Beltane, so Ostara marks the mid-point of spring. By Ostara, life is returning to the land in noticeable ways, and thus nature demonstrates the festival's associations with revival (resurrection of the sun) and the ascendancy of light.

FURTHER DETAILS

The Spring or Vernal Equinox, is when the equator is in the direct path of the sun, day and night are of equal length, North and South Poles receive equal light, thus the name equinox. It is a time of rebirth, an awakening of the earth, a time to plant, new beginnings.

In many cultures New Years Day was traditionally in late March. Most of the Roman republic and Medieval Europe celebrated New Years in March. It was not until 1582 and the institution of the Gregorian calendar that January 1st became the date to begin a New Year in the Western world.

Festivals and rites, a time to celebrate the renewal of life, generally preceded by a period of fasting. The Babylonians celebrated Akitu at the spring equinox. Ostara, German Goddess of Fertility, and Eostre, Saxon Goddess of Fertility, both represent the awakening of the earth. Christians celebrate Easter, the resurrection of Christ.

The Jewish people, being on a lunar calendar, prior to Equinox celebrate Purim, a festival mainly for children. It is a time when even the strictest Orthodox sects allow some foolishness and merriment to reign. The Celtic tradition has the April Fool, a holdover from the 'Great Fool', Dalua, the Green Man of the spring festival. According to Aleister Crowley "The Green Man is a personification of the mysterious influence that produces the phenomena of spring . . .The world is always looking for a saviour . . ." Parsifal is such a figure in the opera by Wagner, but the tale is much older, from ancient Pagan Druid and Nordic mythology.

Festivals occurring around the Spring Equinox are the Festival of Trees, Alban Eilir, Passover, Rites of Eostre, Easter, Ostara, Rites of Spring, Holikadehan, Lent, Buddha's birthday, St. Patrick's Day, and April Fools Day .

Ostara is a celebration of conception, regeneration and the triumph of light over darkness. In terms of the Goddess cycle, it is the time when the Maiden of Imbolic conceives the child that will be born at Yule.. The Christian Church celebrates both aspects of Ostara as the day of the Annunciation (when Mary conceives Christ) and the day of the Resurrection (when Christ returns triumphant from the darkness of death). The latter, Easter, is celebrated in the Western Christian Church on the first Sunday after the Paschal ('Passover') moon (usually the full moon that occurs on or next after the vernal equinox, taken as March 21).

Ostara is a Germanic goddess of spring and fertility, and the name of her Anglo-Saxon equivalent, Eostre, was used to derive the term Easter by the Venerable Bede in the 8th century. Eostre is a lunar goddess, and her symbols include the egg and the rabbit, both of which are obvious fertility symbols. In addition, the egg represents the Cosmic Egg of Creation and the rabbit is symbolic of the moon (it used to be thought that an image of a hare could be seen in the full moon). Eostre's festival was held on the first full moon on or next after the vernal equinox, so this fertility goddess lends her festival, her symbols and her name to the Christian celebration of the Resurrection.

The Spring Equinox brings a time of balance. The Sun God has overtaken the darkness and day and night are of equal lengths. The Goddess, the Earth Mother, supposedly awakens from Her long slumber to replenish the Earth. One is to interpret this as new Life rising from the cold ground. The Horned God has grown weak from the Winter and at this time dies in order to return to the healing Earth. From His "death", He is reborn as the Green Man. He has shed his antlers and fur for green leaves and vines. He is young still, but as the days grow longer he gains strength. He is a God of fertility, to aid our Goddess in the growing of our fields and livestock. Many Pagan customs from this Sabbat continue to this day. For instance, the Easter Egg is a common Pagan custom. Eggs have always been a symbol of fertility and thus used as a symbol for this holiday. They were traditionally painted red or scarlet to symbolize the Suns rays in hopes that the rays of the Sun would warm the Egg and from it would spring Life. Easter is celebrated around this time because it has always been, in older traditional religions, the time of the willing sacrifice and rebirth of the God. Therefore it was only logical to place the sacrifice and rebirth of Jesus around this time.

Just as Ostara is a time to sow the seed that will be harvested later in the year, it is also a time to act on new ideas and begin new ventures that will grow as the year proceeds. It is the point when, conceptually at least, the Sun enters the sign of Aries and the astrological cycle begins again. Ostara is a time for renewal.

Many, perhaps most, Pagan religions in the Mediterranean area had a major seasonal day of religious celebration at or following the Spring Equinox. Cybele, the Phrygian fertility goddess, had a fictional consort who was believed to have been born via a virgin birth. He was Attis, who was believed to have died and been resurrected each year during the period MAR-22 to MAR-25. About 200 B.C. mystery cults began to appear in Rome just as they had earlier in Greece. Most notable was the Cybele cult centered on Vatican hill ...Associated with the Cybele cult was that of her lover, Attis ([the older Tammuz, Osiris, Dionysus, or Orpheus under a new name). He was a god of ever-reviving vegetation. Born of a virgin, he died and was reborn annually. The festival began as a day of blood on Black Friday and culminated after three days in a day of rejoicing over the resurrection.

Wherever Christian worship of Jesus and Pagan worship of Attis were active in the same geographical area in ancient times, Christians used to celebrate the death and resurrection of Jesus on the same date; and pagans and Christians used to quarrel bitterly about which of their gods was the true prototype and which the imitation.

Many religious historians believe that the death and resurrection legends were first associated with Attis, many centuries before the birth of Jesus. They were simply grafted onto stories of Jesus' life in order to make Christian theology more acceptable to Pagans. Ancient Christians had an alternate explanation; they claimed that Satan had created counterfeit deities in advance of the coming of Christ in order to confuse humanity.

Wiccans and other Neopagans continue to celebrate the Spring Equinox as one of their 8 yearly Sabbats (holy days of celebration). Near the Mediterranean, this is a time of sprouting of the summer's crop; farther north, it is the time for seeding. Their rituals at the Spring Equinox are related primarily to the fertility of the crops and to the balance of the day and night times. Where Wiccans can safely celebrate the Sabbat out of doors without threat of religious persecution, they often incorporate a bonfire into their rituals, jumping over the dying embers to assure fertility of people and crops.

Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread were observed by the ancient Israelites early in each new year. The Jewish people followed the Persian/Babylonian calendar and started each year with the Spring Equinox circa MAR-21. The name Passover was derived from the actions of the angel of death as described in the book of Exodus. The angel 'passed over' the homes of the Jews which were marked with the blood obtained from a ritual animal sacrifice. The same angel exterminated the first born son of every family whose doorway was not so marked - perhaps the greatest act of genocide mentioned in the Bible following the killing of infants, children, men and women in Sodom.

OSIRIS AND THE SPRING EQUINOX

Before the occasion of Easter which celebrates the resurrection of Jesus, people celebrated the Vernal equinox. To Christians around the world, the first Sunday after the first full moon after the Vernal Equinox is Easter Sunday, the celebration of the resurrection of Jesus. But for thousands of years before the Christian era, the Vernal Equinox signaled the beginning of the season of rebirth, the resurrection of nature and of many an ancient pagan god. In ancient history the resurrection or rebirth concerned pagan gods. One of the first stories ever recorded of death and then resurrection is the Egyptian myth of Isis and Osiris. The goddess Isis and the god Osiris ruled an ancient land in peace and bliss. This ended when Set, Osiris' brother, murdered Osiris in a fit of jealousy. He cut up his body and scattered it throughout the world. Isis was heartbroken and gathered back these pieces. She took them to Anubis, lord of the underworld who brought Osiris back to life. Through the reunion of Isis and Osiris the sun god Horus was born. Out of the darkness came the light. Thus, one of the oldest resurrection stories, as mentioned above, is of Isis and Osiris of Egypt. They were goddess and god who ruled an ancient land in peace, until Set, brother of Osiris, murdered him out of jealousy. Set cut up Osiris's body and scattered it throughout the world. Isis in grief collected all the pieces. Then, with the help of Anubis, Lord of the underworld, brought Osiris back to life (as spring is a picture of renewed life after winter as seen in nature). Then, according to the Osiris myth, Isis and Osiris begat, Horus, the Sun god.

We encounter such myths of of the gods at the vernal equinox like Osiris, Attis, Adonis, and Dionysus - who like Christ die and are reborn each year. These gods are always the son of a God and a mortal woman. The son is a savior who saves his people in some way, sometimes through sacrifice. He is the vegetation, dying each year (at harvest) to be reborn in the spring.

To the ancient Egyptian people, the Orion constellation represented the god Osiris. According to Bernadette Brady's Book of Fixed Stars (Weiser, 1998), "The constellation was not [just] a symbol of god, it was god... The Egyptians knew him as Osiris and the Pharaohs came from him; they were his physical flesh, and were returned to him." For several thousand years, the constellation Orion rose just before the Spring equinox sunrise. As precession caused more and more of the Orion constellation to slip into the Spring equinox sunrise, the Egyptians recognized that Osiris was disappearing into the underworld. Bernadette Brady tells us, "To account for these observations the Egyptians developed the concept of an immortal god dying and passing on his throne to his son." Because the constellation above Orion (Taurus) has a bright red star (Aldeberan) like Orion's red star (Betelguese), Taurus and Aldeberan became mythologically associated with Horus, the son and heir of Osiris. At this point, the Egyptian cosmology included both Osiris, "ruler of the underworld, or afterlife" and Horus, ruler of "the new world order" (according to Brady's Book of Fixed Stars, p. 165).

Easter is the Christian version of the same myth. Even the name Easter is stolen. It comes from the Saxon dawn-goddess Eostre, whose festival was celebrated on spring equinox. The date of Easter is still determined by the old moon cycle. It is always the first Sunday on or after the first full moon after the spring equinox.

MITHRA AND THE SPRING EQUINOX

Another popular mythological theme related to Taurus is that of Mithras from ancient Persian culture. According to Brady, Mithras was a god of great military valor riding the solar chariot (Spring Equinox Sun) across the sky. Mithras was also known as Ahura Mazda, a Persian savior-figure, who produced the life of our world by slaying a cosmic bull and spreading its blood upon the earth. According to Alan Watts, Ahura Mazda was recognized by some Mahayana Buddhists as the Great Sun Buddha, whose radiance blesses the entire cosmos with eternal peace and light.

TRADITIONS, SUPERSTITIONS, RITUALS

The gathering of different colored eggs from a variety of birds. These eggs were then used as amulets for fertility, prosperity, and protection. Ostara were the hare and the egg. Both represented fertility. From these, we have inherited the customs and symbols of the Easter egg and Easter rabbit. Dyed eggs also formed part of the rituals of the Babylonian mystery religions. Eggs were sacred to many ancient civilizations and formed an integral part of religious ceremonies in Egypt and the Orient. Dyed eggs were hung in Egyptian temples, and the egg was regarded as the emblem of regenerative life proceeding from the mouth of the great Egyptian god.

Easter Sunrise Service: This custom can be traced back to the ancient Pagan custom of welcoming the sun God at the vernal equinox - when daytime is about to exceed the length of the nighttime. It was a time to celebrate the return of life and reproduction to animal and plant life as well.

Jer 10:2 2 Thus saith the L-RD, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. (KJV)

OSIRIS...ORION...AND THE RELATIONSHIP TO THE VERNAL - SPRING EQUINOX

Halfway between the solstices in late March and in late September, there are two days when the northern and southern hemispheres receive the same amount of sunlight and the days and nights are of the same length. Then the tilt of the Earth's axis is not towards the Sun, but lies at a right angle to an imaginary Earth-Sun line. At the Equator, the Sun is directly overhead. These days are the equinoxes. Equinox means "equal night". Ancient people regarded the equinoxes, like the solstices, as significant moments of the year.

EQUINOX MYTHOLOGY

Before the occasion of Easter which celebrates the resurrection of Jesus, people celebrated the Vernal equinox and the rebirth of Spring. In ancient history the resurrection or rebirth of pagan gods was commemorated at the Spring or Vernal Equinox. One of the first stories ever recorded of death and then resurrection is the Egyptian myth of Isis and Osiris. The goddess Isis and the god Osiris ruled an ancient land in peace and bliss. This ended when Set, Osiris' brother, murdered Osiris in a fit of jealousy. He cut up his body and scattered it throughout the world. Isis was heartbroken and gathered back these pieces. She took them to Anubis, lord of the underworld who brought Osiris back to life. Through the reunion of Isis and Osiris the sun god Horus was born. Out of the darkness came the light in the many different "Horus" of the nations over the eons. The "Osiris Pattern" at the Vernal Equinox was applied to a host of pagan gods and godmen; including Jesus at Easter no less!

Aphrodite the goddess of love and fertility fell in love with the handsome Adonis. She hid him in a box so no one could see him. She then gave the box to Persephone, the queen of the underworld for safekeeping. She opened the box and also fell in love with Adonis and refused to return him to Aphrodite. Aphrodite mourned her loss, and as a result the land became barren. Zeus, her father tried to intervene, but neither goddess would give up Adonis. Zeus finally decreed that Adonis would spend a third of the year with each goddess and one third of the year alone. So each Spring Adonis returns to Aphrodite and each winter he spends with Persephone in the underworld.

Dionysus, the god of wine was the son of Zeus and Semele, a mortal princess. Zeus promised Semele anything she asked of him. Semele was pregnant and asked only to see him in his splendor as the god of gods. Zeus knew no mortal could witness this sight and live. Despite this Semele insisted. She died and Zeus took their baby from her body and hid it within his own until the baby was born. Dionysus was raised by nymphs, and when he grew up he travelled to faraway lands, performing feats that proved his godhead. What he longed for was the mother he never knew, so he went to the underworld to find her. When he found her he defied death and escaped death with his mother. He brought her to Mt. Olympus where she was allowed to dwell with the gods.

The worship of Dionysus took place not in temples or wild places, but in the theatres, the plays put on about him were acts of worship and the forerunners of today's "Passion Plays." Dionysus was killed, but because he had overcome death, he rose again. As the god of the vine he dies each year and then resurrects. His rites were held in spring, when the vines put forth new shoots. In all the numerous myths having to do with resurrection, the element that causes the resurrection is love.

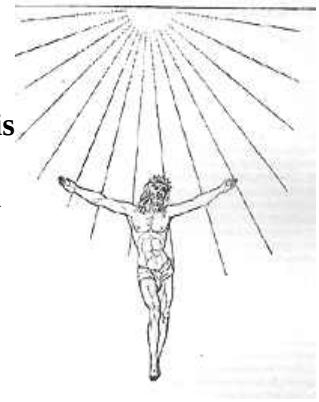
SEASONAL ASSOCIATIONS

Each season of the year is associated with a direction and time of day. Spring is associated with an eastern direction and the dawn. This is in honor of the goddess of spring and the east, Eostre. The time of dawn (new beginnings or rebirth) is also associated with her, since she was also called goddess of the dawn. Pagan Anglo-Saxons made offerings of colored eggs to this goddess Eostre. They placed them among grave goods in burials, as a symbol of rebirth. Egyptians also placed eggs in tombs and pagan Greeks placed eggs on the fresh graves of their loved ones to ensure resurrection of the dead by the magic associated with the eggs.

VARIOUS CELEBRATIONS AND BELIEFS

In Mexico, in the Aztec capital of Tenochtitlan is the Templo Mayor, a pyramid surmounted by two symmetrical temples. This pyramid has been called a functioning astronomical observatory whose main purpose was to announce the equinoxes. The fact that the Aztecs aligned their principal religious structure with the equinoctial sunrise is partly to be explained by the fact that they celebrated the main festival of the god Xipe Totec at the vernal equinox.

In the Amazon, the equinoxes coincide with the start of the two rainy seasons- one in March, the other in September. The Desana and Barasana Indians see connections between everything that happens on Earth - and particularly, the availability of fish and game animals with what they see in the sky. They see the night sky as a great brain, with its two hemispheres divided by the Milky Way. According to their myths, on the First Day the Sun Father fertilized the world at its center by creating a perfectly vertical rod. It was from this spot that the first people emerged. This place is the equator. Each spring and fall equinox, when the Sun is directly overhead, and an upright staff casts no shadow, these Indians believe the Sun's rays are again directly penetrating the Earth, making the world fertile and new.



I think you get the idea; "new birth or raising from the dead" and no greater time could be found to commemorate such "myth" that at the same time the earth was re-awakeing from the "dead of winter"...the Spring Equinox.

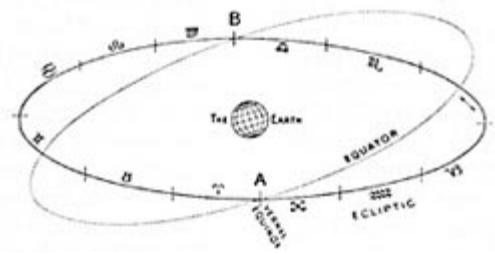
THE SUN DIES ON THE CROSS...TO BE LATER PERSONIFIED INTO THE SON THAT DIES ON THE CROSS



By now you have read enough to know the ancients looked to the Heavens and were in wonder at what they saw and in order to make sense out of the forces of the Heavens and it's influence upon them and Nature often resorted to symbolism, myth, and personification of these forces and observations which gave them a sense of understanding of these things. Since all nations saw the same things in the sky and the Heavens then there was to be expected very similar understanding of these events around the world as recorded in almost every nation under the sun and this is exactly what we find if we look. Christianity is not immune to such things as well as you are finding out. What should be of concern for us is the concept that we find in almost all of these nations that the SUN, PERSONIFIED AS "THE SON OF THE SUN," WAS CRUCIFIED IN THE HEAVENS BEFORE THE FOUNDATION OF THE WORLD!

Now for a little reviews. When the Sun reached his extreme Southern limit in the sky, then his career was ended and it was assumed by primitive man that the Sun had been overcome by his enemies. The Sun was dead. If you remember in our study on the Winter Solstice that the Sun, for 3 days a year, remains motionless in the sky. It does not move lower on the horizon in its track across the sky nor does it begin its upward journey either. The Sun remains "dead" for 3 days. Again if you remember this was the origin of the "descent into hell" stories as the Sun was submitted to the the "Dark-Evil" or the "D-Evil" (Devil). The powers of darkness, and of winter, which had sought in vain to wound him, have at length won the victory: The bright Sun of summer is finally slain, crucified in the heavens, and pierced by the arrow, spear or thorn of winter. If need be refresh yourself with our articles on the "Son or Sun of God" as you see for yourself how the Sun was submitted to the "cross" of the equinoxes and later personified into the "Son" who was submitted to the same "cross of the equinoxes."

The intersection of the 4 equinoxes is represented as a "cross" by primitive man. As the Sun was placed on this cross it was easily seen and understood by primitive man that the Sun is divided up into 4 parts, or should I say that the Sun divides the year into 4 parts (spring, summer, autumn, winter...easily seen in the picture above). Pictured this way the Sun as on the cross was understood to be "crucified" by primitive man. When you then remember how the Sun, when personified by the ancients, became the Son then you have the Son on the Cross. In the black and white graphic we see what the Anciens knew; namely, that the plane of the zodiac intersects the celestial equator of the earth at an angle of approximately 23° 28´. The two points of intersection (A and B) are called the equinoxes and from this they reasoned the "crossing" of these two intersections as the Sun submitted to this cross in the Heavens (remember the earth was thought to be the center of the Universe at that time). When you personify the "Sun" into the "Son" then we have the "Son on the Cross." Oh by the way Jesus was crucified on a single stake by the Romans but the myth must live!

The crucifixion of the Sun-gods is simply the power of Darkness triumphing over the "Lord of Light," and Winter overpowering the Summer. It was at the Winter Solstice that the ancients wept for Tammuz, the fair Adonis, and other Sun-gods, who were put to death by the boar, slain by the "thorn" of winter (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 13).

Other versions of the same myth tell us of Eurydike stung to death by the hidden serpent, or Sifrit smitter by Hagene (the Thorn), of Isfendiyar slain by the thorn or arrow of Rustem, or Achilleus vulnerable only in the heel, of Brychild enfolded within the dragon's coils, of Meleagros dying as the torch of doom is burnt out, of Baldur, the brave and pure, smitter by the fatal mistletoe, and of Chrishna and others being crucified.

These solar myths all began in Summer and later carried on in Egyptian mythology, Set, the destroyer, triumphs in the West which was understood as the Sun dying at sunset where Darkness triumphed over the Light of the Sun. Set is the personification of Darkness and Winter, and the Sun-god whom he puts to death, is Horus the Savior (himself the "son" of Osiris himself the personified Sun) (Renouf, Hibbert Lectures, pp. 112-115).

Throughout this tale, the Sun-god was but fulfilling his doom as seen in the heavens. This natural laws of the universe were interpreted by primitive man and later personified as we have seen into mythos of his culture. Everyone on the planet saw the same things and this explains the uncanny similarities of the Sun-Myths around the globe from thousands of years ago. The suffering of a violent death was a necessary part of the mythos; and, when his hour had come, he must meet his doom, as surely as the Sun, once risen, must go across the sky, and then sink down into his bread beneath the earth or sea. It was a fate from which there was no escaping.

THE DEVELOPING MYTHS OF THE NATIONS

Answer for yourself: Has the Gospel borrowed historical accounts describing Jesus from previous Eastern scriptures which existed centuries before the Bible?

Krishna was depicted as if crucified. The Persian remembered only the atoning sufferings on the cross of Mithras the Mediator. Aztecs prayed for the return of their crucified saviour, Quexalcoatl, and were rewarded with Cortez. Caucasians chanted praises to their slain Divine Intercessor, Prometheus, for voluntarily offering himself upon the cross for the sins of a fallen race. Yet the Christian disciple hugs to his bosom the bloody cross of the murdered Jesus, confident that only one god ever died for the sins of man.

To retain their following, Christianity is based on unchangeable dogmas which disciples must accept to the exclusion of all knowledge adverse to their own creed. Whenever they are able they actually destroy contrary evidence for fear of rivalry. Then they magnify their own religion to a unique position above all others.

The earlier Christian saints, having determined like Paul, to know only Jesus Christ and him crucified, made stern efforts to obliterate from the page of history facts damaging to their case.

A report on the Hindu religion, made out by a deputation from the British Parliament, sent to India to examine their sacred books and monuments, was left in the hands of a Christian bishop at Calcutta, with instructions to forward it to England. On its arrival in London, it was so horribly mutilated as to be scarcely recognizable. The account of the crucifixion was gone. The inference is patent.

The disciples of the Christian faith have burnt books, blotted out passages and destroyed opposing testaments which suggested the opposite of their belief. Not only that, they have demolished monuments showing crucifixions of previous atoning gods so that they are now unknown. Hence, the disbelief of Christians when other cases are mentioned.

For the same reasons stated above the dates of the occurrence of these crucifixions are doubtful and because chronology before the time of Alexander the Great (330 BC) is far from certain, and the dating of icons, especially from distant or isolated cultures is uncertain. Even mainstream studies of the ancient Near East are involved in controversy over dates, Peter James for example claiming in a well argued case that several centuries have been mistakenly inserted into near Eastern chronologies. It is certain these crucifixions occurred before the time of Christ, but their exact date cannot be fixed with absolute certainty but fairly accurate estimates are given.

These crucifixions are not conceded as actual occurrences. The objective is not to prove them real events but simply that the belief in the crucifixion of gods was prevalent long before the crucifixion of Christ. To establish this point then six will prove it as well as sixteen. Indeed, one case is sufficient. The reader is left to decide.

EXAMINING THE EVIDENCES

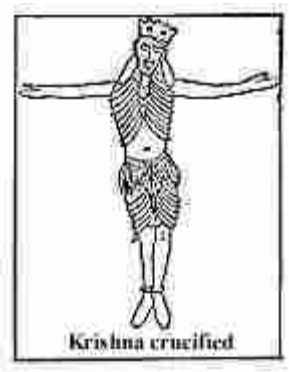
Osiris And Hours Pre 4,000 BC.

Osiris, the Egyptian Savior, was crucified in the heavens and was the "pattern" for all other crucified saviors which would follow; including his son Horus. To the Egyptian the cross was a symbol of immortality, an emblem of the Sun, and the god himself was crucified to the tree, which denoted his fructifying power (Ibid. pp. 115, 125).

Horus was also crucified in the heavens. He was represented, like Chrishna and Christ Jesus, with outstretched arms in the vault of heaven (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 157).

As a side note the principal Phenician deity, El, which says Parkhurst, in his Hebrew Lexicon, "was the very name the heathens gave to their god Sol, their Lord or Ruler of the Hosts of Heaven," was called "The Preserver (Savior) of the World," for the benefit of which he offered a mystical sacrifice (Wake, Phallism, p. 55). Notice again the connection between the Sun's (Sol's) sacrifice on behalf of mankind!

Thulis of Egypt 1700 BC.

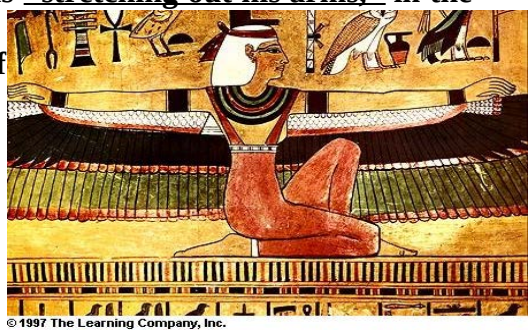


Thulis of Egypt, whence comes Ultima Thule, died the death of the cross about thirty-five hundred years ago. Ultima Thule was the island which marked the ultimate bounds of the extensive empire of this legitimate descendant of the gods. This Egyptian saviour appears also to have been known as Zulis. His history is curiously illustrated in the sculptures, made seventeen hundred years BC of a small, retired chamber lying nearly over the western adytum of the temple. Twenty-eight lotus plants near his grave indicate the number of years he lived on the earth. After suffering a violent death, he was buried, but rose again, ascended into heaven, and there became the judge of the dead, or of souls in a future state. He came down from heaven to benefit mankind, and that he was said to be full of grace and truth.

Crite of Chaldaea 1200 BC.

The Chaldeans have noted in their sacred books the crucifixion of a god with the above name. He was also known as the Redeemer, and was styled the Ever Blessed Son of God, the saviour of the Race, the Atoning Offering for an Angry God. When he was offered up, both heaven and earth were shaken to their foundations.

Chrishna 1200 BC.



Chrishna, the crucified Savior of the Hindoos, is a personification of the Sun crucified in the heavens. One of the names of the Sun in the Vedic hymns is "Vishnu" and it is very important to know that in the Rig-Veda the god Vishnu is often named a a manifestation of Solar Energy, or rather as a form of the Sun (Indian Wisdom, p. 322).

Chrishna is Vishnu is human form. Chrishna says: "I am Vishnu, Brahma, Indra, and the source as well as the destruction of things, the creator and the annihilator of the whole aggregate of existences (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 131).

In the hymns of the Rig-Veda the Sun is spoken of as "stretching out his arms," in the heavens, "to bless the world, and to rescue it from the terror of darkness." This reminds me of many of the examples of Isis with the Sun-disk on her head as she "stretches out her arms.

Attis of Phrygia 1170 BC.

Speaking of this crucified Messiah, the Anacalypsis informs us that several histories are given of him, but all concur in representing him as having been an atoning offering for sin. And the Latin phrase suspensus lingo, found in his history, indicates the manner of his death. He was suspended on a tree, crucified, buried and rose again.

Tammuz of Mesopotamia 1160 BC.

Tammuz of Mesopotamia is dated around 1160 BC. Tammuz was a god of Assyria, Babylonia and Sumeria where he was known as Dumuzi. He is commemorated in the name of the month of June, Du'uzu, the fourth month of a year which begins at the spring equinox. The fullest history extant of this saviour is probably that of Ctesias (400 BC), author of Persika. The poet has perpetuated his memory in rhyme.

- Trust, ye saints,
- your Lord restored,
- Trust ye in your risen Lord;
- For the pains which Tammuz endured Our salvation have procured.

Tammuz was crucified as an atonement offering: Trust ye in God, for out of his loins salvation has come unto us. Julius Firmicus speaks of this God rising from the dead for the salvation of the world. This saviour which long preceded the advent of Christ, filled the same role in sacred history.

Wittoba is represented in his story with nail-holes in his hands and the soles of his feet. Nails, hammers and pincers are constantly seen represented on his crucifixes and are objects of adoration among his followers, just as the iron crown of Lombardy has within it a nail claimed to be of his true original cross, and is much admired and venerated for that reason. The worship of this crucified God prevails chiefly in the Travancore and other southern states of India in the region of Madura.

Hesus of the Celtic Druids 834 BC.

Around 834 B.C.E. the Celtic Druids depict their god Hesus as having been crucified with a lamb on one side and an elephant on the other, and that this occurred long before the Christian era. The elephant, being the largest animal known, was chosen to represent the magnitude of the sins of the world, while the lamb, from its proverbial innocent nature, was chosen to represent the innocence of the victim, the god offered as a propitiatory sacrifice. We have the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world. The Lamb of God could therefore have been borrowed from the Druids. This legend was found in Gaul long before Jesus Christ was known to history.

Indra of Tibet 725 BC.

Indra, the crucified Savior worshipped in Nepal and Tibet, is identical with Chrishna, the Sun. Indra, who was represented as a crucified god, is also the Sun. No sooner is he born than he speaks to his mother. Like Apollo and all other Sun-gods he has "golden locks (reminescent of the Sun rays of golden light," and like them he is possessed of an inscrutable wisdom. He is also born of a virgin...the Dawn. This Tibetan saviour is shown nailed to the cross. There are five wounds, representing the nail-holes and the piercing of the side. The antiquity of the story is beyond dispute. Marvellous stories are told of the birth of the Divine Redeemer. His mother was a virgin of black complexion, and hence his complexion was of the ebony hue, as in the case of Christ and some other sin-atoning saviours. He descended from heaven on a mission of benevolence, and ascended back to the heavenly mansion after his crucifixion. He led a life of strict celibacy, which, he taught, was essential to true holiness. He inculcated great tenderness toward all living beings. He could walk upon the water or upon the air; he could foretell future events with great accuracy. He practised the most devout contemplation, severe discipline of the body and mind, and completely subdued his passions. He was worshiped as a god who had existed as a spirit from all eternity, and his followers were called Heavenly Teachers. Chrishna and Indra are one (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. i. pp. 88, 341; vol. ii. p. 131).

Bali of Orissa 725 BC.

In Orissa, in Asia, they have the story of a crucified God, known by several names, including the above, all of which, we are told, signify Lord Second, his being the second person or second member of the trinity. Most of the crucified gods occupied that position in a trinity of gods, the Son, in all cases, being the atoning offering. This God Bali was also called Baliu, and sometimes Bel. Monuments of this crucified God, bearing great age, may be found amid the ruins of the magnificent city of Mahabalipore, partially buried amongst the figures of the temple.

Iao of Nepal 622 BC.

Next we find the crucified Iao around 622 B.C.E. in Nepal. Iao (Divine Love personified) is the crucified Adonis, the Sun. The Lord and Savior was called Iao (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 113). Iao was crucified on a tree in Nepal. The name of this incarnate god and oriental saviour occurs frequently in the holy bibles and sacred books of other countries. Some suppose that Iao is the root of the name of the Jewish God, Yehouah (Jehovah), often abbreviated to Yeho.

Mithras of Persia 600 BC.

This Persian God was slain upon the cross to make atonement for mankind, and to take away the sins of the world. He was born on the twenty-fifth day of December, and crucified on a tree. Christian writers both speak of his being slain, and yet both omit to speak of the manner in which he was put to death. And the same policy has been pursued with respect to other crucified gods of the pagans, as we have shown.

Devatat of Siam, Ixion of Rome, Apollonius of Tyana in Cappadocia, are all reported to have died on the cross.

Alcestos of Euripides 600 BC.

A less usual crucified God was Alcestos, who was female, the only example of a feminine God atoning for the sins of the world upon the cross. The doctrine of the trinity and atoning offering for sin was inculcated as a part of her religion.

Quezalcoatl of Mexico 587 BC.

Historical authority of the crucifixion of this Mexican god is explicit, unequivocal and ineffaceable. The evidence is tangible, and indelibly engraven upon metal plates. One of these plates represents him as having been crucified on a mountain. Another represents him as having been crucified in the heavens, as St Justin tells us Christ was. Sometimes he is represented as having been nailed to a cross, sometimes with two thieves hanging with him, and sometimes as hanging with a cross in his hand.

Prometheus 547 B.C.

The story of the crucifixion of Prometheus was allegorical, for Prometheus was only a title of the Sun, expressing providence or foresight, wherefore being crucified in the extremities of the earth, signified originally no more than the restriction of the power of the Sun during the winter months (Knight, Ancient Art and Mythology, p. 88). The crucifixion of Prometheus of Caucasus, described by Seneca, Hesiod, and other writers, states that he was nailed to an upright beam of timber, to which were affixed extended arms of wood, and that this cross was situated near the Caspian Straits. The modern story of this crucified God, which has him bound to a rock for thirty years, while vultures preyed upon his vitals, is a Christian fraud. The poet, in portraying his propitiatory offering, says: "Lo! streaming from the fatal tree His all atoning blood, Is this the Infinite?–Yes, 'tis he, Prometheus, and a god! Well might the sun in darkness hide, and veil his glories in, when God, the great Prometheus, died for man the creature's sin." It is doubtful whether there is to be found in the whole range of Greek letters deeper pathos than that of the divine woe of the beneficent demigod Prometheus, crucified on his Scythian crags for his love to mortals. When he dies: That the whole frame of nature became convulsed. The earth shook, the rocks were rent, the graves were opened, and in a storm, which seemed to threaten the dissolution of the universe, the solemn scene forever closed, and Our Lord and saviour Prometheus gave up the ghost. The cause for which he suffered was his love for the human race. The whole story of Prometheus' crucifixion, burial and resurrection was acted in pantomime in Athens five hundred years before Christ, which proves its great antiquity. Minutius Felix, one of the most popular Christian writers of the second century addresses the people of Rome: Your victorious trophies not only represent a simple cross, but a cross with a man on it, and this man St. Jerome calls a god. These coincidences are more proof that the tradition of the crucifixion of gods has been very long prevalent among the heathen.

Quirinius of Rome 506 BC.

The crucifixion of Quirinus the Roman saviour is remarkable for the parallel features to that of the Judaean saviour, not only in the circumstances of his crucifixion, but also in much of his antecedent life. He is represented, like Christ:

- As having been conceived and brought forth by a virgin.
- His life was sought by the reigning king, Amulius.
- He was of royal blood, his mother being of kingly descent.
- He was put to death by wicked hands or crucified. At his mortal exit the whole earth is said to have been enveloped in darkness, as in the case of Christ, Krishna, and Prometheus.
- And finally he is resurrected, and ascends back to heaven

Ixion 400 BC.

Ixion was crucified on a wheel, the rim representing the world, and the spokes constituting the cross. He bore the burden of the world, the sins of the world, on his back while suspended on the cross. He was therefore called the crucified spirit of the world. Ixion, who was bound to the wheel (Sun wheel), was none other than the god Sol, crucified in the heavens. The Sun, as climbing the heights of heaven, was sometime interpreted by men as the Sun being "arrogant" since for himself he made exorbitant claims. He was punished by being bound to a "fiery cross." Stories were invented of the Sun revolving daily on a four-spoked cross (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 27). Whatever be the origin of the name, Ixion is the "Sun of noonday," crucified in the heavens, whose four-spoked wheel is seen whirling in the highest heaven. So was Ixion bound on the fiery wheel, and the sons of men see the flaming spokes day by day as it whirls in the big heaven. The "wheel" upon which Ixion and criminals were said to have been executed was a cross, the name of the thing was dissembled among Christians; it was a St. Andrew's cross, of which two spokes confined the arms, and two the legs.

It is curious that Christian writers will recount a long list of miracles and remarkable incidents in the life of Apollonius of Tyana, the Cappadocian saviour, forming a parallel to those of the Christian saviour, yet say not a word about his crucifixion.

Christian writers find it necessary to omit the crucifixion of these saviours fearing the telling would lessen the spiritual force of the crucifixion of Christ, which has to be unique. They thus exalted the tradition of the crucifixion into the most important dogma of the Christian faith. Hence, their efforts to conceal from the public the fact that it is of pagan origin.

Mackey's Lexicon of Freemasonry says that Freemasons secretly taught the doctrine of the crucifixion, atonement and resurrection preceded the Christian era, and that similar doctrines were taught in all the ancient mysteries.

THE ALLEGORICAL REPRESENTATION OF THE GENERATIVE AND DESTRUCTIVE ATTRIBUTES OF THE SUN-GODS

Hercules is torn limb from limb; and in this catastrophe we see the "blood-red sunset" which closes the career of Hercules (Cox, Tales of Ancient Greece, p. xxxii). The Sun-god Hercules cannot rise to life of the blessed gods until he has been slain. The morning cannot come until Eos who closed the previous day has faded away and died in the black abyss of night.

Achilleus and Meleagros represent alike the "short-lived Sun," whose course is one of toil for others, ending in an early death, after a series of wonderful victories alternating with periods of darkness and gloom (Ibid., p. xxxiii). In the tales of the Trojan war, it is related of Archilleus that he expires at the Skaian, or western gates of the evening. He is slain by Paris, who here appears as the Pani, or dark power, who blots out the light of the Sun from the heaven

We have the story of Adonis, born of a virgin, and known in the countries where he was worshipped as "The Savior of Mankind," killed by the wild boar, afterwards "rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven." This Adonis, Adonai in Hebrew or "My Lord," is simply the Sun. He is crucified in the heavens put to death by the wild boar (personified Winter). "Babylon called Typhon or Winter 'the boar;' they said he killed Adonis or the fertile Sun" (Muller, Science of Religion, p. 186).

The Crucified Dove worshipped by the ancients, was none other than the crucified Sun. Adonis was called the "Dove." At the ceremonies in honor of his resurrection from the dead, the devotees said, "Hail to the Dove! the Restorer of Light" (Calemt, Fragments, vol. ii. pp. 21-22). This Crucified Dove" is described by Pindar, the great lyric poet of Greece, born about 522 B.C.E.

"We read in Pinda of the venerable bird Iynx bound to the wheel, and of the pretended punishment of Ixion. But this rotation was really no punishment, being, as Pindar saith, voluntary (compare to Jesus' death), and prepared by himself and for himself; or if it was, it was appointed in derision of his false pretensions, whereby he gave himself out as the crucified spirit of the world." "The four spokes represent St. Andrew's cross, adapted to the four limbe extended, and furnish perhaps the oldest illusion to the crucifixion. The same cross of St. Andrew was the Taw (T), which Ezekiel commands them to mark upon the foreheads of the faithful, as appears from all Israelitish coins whereon that letter is engraved. The same idea was familiar to Lucian, who calls T the letter of crucifixion. Certainly, the veneration of the cross is very ancient. Iynx, the bird of Mautic inspiration, bound to the four-legged wheel, given the notion of Divine Love crucified. The wheel denotes the world, of which she is the spirit, and the cross the sacrifice made for that world" (Pindar, Nimrod: vol. i. p. 278; Higgins, Anacalypsis, p. 503).

This "Divine Love," of whom Nimrod speaks, was "The First-begotten Son" of the Platonists. The crucifixion of "Divine Love" is often found among the Greeks. Ionah or Juno, according to the Iliad, was bound with fetters, and suspended in space, between heaven and earth. Ixion, Prometheus, Apollo of Miletus were all crucified. At Miletus was the crucified Apollo who overcomes the Serpent of evil and the evil principle in the world.

Semi-Ramis was both a queen of unrivaled celebrity, and also a goddess, worshipped under the form of a Dove. Her name signifies the "Supreme Dove." She is said to have been slain by the last survivor of her sons, while others say, she flew away as a dove. In both Grecian and Hindu histories this mystical queen Semiramis is said to have fought a battle on the banks of the Indus, with a king called Staurobates, in which she was defeated, and from which she flew away in the form of a Dove.

Of this Nimrod says:

"The name Staurobates, the king by whom Semiramis was finally overpowered, alluded to the cross on which she perished," and that, "the crucifixion was made into a glorious mystery by her infaturated adorers"

Make no mistake about it. This Oriental story has had unbelievable impact and influence in almost every nation of the world. These words apply to Christ Jesus , as well as Semiramis, according to Christian Father Ignatius. In his Epistle to the Church of Ephesus, he says: "Now the virginity of Mary, and he who was born of her, was kept in secret from the prince of this world, as was also the death of our our Lord: three of the mysteries the most spoken of throughout the world, yet done in secret by God."

Here we have the crucified Dove, the Sun, for it is well known that the ancients personified the Sun female as well as male.

We also have the fable of the Crucified Rose, illustrated in the jewel of the Rosicrucians. The jewel of the Rosicrucians is formed of a transparent red stone, with cross on one side and a red rose on the other thus forming a crucified rose. This idea stems from the fable of Adonis who was the Sun whom we have seen often crucified whereupon he was then changed into a red rose by Venus (The Rosicrucians, p. 260).

The emblem of the Templars is a red rose on a cross. Often we find this symbol surrounded with a glory, and placed on a calvary. This is the Naurutz, Natsir, or Rose of Isuren, of Tamul, or Sharon, or the Water Rose, the Lily Padma, Pena, Lotus, crucified in the heavens for the salvation of man (Ibid.). The Knights Templars also have a "Cross and the Crown" symbol. A frequent Masonic symbol often seen on churches or religious literature such as the "Bible Tract Watchtower" magazine of the Jehovah's Witness. Charles Tess Russell was a 32nd Degree Freemason. As well as Mary Baker Eddy's Christian Science. Her husband was a Freemason. This symbol can be found on the side of USC Medical Center. The Cross represents the "Cross of the Zodiac" or the Separation of the four seasons. The Crown represents the SUN dying on the cross of the zodiac.

Answer for yourself: Is it just coincidence that Jesus Christ was called the Rose, the Rose of Sharon?

Jesus was believed by his followers to be the incarnation of Divine Wisdom. He was the son of Mair or Maria. He was the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley, which bloweth in the month of his mother Maia. Thus, when the angel Gabriel gives the salutations to the Virgin, he presents her with the lotus or lily; as may be seen in hundreds of old pictures in Italy. We see therefore that Adonis, "the Lord," "the Virgin-born," "the Crucified," "the Resurrected Dove," "the Restorer of Light," is one and the same with the "Rose of Sharon," the crucified Christ Jesus.

Plato (429 B.C.E.) in his Pimaeus, philosophizing about the Son of God says:

"The next power to the Supreme God was decussated or figured in the shape of a cross on the universe."

This brings to recollection the doctrine of certain so-called Christian heretics, who maintained that Christ Jesus was crucified in the heavens.

The Chrestos was the Logos, the Sun was the manifestation of the Logos or Wisdom to men; or, as it was held by some, was his peculiar habitation. The Sun being crucified at the time of the winter solstice was represented by the young man playing the Bull (emblem of the Sun) in the Mithraic ceremonies. The Chrest was the Logos, or Divine Wisdom, or a portion of divine wisdom incarnate; in this sense he is really the Sun or the solar power incarnate, and to him everything applicable to the Sun will apply.

Lund, in his Monumental Christianity, provides a great picture of the Christian Savior crucified in the heavens. The pattern of the illustrations can be traced to Chrishna who is also represented crucified in "space." This is exactly displayed in the form of a Romish crucifix, but not fixed to a piece of wood, though the legs and feet are put together in the usual way. There is a glory over the top of it, coming from above, not shining from the figure, as is generally seen in a Roman crucifix. It has a pointed Parthian coronet instead of a crown of thorns. All the avatars, or incarnations of Vishnu, are painted with Ethiopian or Parthian coronets. For these reasons the Christian author will not own that it is a representation of the "True Son of Justice," for he was not crucified in space; but whether it was intended to represent Chrishna, Wittoba, or Jesus, it tells a secret: it shows that someone was represented crucified in the heavens, and undoubtedly has something to do with "The next power to the Supreme God," who, according to Plato, "was decussated or figured in the shape of a cross on the universe." The Sun-gods Apollo, Indra, Wittoba, or Chrishna, and Christ Jesus, are represented as having their feet pierced with nails (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 28).

Answer for yourself: Who was the crucified god whom the ancient Romans worshipped, and whom they, according to Justin Martyr, represented as a man on a cross?

Answer for yourself: Can we doubt, after what we have seen, that he was this same crucified Sol, whose birthday they annually celebrated on 25th of December?

In the poetical tales of the ancient Scandinavians, the same legend is found. Frey, the Deity of the Sun, was fabled to have been killed, at the time of the winter solstice, by the same boar who put the god Adonis to death, therefore a boar was annually offered to him at the great feast of Yule (Knight, Anct. Art and Myth, pp. 87-88). "Baldur the Good," son of the supreme god Odin, and the virgin-goddess Frigga, was also put to death by the sharp thorn of winter.

The ancient Mexicans crucified Savior, Quetzalcoatle, another personification of the Sun, was sometimes represented as crucified in space, in the heavens, in a circle of nineteen figures, the number of the metonic cycle. A serpent (emblem of evil, darkness, and winter) is depriving him of the organ of generation (Higgins, Anacalypsis, vol. ii. p. 32).

It is a well known fact that Christ Jesus, and many of the heathen saviors, healers, and preserving gods, were represented in the form of a Serpent. This is owing to the fact that, in one of its attributes, the Serpent was an emblem of the Sun (think of Moses and the serpent on the cross...the Sun crucified). It may, at first, appear strange that the Serpent should be an emblem of evil, and yet also an emblem of the beneficent divinity; but, as Prof. Renouf remarks, in his Hibbert Lectures, "The moment we understand the nature of a myth, all impossibilities, contradictions, and immoralities disappear."

The serpent is an emblem of evil when represented with his deadly sting; he is the emblem of eternity when represented casting off his skin; and an emblem of the Sun when represented with his tail in his mouth, thus forming a circle. This idea is quite consistent with the ideas entertained by the Phenicians as to the Serpent, which they supposed to have the quality of putting off its old age, and assuming a second youth (Sanchoniation: quoted by Wake: Phallism, p. 43). This idea even existed in the Americas. The great century of the Aztecs was encircled by a serpent grasping its own tail, and the great calendar stone is entwined by serpents bearing human heads in their distended jaws. The annual passage of the Sun, through the signs of the zodiac, being in an oblique path, resembles, or at least the ancients thought so, the tortuous movements of the Serpent, and the facility possessed by this reptile of casting off his skin and producing out of itself a new covering every year, bore some analogy to the termination of the old year and the commencement of the new year. Accordingly, all the ancient spheres: Persians, Indian, Egyptian, Barbaric, Mexican, etc., were surrounded by the figure of a serpent holding its tail in its mouth (Squire: Serpent Symbol, p. 249).

Thus there came to be, not only good, but also bad, serpents, both of which are referred to in the narrative of the Hebrew exodus, but still more clearly in the struggle between good and the bad serpents of Persian mythology, which symbolized Ormuzd, or Mithra, and the evil spirit Ahriman (Wake, Phallism, p. 42).

As the Dove and the Rose, emblems of the Sun, were represented on the cross, so was the Serpent (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. p. 128). The famous "Brazen Serpent," said to have been "set up: by Moses in the wilderness, is called in the Targum (the Aramaic versions of the Old Testament) the Savior! It was probably a serpentine crucifix, as is called a "cross" by Justin Martyr. The crucified serpent denoted the Phallos, or the Sun after it had lost is power. It is the Sun in winter, crucified on a tree, which denoted its fructifying power. Being the most intimately connected with the reproduction of life on earth, the Linga became the symbol under which the Sun, invoked with a thousand names, has been worshipped throughout the world as the restorer of the powers of nature after the long sleep or death of Winter. In the brazen Serpent of the Pentateuch, the two emblems of the Cross and the Serpent, the quiescent and energizing Phallos, are united (Cox, Aryan Mythology, vol. ii. pp. 113-118). As Mr. Wake remarks, "There can be no doubt that both the Pillar (Phallus) and the Serpent were associated with many of the Sun-gods of antiquity (Wake, Phallism, p. 60).

This is seen often when the serpent is represented with rays of glory surrounding its head.

The Ophrites, who venerated the serpent as an emblem of Christ Jesus, are said to have maintained that the serpent of Genesis, who brought wisdom into the world, was Christ Jesus. The brazen serpent was called the Word by the Chaldee paraphrast. The Word, or Logos, was Divine Wisdom, which was crucified; thus we have the cross, or Linjga, or Phallus, with the serpent upon it. Besides considering the serpent as the emblem of Christ Jesus, or of the Logos, the Ophites are said to have revered it as the cause of all the arts of civilized life. Several females have been believed to have been selected and impregnated by the Holy Ghost, and is was, in some cases, the form of a serpent which was the form the Holy Ghost chose to impregnate them. This was the incarnation of the Logos.

The serpent was held in great veneration by the ancients, who, considered it as the symbol of the beneficent Deity, and an emblem of eternity. As such it has been variously expressed on ancient sculptures and medals in various parts of the globe.

Although generally, it did not always, symbolize the god Sun, or the power of which the Sun is an emblem; but, invested with various meanings, it entered widely into the primitive mythologies. As Mr. Squire observes:

"It typified wisdom, power, duration, the good and evil principles, life, reproduction; in short, in Egypt, Syria, Greece, India, China, Scahdinavia, America, everywhere on the globe, it has been a prominent emblem" (Squire, Serpent Symbols, p. 155).

The serpent was the symbol of Vishnu, the preserving god, the Savior, the Sun (Wake, Phallism in Acnt. Religs., p. 72). It was an emblem of the Sun-god Buddha, the Angel-Messiah (Ibid. p. 73; Squire, Serpent Symbol, p. 195). The Egyptian Sun-god Osiris, the Savior, is associated with the snake (Faber, Orig. Pagan Idol., in Squire, p. 158). The Persian Mithra, the Mediator, Redeemer, and Savior, was symbolized by the serpent (Ibid.). The Phenicians represented their beneficent Sun-god, Agathodemon, by a serpent (Kendrick, Egypt, vol. i. p. 375). The serpent was, among the Greeks and Romans, the emblem of a beneficent genius. Antipator of Sidon, calls the god of Ammon, the "Renowned Serpent" (Ibid.). The Grecian Hercules, the Sun-god, was symbolized as a serpent; and so was AEsculapius and Apollo. The Hebrews, at one time in their antiquity, worshipped the Sun-god Sol, and represented him in he form of a serpent. This the the "seraph" spoken of above as set up by Moses (Num. 21:3) and worshipped by the children of Israel. Seraph is the singular of seraphim, meaning Semilice (splendor, fire, light); emblematic of the fiery disk of the Sun, and which, under the name of Nehush-tan, "Serpent-dragon," was broken up by the reforming Hezekiah.

The principal god of the Aztecs was Tonac-actcoatl, which means the Serpent Sun (Squire, p. 161).

The Mexican virgin-born Lord and Savior, Quetzalcoatle, was represented in the form of a serpent. In fact, his names signifies "Feathered Serpent." Quetzaloatle was a personification of the Sun (Ibid. p. 185).

So we see it is relatively easy to connect the Serpent and the Sun, as corresponding symbols of the reproductive or creative powers.

The mysteries of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, in Egypt; Attis and Cybele, in Phrygia; Ceres and Proserpine, at Eleusis; of Venus and Adonis, in Phenicia; of Bona Dea and Priapus, in Rome, and all susceptible of one explanation. They are all set forth and illustrated, by solemn and impressive rites, and mystical symbols, the grand phenomenon of nature, especially as connected with the creation of things and the perpetuation of life. In all, it is worthy of remark, the Serpent was more or less conspicuously introduced, and always as symbolical of the invigorating or active energy of nature, the Sun.

In early Christian art Christ Jesus was represented as a crucified lamb. The crucified lamb is "the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world, and slain from the foundation of the world" (Lundy, Monumental Christianity, p. 185). In other words, the crucified lamb typifies the crucified Sun, for the lamb was another symbol of the Sun and one of the signs of the Zodiac (Aires which in those days had displaced Taurus in the precession of the equinox...the beginning of a new age had come with the prominence of Aires..the ram/lamb).

We find, then, that the stories of the crucifixion of the different so-called Saviors of mankind all melt into one, and that they are allegorical, for "Savior" was only a title of the "Sun," and his being put to death on the cross, signifies no more than the restruction of the power of the Sun in the winter quarter.

With Justin Martyr, then, we can say:

"There exists not a people, whether Greek or barbarian, or any other race of men, by whatsoever appellation or manners they may be distinguished, however ignorant of arts or agriculture, whether they dwell under the tents, or wander about in crowed wagons, among whom prayers are not offered up in the name of a CRUCIFIED SAVIOR to the Father and creator of all things" (Justin Martyr, Dialogue With Trypho, quoted in Gibbons' Rome, vol. i. p. 582).

Now you know...that these same concepts were applied to Jesus of the New Testament.

I guess Pontus Pilate said it best: "What is truth?"

TAURUS, THE BULL

The bull is the second symbol of a god in the heavens, the first symbol being Orion. As the spring equinox slipped into the stars of Taurus around 4,500 B.C.E., The Bull with its red eye became Horus (Horus was seen as the divine falcon but is linked to stars of Taurus), the son of Osiris to the ancient Egyptians (Jane B. Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt (London: Penguin, 1992), p. 112). During this equinox shift from the stars of Orion to Taurus, many gods of the ancient world appeared that were connected with or incarnated as bulls. The Phoenician bull-god, called father of men was given the title of Eh meaning "bull," but which translates into English as the word "god" (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 125).

El was worshipped throughout Syria where the Persians labeled the great red star in the eye of the Bull as their watcher of the east (Richard Hinckley Allen, Star Names; Their Lore and Meaning (New York Dover, 1963), p. 385). For them a great ancient cult surfaced, involving a figure called Mithras (The earliest cave paintings of this figure are thought to date from 23,000 B.C.E.) who was a god of the first order, one of military valor without rival, said to ride the solar chariot across the sky (New Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology (London: Hamlyn, 1968), p. 311). He was also known as or linked with Ahura Mazda (New Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology, p. 314), a Persian savior figure known as the bull slayer, a humanized version of the Bull who seized a great wild bull by the horns and rode him to exhaustion, after which he slayed the bull whose wounds and spilled blood produced life for the earth (Settegast, Plato Prehistorian (New York: Lindisfarne, 1986), p. 112). His worship involved a baptism of bull's blood where the initiate stood in a pit underneath a slotted platform and was showered with the blood of a sacrificial bull slaughtered on top of the platform. The initiate would bathe in this blood, making sure that it touched eyes, ears, mouth, and body, and drink it as a sacramental act. Thus the initiate emerged from this pit cleansed of sin, washed clean by the blood of the bull (Walker, Encyclopedia, p. 126).

The Egyptians also annually slew a sacred bull in atonement for the sins of the realm (Walker, Encyclopedia, p. 126). The concept was that the blood of one god, or the symbol of that god, could cleanse the sins of many. From this ritual arose the belief that blood had to be spilled if sins were to be forgiven, thus probably dictating that thousands of years later Christ was to die a bloody death. However, after two thousand or so years the constellation that had rose at the spring equinox slipped from Taurus the Bull into Aries the Ram, heralding the birth of yet another new god, this time creating a theological storm in Egypt which ultimately led to the Exodus where Moses, as Akhenaton, would leave with a modified and simplified Monotheism in rejection of the complexity of the Osiris based faith of his time in light of Aries surplanting Taurus as the ruling constellation at the spring/vernal equinox. Thus the Israelites where chastised by Moses when constructing the golden calf (symbolic of Taurus) when Moses was leading them away from such a bull centered faith to one centered on a ram/lamb (Aries as the new ruling constellation at the spring equinox). They distinguished themselves from the bull-worshippers by using the blood of the lamb as a sacred fluid and symbol. For Moses was leading his people, chosen with lamb's blood, to a re-new religion which was simpler than the one previous especially in light of the new age which had begun under the sign of Aries. This was the new world age marked by Aries and thus a new god was required which he called "Aten" but known today as YHWH. Returning from Mount Sinai with the new laws of the new world order, Moses was angered that his chosen people were looking backwards to the bull (Golden Calf) instead of forward to the lamb (G. de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill (Boston: Nonpareil Books, 1977), p.60).

It was as this time when Taurus, the bull and its key star "Aldebaran" slipped from the spring equinox after Orion has done so previously centuries earlier due to the precession of the Equinox that Horus was given a seat in the solar boat or in the Sun whereby the whole of the Egyptian religion passed from a stellar oriented faith to a solar orientated faith. We need to understand at the "death" of these stars when they failed to rise or be visible before the rising of the sun on these days of "ma'at" or balance when the length of light and darkness was equal (the equinoxes) the ancients interpreted the loss of the star as the "death" of the god and mourned his passing and loss of visibility on the spring equinox. This grief and fear lasted only until its reappearance later with much rejoicing as the "god" had been "reborn" and "resurrected" from the dead. This was the core belief about Orion/Osiris as well as Horus/Taurus as well but since Orion/Osiris was not on the ecliptic or the path of the sun (zodiac) he was relegated not the same as the solar gods who were in "the sun" and occupied a seat in the "netherworld" as the judge of the dead. The bull in these myths is seen as darkness or antilife, as it becomes the symbol of old religion making way for the god of Aries. The Bull as a god has long since lost his power, having slipped from the equinox position around 2,000 B.C.E., but it is from this period that the mythological symbolism was firmly stamped upon his celestial image.

ARIES, THE RAM

As the stars of Aries the Ram became the heliacal rising constellation for the spring equinox, thus placing it in the lead position of the zodiac, the concept of the tropical zodiac was also taking shape. Therefore Aries became the leading sign of the tropical zodiac, a designation that has never been altered even though the stars of Aries have long since lost this lead role, now belonging to the stars of Pisces.

History shows us that when the spring equinox moves into a new constellation, a new age and a new god emerge. This god is either the son of the older god, or a new concept represented by a new god, which springs forth from the collective unconscious. With the movement of the equinox from the stars of Taurus into the stars of Aries, which occurred in about 2,000 B.C.E., the movement was away from the sacred bull of the Egyptians and the god Horus (who had many forms-one of which was the bull) toward gods of a more Arian nature (Wallis E. A. Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol. 1 (New York: Dover Books, 1969), p. 493).

To the people of the Euphrates this new god was known as Tammuz Daum-uzei, the Only Son of Life, with the emphasis on the word only. The Israelites, thought to have emerged from Canaan, came forth with their god El, whose name was changed to YHWH (I am that I am) at the time when Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt (Magnus Magnusson, BC-The Archaeology of the Bible Lands (London: British Broadcasting Corporation, 1977). These gods were One-God monotheistic concepts with YHWH (Yahweh) using the blood of a lamb to mark and save his people from his wrath. The new Arian gods were solo creatures who shared their glory with no other.

Through precession the Sun's position at the equinox appears to shift backward through the zodiac. Once, around the time of Christ, the Sun rose with the stars of Aries. Now, the stars with which it rises are those of early Pisces. Later, when the Sun rises among the stars of Aquarius, anywhere from twenty to five hundred years from now, depending on your point of view, it will be known as the age of Aquarius.

The Egyptians by now were moving into their third god as they moved into what is called the period of the New Empire (around 2000 B.C.E.), which culminated with the position of the "king of the gods and lord of the thrones of the two lands", the god Amen-Ra (Wallis E. A. Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol. 1 (New York: Dover Books, 1969), p. 174). He was a new type of god for the Egyptians, for he also shared his glory with no other god. He was supreme. (Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol. 2, p. 5). Amen-Ra was a god with many forms, one of which was ram's horns, and he was called "Lord of the Head," and the Egyptians linked him to the stars of Aries (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 124) since now those stars rode the Chariot of the Sun (The stars of Aries rising with the spring equinox). He was the virile male and the holy phallus; stories or images of a ram in the thicket are considered by some to be sexual metaphors (Barbara Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets (San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1983), p. 841).

Ram imagery in the Old Testament is also linked to Yahweh. Indeed it is this image of a ram in a thicket which saves Abraham from sacrificing his son Isaac on the command of Yahweh. This was an important story for the new monotheistic religion as it showed that the male god of the ram desired animal sacrifices rather than the more ancient practice of human sacrifices.((Barbara Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets (San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1983), p. 841). The ram was sacred to the Israelites, who sacrificed the paschal lamb each year at Passover as a substitute for the primitive sacrifices of firstborn sons which Yahweh originally demanded in Exodus 13:2 ((Barbara Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets (San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1983), p. 526).

PISCES, THE FISHES

Pisces moved into the lead position in the Ring of Life around two thousand years ago, when the spring equinox heliacal rising slipped from Aries the Ram to Pisces the Fishes. There was never a clear distinction between these two constellations, as Pisces is so large, its two Fish reaching through the sky actually encompass the stars of Aries.

The coming of the age of Pisces, the new world order, was eagerly awaited, heralded in 6 B.C.E. by a triple conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in Pisces. In his fourth Eclogue, Virgil announced it would be the return of the golden age (De Santillana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill, p. 244). This conjunction was the astronomical highlight of the time, eagerly awaited and watched, and was later named, in Christian mythology, the Star of Bethlehem. This association is more of an attempt by Christianity to claim Christ as the herald of the new age, rather than having any real basis in historical facts.

But the fish was an ancient symbol long before it was adopted by the new god. It represented wisdom and was recognized as a female sign. The symbol for the fish was derived from the yoni. The Chinese Great Mother, called Kwan-yin, Yoni of Yonis, often appeared as a fish goddess (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 313). The Celts considered that eating fish would put new life in a womb (Green, Dictionary of Celtic Myth and Legends, p. 184). Their hero, Tuan, was eaten by a fish and the fish in turn was eaten by the queen of Ireland who, in the fullness of time, gave birth to him. Thus to eat of the salmon was also to grow in wisdom.

The Greeks incorporated the fish as a sacred symbol through Aphrodite, in her form as a fish goddess called Aphrodite Salacia (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 314). She was depicted as a fertile mother nursing a child, and her temples always contained ponds of fish. Her followers would eat fish on her holy day, which was Friday. They were known as the fish eaters, and this custom was adopted by the Catholic Church who decreed that the eating of fish on a Friday, considered abstinence from meat, was a holy act required of its followers.

As the spring equinox moved into Pisces, the ram god sent his son, Christ, to save the world, and he became the god of fishes. He was a fisherman fishing for men's souls. His disciples were fishermen and one of his miracles, which proved him god, was the miracle of the loaves and fishes, where he was said to have fed five thousand on just a few fish and some bread. The new religion adopted the sign of the Fish as their symbol. The cross belonged to the pagans and was not incorporated into Christian symbolism until after the sixth century C.E. (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, p. 188).

The arrival of any new age heralds more than just a change of gods, for it represents a change in the way humans see the world. One of the features of the Piscean new world order was that our concept of time and its cyclic nature became altered in our collective mind. The new god now ruled forever, and thus everything was measured before or after his incarnation. However, the concept of cycles, of there being an heir to every throne, that had been part of the myths of the Bull (Taurus) and the Ram (Aries), ended with Pisces. For Christ had no children and the only way to acknowledge the whirlpool created by precession (the sinking of the constellations below the horizon at the vernal equinox where they were no longer visible before the rising of the sun) was to talk about a second coming - who would ostensibly be the new god of Aquarius. For several centuries after Christ, Christians believed the second coming was immanent, forgetting that the cycle was several thousand years long. The cyclic order was crumbling, for the new god ruled forever. As previously mentioned, it was announced that the great Pan was dead, and Plutarch mused, in about 60 C.E., that oracles had ceased to give answers (De Santilana and von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill, p. 341). For our logic, under the new god, was no longer cyclic; therefore oracles could no longer predict. Euclidean geometry, logic, linear time, and the separatism of science had begun.

PLACE IN THE NATURAL CYCLE

Litha is the solar festival that marks the longest day of the year, with the sun rising and setting at its most northerly points. The summer quarter of the year runs from Beltane to Lughnassadh, so Litha stands at the midpoint of summer.

OSIRIS AND THE SUMMER SOLSTICE

Osiris was the Egyptian God of the earth and kingship, and by association with vegetation in general and in particular grain. The yearly drought in Egypt and the regular yearly flooding of the Nile were personified in the life of Osiris as seen in his death and resurrection which coincided with both celestial and agricultural events.

There are two solstices each year. The winter solstice, the shortest day of the year, occurs when the sun appears farthest south in the sky. The summer solstice, the longest day of the year, occurs when the sun appears farthest in the north. Egyptians were especially interested in the summer solstice because it marked the beginning of the Nile's flood season. Accurately predicting the floods was of such vital importance that the appearance of Sirius, which occurs around the time of the summer solstice, was recognized as the beginning of the Egyptian new year. The brightest star in the night sky, Sirius was the embodiment of Isis, sister and consort of the god Osiris, who appeared in the sky as Orion. Sirius first appeared in the dawn sky each year around the time of the summer solstice and just before the Nile's flood season. Ancient Egyptians learned to predict the summer floods by the disappearance of Orion from the night sky, followed by the first appearance of Sirius, the brightest star in the night sky, at dawn. In ancient theology, Egyptians saw Orion and Sirius as the heavenly embodiment of Osiris and Isis, two of their most important gods, who were believed to bring the life-giving floods each year. Egyptians believed Sirius was responsible for the rains, so it was vital to accurately predict its arrival. Sirius was the centerpiece of Egypt's 365-day solar calendar, and its appearance marked the beginning of the new year. The three bright stars forming the belt of Orion ,the hunter, were the celestial embodiment of Osiris, god of the dead, whose resurrection from the dead was pictured in the flooding of the Nile at the summer solstice which was a picture to them of God's salvation for the people of Egypt.

Orion, the picture of Osiris, was of dual importance to Egyptians. The constellation was believed to be the final resting place of pharaohs, where they joined forever with the gods of the sky. Orion also appeared in the night sky shortly before Sirius, which in turn heralded the arrival of the life-giving summer floods. Sirius represented Isis, Osiris' sister and consort, who trailed him across the sky just as she searched the land for his body in the most famous of Egyptian myths. Known as the Lord of Everything, Osiris symbolized the birth, growth, death, and rebirth of the natural world. In Egyptian mythology, Osiris was murdered and dismembered by his jealous brother, Seth, then briefly brought back to life by his sister and consort Isis to father the god Horus. Egyptians saw Osiris in the Moon, whose phases caused the all-important Nile to rise and fall each month, and in the constellation Orion, whose appearance was connected with the annual flood. As god of the dead, Osiris welcomed the recently deceased to their new world. King Khufu, eager to join Osiris as quickly as possible after his death, had a shaft constructed in his burial chamber pointing directly to Orion, which was considered to be the final resting place of the pharaohs.

Orion was Osiris, the green god who died and was reborn, and Sirius was Isis, his beloved. Its annual appearance just before sunrise near the summer solstice marked the rise of the Nile River. It was said that when the Nile flooded, Osiris and Isis were making love, and their sexual union fertilized the land. The archaeo-astronomer E.C. Krupp writes: "After disappearing from the night sky (for 70 days) Sirius eventually reappears in the dawn, before the sun come up. The first time this occurs each year is called the star's heliacal rising, and on this day Sirius remains visible for only a short time before the sky gets too bright to see it. In ancient Egypt this annual reappearance of Sirius fell close to the summer solstice and coincided with the time of the Nile's inundation. . . Sirius revives the Nile just as Isis revives Osiris. Her time in hiding from Seth is when Sirius is gone (70 days) from the night sky. She (Isis) gives birth to her son Horus, as Sirius gives birth to the new year, and in the texts Horus and the new year are equated. She is the vehicle for renewal of life and order. Shining for a moment, one morning in summer, she stimulates the Nile and starts the year."

The elements of the Osiris story was seen as symbolic of real events that happened in Egypt. With his original association to agriculture, his death and resurrection were seen as symbolic of the annual death and re-growth of the crops and the yearly flooding of the Nile which were signaled by Sirus and the Summer Solstice. This was interpreted as the resurrection of Osiris. The sun too with its daily re-birth and death was associated with Osiris.

With Osiris and his original association to agriculture, his death and resurrection were seen as symbolic of the annual death and re-growth of the crops and the yearly flooding of the Nile. The sun too with its daily re-birth and death was associated with Osiris.

Osiris rivalry with his brother Seth, the god of storms and the desert, was symbolic of the eternal war between the fertile lands of the Nile Valley and the barren desert lands just beyond. His death at the hand of his brother Seth represented the yearly Egyptian drought, while his miraculous rebirth, at the summer solstice, represented the flooding of the Nile Valley and its nourishment by the silt left on the land after the flood.

Several festivals during the year were held in Egypt, in celebration of Osiris. One, held in November, celebrated his beauty. Another, called the "Fall of the Nile" was a time of mourning. As the Nile receded, the Egyptians went to the shore to give gifts and show their grief over Osiris' death. When the Nile began to flood again, another festival honoring Osiris was held whereby small shrines were cast into the river and the priests poured sweet water in the Nile, declaring that the god was found again.

FURTHER DETAILS

The Summer Solstice is the longest day of the year and brings us to the zenith of the Sun god's power. He is celebrated and honored in order to ensure a large harvest. He is thanked for the Life-Giving Light that He brings.

This is also the time of the Great Battle of the Oak King and His twin, the Holly King. It is during this Battle that the Holly King, representing the darker, colder half of the year, slays the Oak King, who represents the lighter, warmer half of the year, in order to keep the wheel of the year spinning. The cycle of Life, Death and Rebirth is constantly flowing, always changing...never static. Such tradition honors the Green Man in all His masculinity. He is at the height of His reign and roams through the fields playing harmless pranks and games. Many celebrate this time with games and competition. It is a time for growing strong. The harvest is coming soon and the Winter months will be harsh. Many usually re-enact the Battle of the Oak and Holly Kings, more as a form of competition than a religious aspect. Honoring the Green Man is the main focus on this Sabbat.

Litha celebrates the height of the sun's power and the abundance of summer. Nature is alive, and fields and fruits are growing towards harvest, but the blessing is mixed, for once light reaches its apogee it can only decline. Litha is a fairly modern term for the summer solstice, and it may be derived from an Anglo-Saxon word for 'moon' that referred to the sixth and seventh months of the year. The Druidic name for the festival, Alban Heruin or 'Light of the Shore', is very appropriate for this turning point of the year, lying at the midpoint between "Light of the Earth" and "Light of the Water" (the Druidic terms for the equinoctial celebrations).

In the past, midsummer fires were lit for purification, protection and in the hope that the sun could be kept powerful for long enough to ensure a good harvest. People would leap over these fires in the belief that the crops would grow as high as they could jump. Drumming, dancing and singing were common, making this festival a noisy and social time. The full moon in June is known as the Mead or Honey Moon, and mead is a traditional drink for Litha, just as June is a popular time for weddings and hence honeymoons.

Litha honors the apex of Light, sometimes symbolized in the crowning of the Oak King, God of the waxing year. At his crowning, the Oak King falls to his darker aspect, the Holly King, God of the waning year (days grow shorter after Litha). In terms of the God and Goddess cycle, the God is made King through his marriage to the Queen at Litha.

Just as the winter solstice festival was appropriated by the Christian church to celebrate Christ's birth, so the popular summer solstice festival was taken to mark the birth of one of the church's most important saints: the cousin and baptizer of Jesus, John the Baptist. Other saints' days correspond to the supposed dates of their deaths, but John's is unusual in marking his birth. Saint John's Wort is a flower of traditional importance to midsummer celebrations.

Now let us understand in the Summer Solstice as being when the North Pole is pointed most toward the sun, the longest day and shortest night. The Summer Solstice, Midsummer, is linked with fertility and sexuality. June is the most popular wedding month.

6,000 years ago, people began to form into groups or communities. Food, clothing, and shelter were essential. Man learned that certain foods grew during certain times of the year - the solar year. So keeping tract of time became necessary in order to know when to plant and when to harvest. The time and season of the migration of animals became equally important. When the work was done and things went well, people celebrated (early holidays). Many of the ways (traditions) we celebrate during holidays which can be traced back to early civilization.

Not many solar holidays were celebrated at this time. (1) People were busy working the fields (2) People knew that for the next six months, daylight would be less and less each day (3) As stated before, this was a time for fertility and sexuality. Work and mating occupied most of the people's time.

ISIS...SIRIUS...AND THE SUMMER SOLSTICE

For thousands of years our ancestors marked the seasons of the year with festivals. The greatest festivals were the twice yearly solstices.

Since earliest times, before even the great pyramids were built, the ancient Egyptians developed a powerful sky religion based on the apparent motions of the sun and stars. As early as the 4th millennium BC a solar calendar was established in Egypt which was calibrated on the conjunction of the heliacal (dawn) rising of the star Sirius and the summer solstice sunrise. This calendar, which can be precisely dated to 3200 BC, was also locked on the annual flooding of the Nile, Egypt's mighty river and on whose waters all life in Egypt depends. This annual miracle, and its curious conjunction with the stellar-solar 'marriage' of Sirius and the summer solstice sunrise, formed the basis upon which all subsequent religious ideas, ceremonies and rituals were developed, and provided the cosmic principles upon which the great pyramid monuments and, later on, the great temples of Egypt, were designed. Perhaps nowhere has Sirius enjoyed a more regal history, than in ancient Egypt, where Sirius was the Star of Queen Isis. Here the star was associated with the great mother goddesses Isis, and her earlier archetype, Hathor. Sirius was the Nile Star. At approximately 2500 BCE, the time the Great Pyramid was constructed, Sirius would rise just before the sun, on the Summer Solstice, (the first day of summer, the longest day of the year, the day when the noon sun stood highest above the horizon). This is known as the "heliacal rising," after the Greek word Helios for Sun). 2500 years later, during Egypts Ptolemaic Period, Sirius would rise before the Sun approximately 2 weeks after the summer solstice. The heliacal rising would presage the annual flood of the Nile, which would bring the life-giving waters to the irrigated fields of the Nile Valley. This is referred to in the divine inscriptions on the walls of the Temple of Isis-Hathor at Denderah in the Nile Valley, where Sirius is called the Divine Sothis. The inscription states: "Her Majesty Isis shines into the temple on New Year's Day, and She mingles her light with that of her father Ra on the horizon." New Year's Day was the Summer Solstice for the Egyptian calender, and Ra was the Sun God. The Temple was oriented to the rising of Sirius, as were several other temples at Karnak, a practice going back to the 18th Dynasty (around 1500 BCE).

Let us focus on the summer solstice. When the north pole is pointing sun ward, people in the northern hemisphere experience the longest day and shortest night of the year. This is their summer solstice. For people in the southern hemisphere, the same day is their winter solstice. Solstice is from the Latin, sol stetit which means "the sun stood still". In late June and late December the sun appears to rise and set at almost exactly the same places. Its rising and setting points appear to stand still.

By the time of the new stone age, six to eight thousand years ago, there were plenty of signs that seasonal festivals were the center of community life. Ancient people used four ways of marking the solstice and equinoxes:

- Creating spot lighting on walls or caves. People who used this method often carved or painted symbols where they would be struck by a ray of light at sunrise at one of these four times of the year.In Egypt at the Great Temple of Karnak, a beam of light on the solstice would illuminate a sanctuary on the inside of the temple. This spot lighting would have allowed the Egyptian priests to determine the length of the solar year to within a minute. The lighting also had religious purposes. This solstice celebration not only dominated their industry, but the astronomy and religion of Egypt. In solar processions priests carried statues of Hapi, god of the Nile through the streets. After the religious ceremonies rejoicing took place on a grand scale and all the classes observed this holiday.

- Measuring the shadow of an upright pillar, usually at noon. This was the favorite techniques of Babylonians, Ionian Greeks, and Peruvians.
- A specially prepared ceremonial structure was made by Central and South American tribes. Only at noon on the summer solstice would the sun shine directly through a hole or tube in its ceiling to a specific point on the floor.
- The last way was to watch from a position where you could observe on the horizon the sun rising and setting over a period of years. This was used a lot in Europe, Asia and the Americas. Stonehenge is the most famous structure where this last method was observed. The Heel Stone appears between two of the stone arches marking the approximate place on the horizon of the summer solstice sunrise.

In Egypt the summer solstice was considered the beginning of the new year. It coincided with the flooding season when the soil would be fertilised and water would quench the arid Nile Valley. There are two solstices each year. The winter solstice, the shortest day of the year, occurs when the sun appears farthest south in the sky. The summer solstice, the longest day of the year, occurs when the sun appears farthest in the north. Egyptians were especially interested in the summer solstice because it marked the beginning of the Nile's flood season. Accurately predicting the floods was of such vital importance that the appearance of Sirius, which occurs around the time of the summer solstice, was recognized as the beginning of the Egyptian new year. The first Egyptian calendar had been a lunar calendar, however this was later changed to a solar one with twelve thirty day months. The year began with the heliacal rising of Sirius on or near the Solstice. In order to have the calendar year fit the solar year, five feast days were added to the end of the year. These days celebrated the births of five gods (and goddesses). The first celebrated the birth of Osiris, the second Horus (Heru-ur or Aroueris), the third Set, the fourth, Isis, and the fifth, Nephthys; (E.A. Wallis Budge, Egyptian Magic, London, 1901). The first, third and fifth feast days were considered unlucky (Osiris was the slain god, Set was the dark god, and Nephthys was the dark goddess). The second and fourth days were lucky, (both Horus and Isis were winged (ascended) god and goddess). By creation of a 365 day year, it was still short by approximately 1/4 day, and so within four years, the calendar was one day behind the Sun. Over many years, the calendar became more and more out of synch. It was determined that it would take 1461 years to complete the solar cycle to account for the loss of about 1/4 day per year and put the calendar back in sync with the Sun, so that New Year's Day would coincide with the heliacal rising of Sirius and the Solstice.

The fundamentals of this Egyptian sky religion remained the same throughout the 3,000 years of Egyptian civilisation and managed to reach our era almost intact; only to spill its ancient ideas into the new emerging Christian myth. And yet, paradoxically, the key to the 'decoding' of Egypt is found in the ever changing alignments of the temples across the epochs to match the majestic drift of the 26,000 years cycle of precession of the stars against the fixed celestial canopy. Many scholars today look at Egypt and see Egypt as a model of the sky, and its system of law and order, Ma'at, was dictated by the pulse-like churning of the machinery of the celestial bodies whose 'heart' was the solar disc. Egypt believed in the famous Hermetic axiom of 'As above, so below' into observable reality. Therefore the story of Egypt is, quite literally, written in the stars.

ISIS-SIRIS

If you look to Orion’s belt and follow it towards the horizon, you will see Sirius, the “Winter Star.” It is the brightest star in the winter sky. Because it is part of the constellation Canis Major, it’s been called the Dog Star and, in medieval Europe, it was considered to be an ill-omen. Since its heliacal (or near-dawn) rising occurs in midsummer, it was associated with the “Dog Days” of summer when it was believed that the summer heat and its attendant disease was caused by the mixture of the sun’s light with the light of Sirius. The ancient Egyptians had a much more positive story to tell about this star. To them, Orion was Osiris, the green god who died and was reborn, and Sirius was Isis, his beloved. Its annual appearance just before sunrise near the summer solstice marked the rise of the Nile River. It was said that when the Nile flooded, Osiris and Isis were making love, and their sexual union fertilized the land. The archaeo-astronomer E.C. Krupp writes: "After disappearing from the night sky (for 70 days) Sirius eventually reappears in the dawn, before the sun come up. The first time this occurs each year is called the star's heliacal rising, and on this day Sirius remains visible for only a short time before the sky gets too bright to see it. In ancient Egypt this annual reappearance of Sirius fell close to the summer solstice and coincided with the time of the Nile's inundation. . . Sirius revives the Nile just as Isis revives Osiris. Her time in hiding from Seth is when Sirius is gone (70 days) from the night sky. She (Isis) gives birth to her son Horus, as Sirius gives birth to the new year, and in the texts Horus and the new year are equated. She is the vehicle for renewal of life and order. Shining for a moment, one morning in summer, she stimulates the Nile and starts the year" (E. C. Krupp, Echoes of the Ancient Skies, Harper & Row 1983, pg. 142).

One last note. Lastly the fact that we know now that Sirius is a double star presents an equally baffling mystery. As stated above, it was not discovered until 1862 that Sirius had a companion star. The discovery was made by one Alvin G. Clark, the famed maker of world renouned refracting telescopes, using a refractor with a 18 and 1/2 inch diameter objective lens at Dearborn Observatory, operated by Northwestern University of Evanston, Illinois. His observation confirmed predictions made some 10 years earlier by C.H.F. Peters that were based on earlier observations of irregularities of the star's motion by the famous mathematician F.W. Bessel in the 1830's. In short, some of the best minds and equipment of the 19th century were utilized in making the discovery of the double star nature of Sirius. The mystery in all of this however, rests in the possibility that Sirius was may have been known to be a double star several thousand years earlier. A primative tribe known as the Dogon, who currently reside in the North African province of Mali, south of the Sahara, and west of Egypt, have long made a practice of worshiping Sirius. And the Dogon have long claimed that Sirius had an unseen companion. This is part of their oral tradition, and they have made paintings showing Sirius as a double star. They have also asserted that double Sirius has an orbital period of 50 earth years! They also claim that they learned of this when they resided in the land of ancient Egypt (or perhaps Nubia or Kush) several thousand years earlier.

Answer for yourself: If this is true, how did they know, or how did the ancient Egyptians know that Sirius had a companion? You would have to ask the Elohim...who once walked the earth...and that opens a can of worms with no end.

AUTUMNAL EQUINOX...MABON...(AROUND 21st SEPTEMBER)

Jer 10:2 2 Thus saith the LORD, Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them. (KJV)

ALTERNATE NAMES

Celtic 'Festival of the Vine'

DRUIDIC NAME

Alban Elfed or Alban Elued (Light of the Water)

CHRISTIAN EQUIVALENT

Saint Matthew's Day

PLACE IN THE NATURAL CYCLE

Mabon is the solar festival that marks the transition from the light to the dark half of the year: day and night are of equal length. On this day, the sun rises due east and sets due west. The autumn quarter of the year runs from Lughnassadh to Samhain, so Mabon marks the mid-point of autumn. By Mabon, the land is showing clear signs of the journey towards winter - leaves are beginning to turn and birds are gathering for migration.

FURTHER DETAILS

The Autumn Equinox not only brings the world again to a time of balance, but also to the second harvest. This is a time of preparation for the cold months ahead. Many take their cue from the balance of day and night and resolve to equalize within themselves anything that they believe to be "tipping the scales". It is important for them to strive toward a balance of mind, body and spirit during this time in order to be prepared for the sometimes depressing, colder months ahead. The nights grow longer and colder now (a picture of death). The Sun god is overtaken by the darkness which will reign supreme from until Yule (again a picture of death....as we see in Osiris's death).

As with the spring equinox, Mabon, the autumn equinox, is a day which holds an equal amount of light and dark, in which--upon the completion of the day--the nights will continue to grow increasingly darker until Yule; after which the days will resume to lengthen. Because of the dramatic change in light, and the apparent changing of the seasons, myths and legends arose in all religions in order to aide the people of Mother Earth cope with the advancing season. From these legends arose a cornucopia of Gods and Goddess of vegetation, of the land, and of the union of the earth and sky.

OSIRIS AND THE AUTUMN EQUINOX

Many mythological characteristics indicate this as the great passing of the God into the underworld (the death of Osiris). He has yet to conquer this world and his light is now greatly missed. The Goddess, now quite pregnant with the new coming God of light, searches for her lost consort in vain. Much like the search Isis conducted for the dismembered Osiris, the search results in no satisfaction. His passing is necessary.

The main content of the mystery of Isis is the death of Osiris and Isis's search for the dead Osiris. We know that Osiris, the representative of the being of the sun, the representative of the spiritual sun, is killed by Typhon, also known as Set, who, expressed in Egyptian terms, is none other than Ahriman (Seth). Ahriman. as personified darkness, overtakes the light of the sun (autumn and the approach of winter with shorter days and longer darkness) and kills Osiris, throws him into the Nile, and the Nile carries the body away. So Osiris is slain by Seth, divided into 14 pieces, and spread all over Egypt. Isis, Osiris' wife, searched for these 14 pieces, found them and had them buried. Except the phallus of Osiris, which she kept, and used to conceive Horus, by whom Osiris was revived. Isis, the spouse of Osiris, sets out on her search and finds him eventually and she brings him back to Egypt, where Seth (Ahriman), the enemy, cuts the body into fourteen parts. Isis buries these fourteen parts in various locations, so that they belong to the earth for ever after.

We can see from this story how Egyptian wisdom conceived of the connection between the powers of heaven and the powers of earth in a deeply meaningful way. On the one hand, Osiris is the representative of the powers of the sun. After having passed through death he is, in various places and simultaneously, the force that ripens every-thing that grows out of the earth. The ancient Egyptian sage imagines in a spirit-filled way how the powers which shine down from the sun, enter the earth and then become part of the earth, and how, as powers of the sun buried in the earth, they then hand over to the human being what matures out of the earth. The Egyptian myth is founded upon the story of Osiris-how he was killed, how his spouse Isis had to set out on her search for him, how she first brought him back to Egypt and how he then became active in another form, namely, from out of the earth.

One of the Egyptian pyramids depicts the whole event in a particularly meaningful way. The Egyptians not only recorded what they knew as the solution to the great secrets of the universe in their own particular writing, they also expressed it in their architectural constructions. They built one of these pyramids with such mathematical precision that the shadow of the sun disappeared into the base of the pyramid at the spring equinox and only reappeared at the autumn equinox. The Egyptians wanted to express in this pyramid that the forces which shine down from the sun are buried from spring to fall in the earth where they develop the forces of the earth, so that the earth may produce the fruit which humankind needs.

This, then, is the idea we find present in the minds and hearts of the ancient Egyptians, On the one hand, they look up to the sun, they look up to the lofty being of the sun and they worship God which to them was symbolized by the sun. At the same time, however, they relate how this being of the sun was lost in Osiris, and was sought by Isis, and how he was found again so that he is then able to continue working in a changed way.

Agriculturally, the Egyptians took the theme of Osiris as a Harvest Lord, slain, at this time of great reaping; until he was born again by the hands of the Goddess. (Isis, Osiris).

The Greeks and the Romans shared a common theme of a Goddess who has been taken prisoner by the Underworld. (Persephone, Demeter, etc). During this time, the earth would become barren, until her release in Spring. The Celts, of whom the name of this Sabbat has been derived from, tells of a Child of Light stolen from his Mother, and as she grieves for the loss of her child, the earth falls barren, until his release back to her in the Spring. Furthermore, the Celts portray Gods of vegetation (Cernunnos, the Green Man), who die upon the summer solstice and born again upon the winter solstice. Deities of vegetation are found throughout all traditions, (Cernunnos, Osiris, Dionysus), and are often portrayed as hunters of the wood. (such as the popular stag image). In some circles, a Harvest King and Queen are crowned; who in turn become the earthly vessels for the God and Goddess during the Mabon rite. Housed between the two Sabbats of thanksgiving and death, it is clear that two of the most represented themes of Mabon be that of the two surrounding festivals. While this is a time of great rewards, it too is a season of decline--of death. Leaves begin to wilt from their perches, and nature in itself begins to cycle again through winter. The Pagans knew well that soon their God would die, and it was time to begin to muse on the nature of death. The lengthening nights cause the goddess to grow tired and weak and she prepares to sleep through the long Winter. To help His children survive the coming season, the Green Man returns to the Earth, sheds His leaves and vines and is reborn as the Horned god with the antlers and fur of the animals He must protect. Thus begins the reign of the Horned god, Father and Protector of those trying to survive the long, cold nights.

Mabon is the time of the second harvest, when fruits are ready for collection. In Celtic mythology, Mabon was the Young God, abducted and imprisoned, only to return at a later date. This is thus an appropriate title for the day on which darkness gains the upper hand over light until the following equinox, Ostara. Mabon is the point at which, conceptually at least, the Sun enters the sign of Libra, the Scales or Balance - the most appropriate sign for this day of perfect balance between darkness and light.

EGYPT AND THE AUTUMN EQUINOX

Answer for yourself: What does the Autumn Equinox and the Egyptian festivals in this time of the year have to do with the Festival of Tabernacles in the Bible? Well let us see.

Autumn Equinox, one of the four "cardinal festivals" of the Earth year, so called because on this day the year was thought to turn like a door on a hinge (Latin cardo) as the Sun now reaches the 180° point on the zodiac wheel at 0° Libra, exactly opposite the 0° Aries point of the Spring Equinox. Autumn now begins as Sun enters Libra (the Scales), symbolizing the balance of light and darkness at the moment when the Solar energy of the year begins to wane, and Earth energy waxes toward harvest and abundance.

September 21, Autumn Equinox, is when light and dark are again in perfect balance, though now the movement is toward darkness. On this holy day, the mystery of eternal life is contemplated as the sun goes into the seed that will sustain life through the dark months of winter ahead. The Goddess/God is thanked for her generosity with the completion of the harvest; the God is thanked for his gift of energy as it is embodied in the waning sun; and we reflect upon those goals we have brought to fruition and upon the aspects of our life we must release in order to grow. This holiday was appropriated by the Christian calendar as Michaelmas, for St. Michael, the Archangel of Fire, celebrated a week after Mabon, on September 29.

In conjunction with the agricultural cycle, Autumn Equinox is the time of thanksgiving for a successful and abundant harvest. The Autumn Equinox marks the beginning of Autumn with measures of equal daylight and darkness accompanied with celebration of the bounty of Mother Earth with feasting and aiding those in need. Mabon is also the Autumn Equinox, the balance between light and dark. As we give thanks for the abundance that the long days and strong power have given, we also take this moment to balance, to rest, to simply be, and prepare ourselves for the growing cold and dark. And to recognize and remember, as always, that what appears as death is merely the preparation for rebirth. That what is reaped at the harvest will become seed for the next year. And we remember the mystery - there is no death; all that dies will be reborn. And for this too, we give thanks.

In Egypt it was called the The Day of the Wanderer; the celebration of the death and rebirth of the 'God Osiris'.

In Egyptian Calendar, the Main Festival of Hathor begins Hethara, the month named in her honor. During this month the Nile crests after its annual inundation, and begins to recede until it is dry enough for sowing in November. Hathor, the Neter who embodies the Goddess in her maternal, nurturing aspect, is naturally connected with the life-renewing cycle of the river, and with the climactic last days of the Virgo season.

The Egyptian Autumn ritual is rather a strange story, in which Ra is senile. The events seem to take place on an autumn evening, wherein Isis uses Ra's own power against him. Isis compels Ra to give up the sun and moon to her and Horus, her son, who will be born at the winter solstice. This ritual appears to be one of betrayal, however, it is actually about renewal.

What is surprising is that the Festival of Sukkoth, the nine-day festival culminating in Simhat Torah

(9/28 - 29) kept by Israel, begins on that day. Sukkoth is the annual Feast of Ingathering in the Jewish Calendar, the rite of thanksgiving for the grape harvest, celebrated in a dance ceremony and wine offering (just the way Egypt did...but when you see how the Jewish people came from the loins of the Egyptians this is not surprising).

SCORPIUS, THE SCORPION

Scorpius, known to astrologers as Scorpio, is the most southern constellation of the zodiac. It once contained the stars of Libra, known as the Claws of the Scorpion, and once the Scorpion lost its claws its contact with the ecliptic became minimal. The Sun only spends nine days among the stars of Scorpius, the other twenty-one days among the stars of the constellation Ophiuchus, the Serpent Holder. Because of Scorpios ancient claim to the Ring of Life, however, it may have lost its physical place on the ecliptic, but not its hold on the human imagination.

From 5,000 B.C.E. to approximately 1,000 B.C.E. in the northern hemisphere, the Sun was among the stars of the Great Scorpion, Scorpio, and Libra during the autumn equinox. As one of the signs of an equinox, it was considered one of the four gateways to the otherworld, a bringer of darkness, for as the Sun entered this constellation, it moved into the southern hemisphere and the dark part of the year began. Lockyer (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 397) links the constellation to the Babylonian myth of Marduk, the god of light, struggling to overcome Tiamat, a watery monster of darkness, and suggests that this myth shows the great antiquity of the sign. In Egyptian mythology the Sun was Horus/Osiris; the myth of the Scorpion killing Osiris and sending him to his midwinter death only to be reborn again in the form of Horus, is a myth describing the annual journey of the Sun through this constellation as the autumn equinox. Thus the Scorpion, well established in the zodiac by 4,000 B.C.E. if not even earlier (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 407), became linked to darkness and death. From these sources the Greeks developed the myth that the Scorpion killed a great giant called Orion owing to his precession lag at the vernal/spring equinox (Grimal, The Dictionary of Classical Mythology, p. 330). In Egypt, Osiris and/or his son Horus, which was also supported by the visual evidence in northern hemisphere autumn skies where the Scorpion rose while Orion set. The situation in the southern hemisphere is the opposite. In the spring months, as Orion rises as the Scorpion sets. Orion, therefore, was seen as fleeing the Scorpion.

To the Egyptians, the Scorpion with its red flashing heart was one of the great symbols of life and death and, as there can be no life without death, it was the Scorpion who showed the way down into the underworld.

THE ORIGIN OF DUALISTIC THOUGHT...THE NEED FOR THE OSIRIS MYTH

The first thing that strikes one in Egypt is the Sun. It is truly majestic, far more so than our northern Sun, which too often is obscured by clouds. Therefore the Egyptian Sun commands the lower atmosphere, permeating it with its brilliance. It is a regal presence that dominates the whole country. So radiant is the light that issues from the Egyptian Sun that the ancient Egyptians perceived in it the divine presence of a god they named Shu, of whom it was said that "he fills the sky with beauty". In Egypt, under the light of the brilliant Egyptian Sun one feels that much closer to the heavens, to the divine source that proclaims itself in the all-pervading brilliance of the Sun. And so one understands how this country was once known to its inhabitants as ta neteru, "the land of the gods" (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p. 1).

THE THEOLOGY THAT SURROUNDS THE NILE AND THE EGYPTIAN DESERT...."AS ABOVE...SO BENEATH": A METAPHYSICAL REALITY

But it is not just the quality of light that has such a profound influence on the character of Egypt. Egypt has a very unique landscape, which is made up of dramatic "opposites" closely juxtaposed, if not intertwined. It is this very unique landscape of Egypt that provides the foundation for most if not all of the religious tenants of the Egyptian Religion which ironically has become the very cornerstone of most world religions including Judeo-Christianity and few recognize it.

Were it not for the Nile, Egypt would be desert. Yet because of the Nile, Egypt is a long, lush oasis with an exuberance of vegetation. It is true that the Sun is the source of life, but the life-giving warmth and uplifting light of the Egyptian Sun can only be appreciated in the region of the Nile valley. Once beyond the perimeter of the river, the Sun, as the lord of life burns the land with the merciless heat of the desert. Egypt is, as Herodotus said, "the gift of the Nile" (Herodotus, Histories 2.4, trans. Aubrey de Selincourt (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972). It is the yearly flooding of the Nile with its fertilizing waters that transform the Sun's intrinsic fierceness into a generous benevolence. So we see Egypt as a dichotomy of "life" and "death" that is intricately intertwined not only with the Sun and its scorching heat during the day but with the Nile and its life giving flood waters. Along the Nile river there is an abundance, a profusion of greenery but one is always aware that it is but an oasis and the desert is always at hand: a few miles away, sometimes just a few yards is the lifelessness of the Egyptian desert which is the fruit of a relentless Sun. Understand please the dualism we find in Egypt: live balanced precariously against death. Life flourishes on and around the life giving waters of the Nile; it flourishes through the grace of Egypt's very unique geographical circumstance.

Thus Egypt plays host equally to the extremes of the overflowing life of the oasis and the intractable hostility of the barren desert. There is such a concentration of life, and at the same time such an unequivocally sterile expanse surrounding it, that one wonders at the peculiar destiny of this landscape that has to bear within itself, in such extreme degrees, both fecundity and desolation. It is as if here, in this unique physical environment, one comes closer than anywhere else in the world to an experience of the universal forces of life and death, playing out their mutually antagonistic yet complementary roles. They vie with each other, they contend with each other, but there is also a kind of harmony in this perpetual tension and conflict of each within the other. Neither can drive the other one out, and so they exist in a state of dynamic equilibrium (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p. 3).

Now we enter the mythology and theology surround the Nile and the desert of Egypt. Remember our dichotomy between "life" and "death" as attached to the Nile and the Egyptian desert. The ancient Egyptians called their country the Two Lands. This is usually taken at its face value to refer to the Delta region on the one hand (which floods), and the rest of the Nile valley on the other. But the broad and fertile plain of the Delta known as Lower Egypt (Northern Egypt) and the long, confined valley of Upper Egypt (Southern Egypt....since the Nile flows northward) were themselves a reexpression of a deeper, underlying polarity and a picture of "opposite forces" in conflict. It is assumed that the reader has previously acquainted himself with the Osiris Myth and the Contentions of Horus and Set which are myths depicting this "dichotomy of life vs death" in Egypt. Having done so then understand that from the beginning, the Delta was the domain of Horns while Upper Egypt was the province of Seth, the great opponent from whom the imperiled life and fecundity of the Nile valley had annually to be won. The Egyptians saw in the drought and later flooding of the Nile in the Delta areas of Egypt the contest between "life and death," between "good and bad." They created myths and legends to capture these Divine Truths for all times and fashioned them concerning a mythical battle between Hours, who is avenging his fathers's death by Seth. Horus ruled the Delta where the flood waters brought "life" while Seth ruled the desert which was a picture of "death." The desert, as the realm of "death" was Seth's land; for after all he had previously killed Horus' father Osiris.We we find in the contrasting between "Lower Egypt" and "Upper Egypt" is nothing more than a picture of the Eternal Conflict between "light and darkness," between "good versus bad, between "life" and "death." As such Seth was eternally opposed by Horns; eternally combatted and defeated. As much as the Two Lands of Egypt are the North and the South, they are equally the fertile Black Lands of the Nile valley, and the barren Red Lands of the encompassing desert (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p. 3-4).

But the concept of Two Lands goes further than any merely geographical distinction. As stated previously, in Egypt, the physical landscape has a metaphysical resonance of which the ancient Egyptians were keenly aware: the Two Lands are the two contending yet mutually interpenetrating realms of life and death, of the spiritual or heavenly world on the one hand, and the world of lifeless matter on the other. (Arthur Versluis, The Egyptian Mysteries (London: Arkana, 1988), p. 73). It is not without significance that the name Horns - in Egyptian, Heru-meant "He who is Above." Horns was therefore a picture or a representative of Heaven in myth form, while the domain of Seth was that of unspiritualized matter, chaos, and death; equally expressed in the form of myth. And so this landscape is both paradise and hell, at war with each other yet united in precarious balance and reciprocity.

Let us look beyond the Nile for the same picture and theology as found in the Egyptian Sun and examine its influence upon the Nile. The Egyptian Sun, with its life-giving, translucent light and its searing desert heat contains the same dichotomy of opposing energies: life versus death. The Sun that shines benevolently upon the flourishing Nile valley is the same Sun that scorches the desert. And so the deity whose visible manifestation is the Sun, Ra, contains within himself all duality. He is source and progenitor both of the Above and the Below, of Heaven and Earth, and of Horns and Seth. In other words the Sun is a picture of both "life" and "death" which are in constant tension, struggle, and conflict. Each night Ra acknowledges this by entering into, passing through, but finally overcoming, the domain in which the forces of Seth are rampant - the Underworld which is a picture of the realm of death as need in the Sun's dipping below the Western horizon daily as it "dies" at its setting. Here Seth's power, understood as "darkness" and "death" manifests as a life-denying opposition to spirit, but-as such - this tension exampled by the Sun [and the Nile] between "life" and "death" and "light" vs "darkness" is also the necessary precondition of the renewal of life and spiritual rebirth. Even Seth, who in so many respects is the archetype of negativity, embodies a certain duality; he was never thought of as unequivocally bad or evil per se, but rather as a necessary component of the cosmos viewed as a totality because without "death" there can be no "rebirth" or "resurrection" which factors strongly in Egyptian religious thought. (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p. 4-5).

So in Egypt, unlike anywhere else on this planet owing to its unique landscape, one is constantly impressed by the balance and interplay of the opposites: life and death, abundance and barrenness, light and dark, day and night, etc. Each is so clearly described that one sees that the ancient Egyptians could not but understand the world in dualistic terms. Their landscape teaches the metaphysics of the equilibrium of opposing principles. (KAG, p. 19. Frankfort writes of the "deeply rooted Egyptian tendency to understand the world in dualistic terms as a series of pairs of contrasts balanced in unchanging equilibrium"). These deep roots we find beginning in the Egyptian landscape. To maintain this balance of the Two Lands, of Horns and Seth, of the Above and the Below, was the central preoccupation of the Egyptian people, which devolved specifically upon the king. One of the titles of the king was "The Two Lords." In the office of kingship, and thereby throughout the whole country, Horns and Seth were embodied and held in equilibrium (KAG, p. 21).

FLOODING AND DROUGHT

As much as the Egyptian landscape was and still may be experienced as resonating with metaphysical significance and duality, so equally was the Egyptian's metaphysical understanding of the seasonal cycle (equinoxes and solstices) that transformed the landscape each year. Today, because the flow of the Nile has passed out of the hands of the gods and into the control of human beings, we can only reconstruct this experience in our imaginations. The Egyptian year used to be governed by the influx and reflux of the Great River, as the Nile was called. The Great River was itself regarded, like virtually all landscape features of ancient Egypt, as the body of a god. His name was Hapi, and he was usually depicted as androgynous, for he was the nurturing mother of the abundant life of the Nile valley. Hapi was not only a "personification" of the river; it was as if, in those days, people saw through the vivid landscape in which they lived to the energies, forces, and beings of which it was an expression (Jeremy Naydler, The Future Of The Ancient World (Oxford: Abzu Press, 1994), p.11 ff).

Beginning at the time of the summer solstice, when Sirius rose above the horizon, the floodwaters slowly worked their way north to the Delta. The advance wave of the flood turned the waters of the Nile green with a mass of vegetable detritus floating in the river from the equatorial swamps farther south. For several days the Nile would smell so foul with this decaying vegetable matter that gods, men, and demons stood aghast. In the green Nile came Osiris the purifier, who with this stench drove out all evil before the oncoming flood.

A few days later there came a second wave, colored red with ferruginous mud brought down from the soils of Ethiopia. It came on in a torrent, and the inundation followed rapidly. The Nile rose forty to forty-five feet in the south, and weeks later about twenty-five feet in the Delta region. These rich, red, humus-filled waters were remarkably sweet. In the ancient festival celebrating the inundation, the people would ritually wash themselves in and drink from the floodwaters (Margaret Murray, The Splendour That Was Egypt (London: New English Library, 1962). The waters submerged the whole country, giving it the appearance of a vast lake or sea. When the Nile overflows, the whole country is converted into a sea, and the towns, which alone remain above water, look like the islands of the Aegean. At these times water transport is used all over the country, instead of merely along the course of the river, and anyone going from Naucratis to Memphis would pass right by the pyramids instead of following the usual course by the Cercasorus and the tip of the Delta. Such a phenomenon aroused emotions of both apprehension and joy. In one of the ancient Pyramid Texts, we read how "They tremble, they who see the Great River when it surges; but the meadows smile, and the riverbanks blossom." The tremendous force of the oncoming flood destroyed everything in its path, disintegrating long stretches of riverbank and obliterating boundaries. In the event of too great a flood, whole villages might be swept away, cattle and people drowned. On the other hand, an insufficient inundation-which was more common-carried with it the threat of starvation. Normally, inadequate inundations could be compensated for by the storage of food supplies from previous years of abundance. But a succession of low inundations threatened the whole land with starvation (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p. 6-7).

Occurring at the hottest time of the year, the inundation was yet another confirmation of the wise ordering of the universe that caused there to be equilibrium between opposing forces; again we see the dualism and contrast between "life" and "death" as connected with the Nile. In the months preceding the flood, the power of Seth (personified chaos, darkness, and death) would visibly grow. The land became increasingly parched, the earth turned to dust, the vegetation shrivelled. Animals and human beings became listless from the heat, and the Nile shrank ever smaller. It seemed as if the country would soon become absorbed into the surrounding desert. At the very moment in the year when the lifesapping, destructive power of Seth (death) seemed closest to victory, then the Nile waters (personified as life from the dead...resurrection and life) would miraculously begin to swell, "a wave spreading over the orchards which Ra made to nourish all who thirst, you [Hapi] give drink to the desert places" (The Hymn to Hapi,: adapted from the translation in A.Erman, ed., The Ancient Egyptians: A Sourcebook of their Writings (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1966), p. 146 ff.). It was an event that never ceased to cause the visiting Greeks to marvel the rising of the Nile is a phenomenon which astounds those who see it and appears quite incredible to those who hear of it. For whereas other rivers shrink about the time of the summer solstice, and grow smaller and smaller from that point onwards, the Nile alone begins to swell, its waters rise, day by day, until in the end they overflow almost the whole of Egypt (Diodorus Siculus, Library of History, 1.36).

Answer for yourself: So what have we seen so far? That in Egypt not only the land was a picture of contrasting forces of the constant cycle of "life and death" but the Sun as well along with the river Nile in its yearly cycle of drought and flooding.

The annual cycle of the three seasons:

- of Deficiency (Shomu) from April to June, [a picture of the eternal struggle of Seth and Horus....life vs death]
- of Inundation (Akhet) from July to October, [the victory of Horus over Seth...of life over death]
- and of Coming Forth or Emergence (Proyet) from November to March, [the emergence of life from the dead in the form of a resurrection from the dead, ie., in the form of Osiris]

These yearly events [the path of the Sun throughout the year as connected to the equinoxes and solstices, and resultant cycles of Nature that influenced the Nile and the Egyptian landscape] dramatically represented the beliefs that was so central to the Egyptian religious consciousness - that of the death and resurrection which truth were captured for all eternity by Egypt as it was moulded into an allegory - myth for all posterity; the myth of "Osiris".

During the drought, Osiris was "lost" or "dead." It was at this time that his son Horns battled with Seth, the inundation betokening Horns's victory and Seth's defeat. It was on account of this that Osiris, the divine source of fertility and reproductive power, was enabled to rise from his condition of unconsciousness and impotence. The surge of plant life that followed the retreat of the waters was the physical corollary of the resurrection of Osiris's soul.'

The seasonal cycles as connected with the Sun, equinoxes, and solstices, however, did more than act out the phases of the Osirian myth. It recalled the very process of the creation of the universe. For when Egypt was submerged under the floodwaters, the whole land returned to the primordial condition of formlessness that prevailed before creation began. The sinking back of the waters and the reemergence of the land was a quite obvious reenactment, in the world of space and time, of what occurred (and eternally occurs) in the very Beginning, in the very first stages of the emanation of the spatiotemporal world from the nonspatiotemporal, spiritual realm. The seasonal transformations that the landscape of Egypt underwent were-like the landscape itself-a reflection on the physical plane of metaphysical realities (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p. 7-8).

THE IMPORTANCE OF "EAST" AND "WEST" IN EGYPT

In Egypt, the directions of east and west, north and south, are never in any doubt. Through the whole six-hundred-mile span of the Nile valley, there is an almost unbroken constancy in the northward flow of the river. This northward flow of the Nile river thus divides the land equally into a western and an eastern half. This physical division of the country by the Great River is given symbolic meaning by the cosmic and divine event of the daily birth of Ra in the east, his journey across the heavenly Nile (of which the earthly Nile is but an image), and his senescence and descent into the realm of the dead beyond the cliffs of the western desert. East and west are thus not simply physical directions, they are mythical and metaphysical orientations. The symbolism of the Sun's daily cycle deeply impresses itself upon the Egyptian landscape. We therefore see the Sun's birth or rebirth every dawn in the East and its death every sunset in the West as it sinks below the western horizon. The western side of the Nile valley contains the funerary complexes and mortuary temples, for it is there, beyond the Western desert, that Ra descends into the Underworld. The East to the Egyptians was the side of rebirth, of new life, for every morning the whole country turns east as it awakens to the enlivening rays of the newborn Sun.

But just as the country is divided into easterly and westerly realms, as much mythographical as geographical, so also is it divided into the northern, low-lying expanse of the Delta, and the narrow Nile valley to the south. Looking southward, one can have the sense of gazing into another mysterious, metaphysical zone where, as with the east and west, physical geography blends into mythography. The source of the life-giving waters that flowed through the land was essentially mythic: the Egyptians said the sacred river came to the earth from the Underworld or Duat. The Duat is one of the ancient names for the afterworld, the dark realm of death in Egyptian mythology, situated west of the Nile (in later times considered to be beneath the earth). The sun passes through this place on its return journey from west to east. It is here that the souls are judged. Now the Duat (for which our "Underworld" is a somewhat misleading translation) was a region midway between the earthly and the spiritual worlds, and the Duat was the source of all life, health, and fertility for the physical realm. It was a stop-over on the way to Heaven. Hence the connection of the Lord of the Duat, Osiris, with the fertilizing power of the Nile's flood. And indeed not only Osiris but the whole Osirian myth rises up before one when looking to the south.

The ancient Egyptians quite literally saw Osiris appear in the southern sky in the constellation of Orion, in the period immediately preceding the flood just before the summer solstice. But this was not the only astral sign of the victory of "life over death." Right after the appearance of Osiris in the form of the constellation Orion which rose in the southern horizon (a picture of resurrection from the dead since it was invisible before and now visible), the flood itself was directly heralded by the appearance of Isis as personified in the helical rising of the brightest star in the Heavens, the star Sirius. This occurred some time after the first reemergence of Orion from below the southern horizon. Next comes the flooding of the Nile and again was understood as the victory of "life over death" with it attendant understanding of "resurrection from the dead." Osiris was, according to this myth, now raised from the dead to be the judge of the Underworld..the Duat. The Nile's inundation was said to be caused by the tears of Isis for her stricken lord, tears that, as it were, came streaming from the rainbow hues of this star down into the emaciated river.

But we are not done yet. If in looking south one gazes toward the Duat, then behind one are the stars of the north, the pole stars (circumpolar) that never set (die) and that for the Egyptians constituted a cosmic image of eternity or "eternal life." It was the uninterrupted circuit of these stars that the most blessed dead would join, the realm beyond the Duat, the realm of pure spirit.

In no other country other than Egypt are directions in space so clearly defined in the landscape. One feels "held" by this landscape as one does nowhere else in the world. In the fact that the directions in space were each felt to correspond to sides of the human body, one glimpses something of the rootedness, the absolute*belonging*, of the ancient Egyptian to this landscape. One understands how this landscape must have nurtured a great confidence in the orderliness of the universe: there is the Great River, there is the fertile Black Land, there is the desert, and there is the Sun journeying from east to west each day. No matter where a person stands in the Nile valley, he or she is at the center of a cross whose axes are described by the Nile and its embankments on the one hand, and by the Sun's course on the other. Wherever one is in the Nile valley, one can imagine how the ancient Egyptians must have felt to be always at the center of a metaphysical universe (Jeremy Naydler, Temple of the Cosmos, Inner Traditions, Rochester, Vermont, 995, p.8-9).

EGYPT...A PICTURE AND PATTERN FOR THE WHOLE WORLD

It is an interesting fact that the Egyptians regarded their land not only as being at the center of the world but also as being, in a certain sense, the whole world. Thus they called their country "that which the Sun encircles," with the implication that Egypt stood for the whole planet. It was not through ignorance of other countries beyond Egypt's frontiers; neither was it through a condescending or dismissive attitude toward the "foreign lands." Rather, it was due to a feeling that characterized the relationship of all ancient peoples to the earth: the feeling that in the part of the earth that they inhabited, the whole was present (Rudolph Steiner, World History in the Light of Anthroposophy (London: Rudolph Steiner Press, 1977), p. 11). But more than in any other country, because of its unique qualities of climate and landscape, in Egypt such a feeling could arise with the force of a self-evident truth.

A RETROSPECTIVE

The notions of "good" and "evil" took form in mankind's distant and primitive past. Most of humanity's ideas about this subject, and as a result, most of humanity's conceptions regarding "absolute good" and "absolute evil" are today, as they always were, originally rooted in the Egyptian -Mazdazdian -Babylonian -Chaldean-Persian-Judeo-Christian dualistic religions based upon the dichotomy of "Light and Darkness", ie., "Good and Evil". As we just saw it was in Egypt's understanding of the competing forces of the Cosmos [light vs dark as connected with the Sun and the equinoxes and solstices, life vs death as seen in the path of the Sun daily and yearly through the equinoxes and solstices, drought vs flood that coincided with the equinoxes and solstices and the path of the Sun] Egypt came to understand not only the Cosmos but the message and pattern and cycles within it that spoke to their very soul. God has ordered this Universe according to Laws and this Order revealed to them an Eternal Pattern of "Birth, Life, Death, and Rebirth." This whole concept and religious belief system began with the ancient Egyptians and has influenced every subsequent nation since. This is verified by any extensive examination of various languages of the ancient nations along with their religious beliefs as found in any study of comparative religions.

The results obtained from the examination of languages in its several forms leaves no room for doubt that the general system of mythology can be traced to its fountain head which is Egypt. We can no longer shut our eyes to the fact. For the comparison of legends current in different countries it is not necessary to carry the search further back than the worship of God that is connected with His workings in Nature as connected with the Sun (personified as God by the Egyptians since the Sun was the life-giver).

With the origin of earliest man and the earliest existing writings on this planet we find a common language known by all; a language without words. I am speaking about a common language as man interpreted his environment as speaking to him. We have before us a stage of language corresponding to a stage in the history of the human mind in which all sensible objects were regarded as instinct with a conscious life. The varying phases of that life were therefore described as truthfully as they described their own feelings or sufferings; and therefore every phase of life became for the Egyptians a picture. Early man described the things he saw, felt, or heard in his world from his point of view. Man's language was the result of an observation of what his senses perceived. In this way, man could not fail to note the changes of days and years, of growth and decay as related to these seasonal cycles, of calm and storm; but the objects which so changed were to them living things, and the rising and setting of the Sun, the return of winter and summer as connected with the solstices and equinoxes, the rising of the Nile or its declining, became a drama in which the actors were their enemies and friends (as seen in the Osiris myth).

These myths, from the personification of nature and the Sun, afterwards became the legends of gods and heroes with human forms, and furnished the groundwork of the our religious epics and religious literature, whether of the eastern or the western world. Osiris is the first myth that for us sets the pattern for all others that follow one way or the other.

Answer for yourself: Well is this myth-making that captures Divine Truths for all Eternity rather harmless? Yes and No!

It was only a short step from this personification of the Sun and Nature in allegory and myth to later human epics in which such forces of the Cosmos and Nature became deified in every nations' myths and heroes and the worship of the invisible God was altered to the worship of Godmen! Jesus is a perfect example of this tragic idolatry. The mythical or mythmaking language of mankind had no partialities; and the Sun occupies the largest extent of the myths of these nations. That is fine until you make the Sun into a man and then worship. You will find upon study that this is the real reason behind the Exodus and Akhenaton's (Moses') revolt against existing Egyptian religious and Osiris worship and related religious beliefs in the 18th Dynasty.

EGYPT AND THE ROLE OF THE SUN....THE BEGINNING OF DUALISTIC THOUGHT

Mankind did not fail to put into words their thoughts and emotions roused in them by the varying phases of the Sun and nature of their world on which we, not less than they, feel that our life depends, although today we know a great something more than they about its nature. Thus grew up a multitude of expressions which described the Sun as the child of the night, as the destroyer of the darkness, as the lover of the dawn and the dew. Such phrases would go on to speak of the Sun as killing the dew with his spears, and of forsaking the dawn as he rose in the heaven. The feeling that the fruits of the earth were called forth by his warmth would find utterance in words which spoke of him as the friend and the benefactor of man; which the constant recurrence of his work would lead them to describe him as a being constrained to toil for others, as doomed to travel over many lands, and as finding everywhere things on which he could bestow his love or which he might destroy by his power. His journey might be across cloudless skies, or amid alterations of storm and calm; his light might break fitfully through the clouds, or be hidden from many a weary hour, to burst forth at last with dazzling splendor as he sank down in the western sky. He would be described as facing many dangers and many enemies, none of whom, however, may arrest his course; as sullen, or capricious, or resentful; as grieving for the loss of the dawn whom he had loved, or as nursing his great wrath and vowing a pitiless vengeance. Then as the veil was rent at eventide, they would speak of the chief, who had long remained still, girding on his armor; or of the wanderer throwing off his disguise, and seizing his bow or spear to smite his enemies; of the invincible warrior whose face gleams with the flush of victory when the fight is over, as he greets the fair-haired Dawn who closes, as she had begun, the day. To the wealth of images thus lavished on the daily life and death of the Sun there would be no limit. He was the child of the morning, or her husband, or her destroyer; he forsook her and he returned to her, either in calm serenity or only to sink presently in deeper gloom. So with other sights and sounds. The darkness of night brought with it a feeling of vague horror and dread; the return of daylight cheered them with a sense of unspeakable gladness; and thus the Sun who scattered the black shade of night would be the mighty champion doing battle with the biting snake which lurked in its dreary hiding-place. The recurrent cycle of birth and death of light and darkness, the Sun setting and dying only to be raised from the dead at dawn became the foundation for personified myths later attributed to men; both real and imaginary. Osiris again is our perfect example. From this Osiris myth as a picture of the travels of the Sun comes religious beliefs concerning life after death as well as dualistic thought; good vs battle entangled in an eternal fight for supremacy.

But as the Sun accomplished his journey day by day through the heaven, the character of the seasons is changed. The buds and blossoms of spring-time expand in flowers and fruits of summer, and the leaves fall and wither on the approach of winter. Thus the daughter of the earth would be spoken of as dying or as dead, as severed from her mother for five or six weary months, not to be restored to her again until the time for here return from the dark land should once more arrive. But as no other power than that of the Sun can recall vegetation to life, this child of the earth would be represented as buried in a sleep from which the touch of the Sun alone could arouse her, when he slays the frost and cold which lie like snakes around her motionless form. That these phrases would furnish the germs of myths or legends teeming with human feeling, as soon as the meaning of the phrases were in part or wholly forgotten, was as inevitable as that in the infancy of our race men should attribute to all sensible objects the same kind of life which they were conscious of possessing themselves. By now you understand how the forces of nature and the Sun could be understood by early man. These impressions were woven into various tales reflecting the crude understanding of mother nature as well as the Sun. Simply said, early man did not possess the knowledge to relate such events he encountered in scientific terms as we had today. Crude stories and myths based on his limited knowledge would have to do. Later such events were as stated personified, glorified, and finally deified. Such expressions have been handed down to us and many of them are carried over into the life of Jesus the Jew. The irony is that the Jewish people were called to be a light of knowledge and correction to such men and their myths that have led mankind away from the worship of God. We have lost a lot in our attempt to be a follower of Yeshua; in fact the hard reality as I now plan to show you is that 2.5 billions good people who call themselves Christians are little better off than primitive man because they hold dear the same errant myths and they don't know it. The only difference is that the historical Yeshua has become the Christ of faith; such an object of faith as expressed in the New Testament is almost a carbon copy of what the earliest Sun-worshippers believed and taught and what Moses rebelled against. I will within this website prove this to you as we make comparisons between the Christian Savior and the various Sun Myths; beginning with Osiris and Horus and tracing the evolution of these beliefs down through history as they ultimately come to rest in Jesus. After we are through then you can make an intelligent decision once you see the evidence for yourself. It is to that quest we now turn. Let us never forget that simple allegory and myth of the ancient Egyptians were never originally intended to teach that man becomes a God; only the Eternal Message of God to man: "birth, life, death, rebirth, law, order, and accountability of man to God as he comes to realize that he is created in the image of God and responsible to God to live his life according to such Order and Law he sees above him, around him, and within him (his body). To do otherwise is to miss the mark of what God originally spoke to all mankind in the Heavens, in Nature, and within the human species himself. Sadly, given over to selfish devices man strays from this simple "gospel" and throughout history God has send His men with messages of correction to bring people back to God and repent of false worship and idolatry connected with the worship of the "Godman."

Akhenaton, Moses, was one such man and you only have to look at normative Judaism to see their correction and chastisement by God for such idolatry during their history. Again one need to look at normative Judaism before the destruction of the Temple and afterwards to see that the only branch of Judaism that survived the destruction of the Temple was that branch that did not hold to a belief in a "Godman." The Essenes who advocated the "literalization of the Osiris myth" and who held to a belief in an "angel-Messiah" and a "Godman" were obliterated by Rome first in their siege upon Israel but yet their influence survives tragically as the cornerstone of Western Christianity as they infiltrated the Jesus movement and returned to Jerusalem (Acts 6).

Acts 6:7 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. (KJV)

It is these "priests" who were Essenes and they brought with them their Egyptian "Osiris" religious beliefs that were mounded currently around their "angel-messiah" and "Godman" theology. It is startling to find that these same Essenes had applied this "eschatological religious belief" in a Godman long before Jesus to their Teacher of Righteousness who was crucified and later again applied to Jesus following his crucifixion (see Acts 6 above). And sadly few ever study hard enough to know that their worship of Jesus as depicted in the New Testament which these same Essenes helped write is often little more than the retelling of the Osiris myth and its variations and evolution down through successive Gentile nations which were centered in Sun worship and the literalization of a prior allegory and myth in Egypt that was never intended to be literally interpreted in such a manner. One only has to find the home of these Essenes in Alexandria, Egypt to see perfectly the religious milieu whereby the synthesis of all religious beliefs of the world's Gentile nations occurred under the influence of Hellenization from which the Essene Jews of Alexandria were not immune

No wonder the Jewish nation will not believe in the "Godman-Messiah" of Christianity....GOOD FOR THEM!

The evidence of this sad departure from the faith once given to the saints awaits your inspection. All roads don't lead to Rome; that is the problem...they lead to Egypt!!!

DUALISM

According to scholars , there are at least ten dimensions of dualistic thought:

- Metaphysical dualism can be definied as two opposing powers of equal rank, such as the opposition between Osiris/Set, Horus/Set, or Ahura Mazda and Ahriman in Zoroastrian traditions. Some scholars classify the conflict between God and Satan/Belial within Judaism and Christianity as this as well even though Satan/Belial is never presented in equal rank with God.
- Cosmic dualism divides the world into two opposing forces of good/light and evil/darkness. However, it is different from metaphysical dualism in that "these forces are viewed as neither coeternal nor strictly causal." The terminology used can either be purely metaphorical such as light versus darkness, or it can pertain to hosts of beings such as angelic figures (Michael, Belial, the Prince of Light, etc.)
- Spatial dualism divides the world into distinct regions such as heaven and earth.
- Eschatological dualism divides the world into ages such as this world and the world to come. It can also be considered temporal dualism.
- Ethical dualism divides mankind by its virtues & vices. This can be expressed as the righteous and the wicked or the good and the evil.
- Soteriological dualism is division based on faith - whether one accepts (believes) or rejects (disbelieves) a saviour. The division is not in ethical behavior but solely because the believers believe they are saved, while the opposing group is classified as non-believers who, in turn, are not saved.
- Theological dualism contrasts God and humanity, or creator and creation.
- Physical dualism is concerned with the division between body & spirit.
- Anthropological dualism refers to the difference between body & soul as separate entities.
- Psychological dualism is concerned with man being able to hold two contradictory ideas at once.

A METAPHYSICAL LANDSCAPE...THE UNIQUENESS OF EGYPT...DUALISM

The first thing that strikes one in Egypt is the sun. It is truly majestic, far more so than our northern sun, which too often is limp and cloud defeated. The Egyptian sun commands the lower atmosphere, permeating it with its brilliance. It is a regal presence that dominates the whole country. So pure, so radiant is the light that issues from the Egyptian sun that the ancient Egyptians perceived in it the divine presence of a god they named Shu, of whom it was said that "he fills the sky with beauty."

The nearest equivalent to the dazzling beauty of Shu's light is the atmosphere above the clouds, which one can experience on high mountaintops, or glimpse from airplane windows. The Greeks called this upper atmosphere the "ether." It is heavenly air that is so much more refined and translucent than mundane air that the gods were felt by the Greeks to live and move in it. One can experience this ether on Mount Olympus, when suddenly one breaches cloud level. But in Egypt, the whole country seems to exist in this godlike atmosphere. One feels that much closer to the heavens, to the divine source that proclaims itself in the all-pervading brilliance of the sun. And so one understands how this country was once known to its inhabitants as ta neteru, "the land of the gods."

The influence of the sun spreads even into the night. The sun-inebriated air retains a purity that draws the stars close to the earth. Out of the towns, the Egyptian nights belong to the stars. The whole body of the heavens arches over the earth, covering it with a glittering embrace. This body belongs to Nut, daughter of Shu.

THE NILE RIVER AND THE DESERT

But it is not just the quality of light that has such a profound influence on the character of Egypt. There is also its unique landscape, which is made up of dramatic polarities closely juxtaposed, if not intertwined. Were it not for the Nile, Egypt would be desert. Yet because of the Nile, Egypt is a long, lush oasis with an exuberance of vegetation. It is true that the sun is the source of life, but the life-giving warmth and uplifting light of the Egyptian sun can only be appreciated in the region of the Nile valley. Once beyond the ampit of the river, the lord of life burns the land with the merciless heat of the desert. Egypt is, as Herodotus said, "the gift of the Nile." It is the fertilizing waters of the Nile that transform the sun's intrinsic fierceness into a generous benevolence.

Thus Egypt plays host equally to the extremes of the overflowing life of the oasis and the intractable hostility of the barren desert. There is such a concentration of life, and at the same time such an unequivocally sterile expanse surrounding it, that one wonders at the peculiar destiny of this landscape that has to bear within itself, in such extreme degrees, both fecundity and desolation. It is as if here, in this unique physical environment, one comes closer than anywhere else in the world to an experience of the universal forces of life and death, playing out their mutually antagonistic yet complementary roles. They vie with each other, they contend with each other, but there is also a kind of harmony in this perpetual tension and conflict of each within the other. Neither can drive the other one out, and so they exist in a state of dynamic equilibrium.

The ancient Egyptians called their country the Two Lands. This is usually taken at its face value to refer to the Delta region on the one hand, and the rest of the Nile valley on the other. But the broad and fertile plain of the Delta-Lower Egypt-and the long, confined valley of Upper Egypt were themselves a reexpression of a deeper, underlying polarity. From the beginning, the Delta was the domain of Horns while Upper Egypt was the province of Seth, the great opponent from whom the imperiled life and fecundity of the Nile valley had annually to be won. Seth ruled the desert; the desert was Seth's land. And Seth was eternally opposed by Horns; eternally combatted and defeated. As much as the Two Lands of Egypt are the North and the South, they are equally the fertile Black Lands of the Nile valley, and the barren Red Lands of the encompassing desert.

But the concept of Two Lands goes further than any merely geographical distinction. In Egypt, the physical landscape has a metaphysical resonance of which the ancient Egyptians were keenly aware: the Two Lands are the two contending yet mutually interpenetrating realms of life and death, of the spiritual or heavenly world on the one hand, and the world of lifeless matter on the other. It is not without significance that the name Horns-in Egyptian, Heru-meant "He who is Above." Horus was representative of Heaven, while the domain of Seth was that of unspiritualized matter, chaos, and death. And so this landscape is both paradise and hell, at war with each other yet united in precarious balance and reciprocity.

The Egyptian sun, with its life-giving, translucent light and its searing desert heat contains the same polarity. The sun that shines benevolently upon the flourishing Nile valley is the same sun that scorches the desert. (life in tension with death). And so the deity whose visible manifestation is the sun, Ra, contains within himself all duality. He, the deity, is source and progenitor both of the Above and the Below, of Heaven and Earth, and of Horns and Seth. Each night Ra acknowledges this by entering into, passing through, but finally overcoming, the domain in which the forces of Seth are rampant-the Underworld (the path of the sun from the western horizon to the eastern horizon at dawn where light overcame darkness). Here Seth's power manifests as a life-denying opposition to spirit, but-as such-it is also the necessary precondition of the renewal of life and spiritual rebirth. Even Seth, who in so many respects is the archetype of negativity, embodies a certain duality; he was never thought of as unequivocally bad or evil, but rather as a necessary component of the cosmos viewed as a totality.

This ambivalence of Seth can be experienced in the Egyptian desert. It is indeed mercilessly hot, and there is nowhere to find shelter from the sun. But in this landscape of rock and silence, where no bird flies and no animal save the desert viper moves, there is a solitude that the Nile valley cannot offer. The Nile valley has an intensely social, as well as natural, fertility. In ancient as in modern times, it must have been virtually impossible to experience being alone in the entirely humanized landscape of the valley; for there are no wild places there, no woods, heaths, moorlands or craggy hills to offer retreat.

The valley is in its entirety given over to cultivation. There the human and natural spheres of existence are blended into a harmonious unity, as if all partake of the same social fabric. Men, women, and children work together with their donkeys and oxen, sit with their cows or herds of sheep and goats under trees. Even the egrets that gather-as they have always gathered-in the fields mingle with the workers as if they were domestic fowl. The gods of Egypt were the spiritual denizens of the cultivated land. They were part of the social fabric of the Nile valley. All of them, that is, except for Seth. Seth was always the outsider god, encountered when a person stepped outside the socially cohesive fertile land into the desert. In the eerie, fearful wastes of the desert, the wanderer might or might not stumble upon a venomous snake. But there was no avoiding meeting one's own solitude. It was here, in Seth's domain, far from the reassuring presence of the company of gods, that one could experience the utter deprivation of spirit that is the precondition of inner renewal.

In Egypt, one is constantly impressed by the balance and interplay of the opposites: life and death, abundance and barrenness, light and dark, day and night, society and solitude. Each is so clearly described that one sees that the ancient Egyptians could not but understand the world in dualistic terms. Their landscape teaches the metaphysics of the equilibrium of opposing principles.

To maintain this balance of the Two Lands, of Horns and Seth, of the Above and the Below, was the central preoccupation of the Egyptian people, which devolved specifically upon the king. One of the titles of the king was "The Two Lords." In the office of kingship, and thereby throughout the whole country, Horns and Seth were embodied and held in equilibrium.

FLOOD AND DROUGHT AND THE SEASONAL CYCLES

As much as the landscape was-and still may be-experienced as resonating with metaphysical import, so equally was the seasonal cycle that transformed the landscape each year. Today, because the flow of the Nile has passed out of the hands of the gods and into the control of human beings, we can only reconstruct this experience in our imaginations. The Egyptian year used to be governed by the influx and reflux of the Great River, as the Nile was called. The Great River was itself regarded, like virtually all landscape features of ancient Egypt, as the body of a god. His name was Hapi, and he was usually depicted as androgynous, for he was the nurturing mother of the abundant life of the Nile valley. Hapi was not merely a "personification" of the river; it was as if, in those days, people saw through the vivid landscape in which they lived to the energies, forces, and beings of which it was an expression (a neter).

Beginning at the time of the summer solstice, when Sirius rose above the horizon, the floodwaters slowly worked their way north to the Delta. The advance wave of the flood turned the waters of the Nile green with a mass of vegetable detritus floating in the river from the equatorial swamps farther south. For several days the Nile would smell so foul with this decaying vegetable matter that gods, men, and demons stood aghast. In the green Nile came Osiris the purifier, who with this stench drove out all evil before the oncoming flood.

A few days later there came a second wave, colored red with ferruginous mud brought down from the soils of Ethiopia. It came on in a spate, and the inundation followed rapidly. The Nile rose forty to forty-five feet in the south, and weeks later about twenty-five feet in the Delta region. These rich, red, humus-filled waters were remarkably sweet. In the ancient festival celebrating the inundation, the people would ritually wash themselves in and drink from the floodwaters. The waters submerged the whole country, giving it the appearance of a vast lake or sea. This is how Diodorus described the inundation in the first century B.C.: "Since the country is flat, and towns, villages and rural dwellings are built on earth-works made by the hands of men, the appearance of the whole recalls the Cyclades islands." This description echoes that of Herodotus several hundred years earlier:

When the Nile overflows, the whole country is converted into a sea, and the towns, which alone remain above water, look like the islands of the Aegean. At these times water transport is used all over the country, instead of merely along the course of the river, and anyone going from Naucratis to Memphis would pass right by the pyramids instead of following the usual course by the Cercasorus and the tip of the Delta.

Such a phenomenon aroused emotions of both apprehension and joy. In one of the ancient Pyramid Texts, we read how "They tremble, they who see the Great River when it surges; but the meadows smile, and the riverbanks blossom."

The tremendous force of the oncoming flood destroyed everything in its path, disintegrating long stretches of riverbank and obliterating boundaries. In the event of too great a flood, whole villages might be swept away, cattle and people drowned. On the other hand, an insufficient inundation-which was more common-carried with it the threat of starvation. Normally, inadequate inundations could be compensated for by the storage of food supplies from previous years of abundance. But a succession of low inundations threatened the whole land with starvation.

Unlike the rivers of Mesopotamia, however, the annual inundation of the Nile was both predictable and for the most part entirely benevolent. Occurring at the hottest time of the year, the inundation was yet another confirmation of the wise ordering of the universe that caused there to be equilibrium between opposing forces. In the months preceding the flood, the power of Seth would visibly grow. The land became increasingly parched, the earth turned to dust, the vegetation shrivelled. Animals and human beings became listless from the heat, and the Nile shrank ever smaller. It seemed as if the country would soon become absorbed into the surrounding desert. At the very moment in the year when the lifesapping, destructive power of Seth seemed closest to victory, then the Nile waters would miraculously begin to swell and bring "life to the people." So again we see the balance between "life" and "death" in the flooding of the Nile.

The rising of the Nile is a phenomenon which astounds those who see it and appears quite incredible to those who hear of it. For whereas other rivers shrink about the time of the summer solstice, and grow smaller and smaller from that point onwards, the Nile alone begins to swell, its waters rise, day by day, until in the end they overflow almost the whole of Egypt.

THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN LIFE AND DEATH AS TOLD IN MYTHS

The annual cycle of the three seasons:

- of Deficiency (Shomu) from April to June,
- of Inundation (Akhet) from July to October, and of
- Coming Forth or Emergence (Proyet) from November to March, dramatically represented the myth central to the Egyptian religious consciousness-that of the death and resurrection of Osiris. During the drought, Osiris was "lost" or "dead." It was at this time that his son Horns battled with Seth, the inundation betokening Horns's victory and Seth's defeat. It was on account of this that Osiris, the divine source of fertility and reproductive power, was enabled to rise from his condition of unconsciousness and impotence. The surge of plant life that followed the retreat of the waters was the physical corollary of the resurrection of Osiris's soul."

The seasonal cycle, however, did more than act out the phases of the Osirian myth. It recalled the very process of the creation of the universe. For when Egypt was submerged under the floodwaters, the whole land returned to the primordial condition of formlessness that prevailed before creation began. The sinking back of the waters and the reemergence of the land was a quite obvious reenactment, in the world of space and time, of what occurred (and eternally occurs) in the very Beginning, in the very first stages of the emanation of the spatiotemporal world from the nonspatiotemporal, spiritual realm. The seasonal transformations that the landscape of Egypt underwent were-like the landscape itself-a reflection on the physical plane of metaphysical realities.

THE IMPORTANCE OF "EAST" AND "WEST" IN EGYPTIAN RELIGION

In Egypt, the directions of east and west, north and south, are never in any doubt. Through the whole six-hundred-mile span of the Nile valley, there is an almost unbroken constancy in the northward flow of the river. Thus the Nile river divides the land equally into a western and an eastern half. This physical division of the country by the Great River is given symbolic meaning by the cosmic and divine event of the daily birth of Ra in the east, his journey across the heavenly Nile (of which the earthly Nile is but an image), and his senescence and descent into the realm of the dead beyond the cliffs of the western desert. East and west are thus not simply physical directions, they are mythical and metaphysical orientations. The symbolism of the sun's diurnal cycle deeply impresses itself upon the Egyptian landscape. The western side of the Nile valley has to be the side of the funerary complexes and mortuary temples, for it is there, beyond the western desert, that Ra descends into the Underworld (dies at sunset with the loss of light). The east has to be the side of rebirth, of new life, for every morning the whole country turns east as it awakens to the enlivening rays of the newborn sun.

But just as the country is divided into easterly and westerly realms, as much mythographical as geographical, so also is it divided into the northern, low-lying expanse of the Delta, and the narrow Nile valley to the south. Looking southward, one can have the sense of gazing into another mysterious, metaphysical zone where, as with the east and west, physical geography blends into mythography. The source of the life-giving waters that flowed through the land was essentially mythic: the Egyptians said the sacred river came to the earth from the Underworld or Dwat. Now the Dwat (for which our "Underworld" is a somewhat misleading translation) was a region midway between the earthly and the spiritual worlds, and was the source of all life, health, and fertility for the physical realm. Hence the connection of the Lord of the Dwat (Osiris) with the fertilizing power of the Nile's flood. And indeed not only Osiris but the whole Osirian myth rises up before one when looking to the south.

The ancient Egyptians quite literally saw Osiris appear in the southern sky in the constellation of Orion, in the period immediately preceding the flood. But the flood itself was directly heralded by the appearance of Isis in the iridescent star Sirius, some time after the first reemergence of Orion from below the southern horizon. The Nile's inundation was said to be caused by the tears of Isis for her stricken lord, tears that, as it were, came streaming from the rainbow hues of this star down into the emaciated river.

If in looking south one gazes toward the Dwat, then behind one are the stars of the north, the pole stars that never set and that for the Egyptians constituted a cosmic image of eternity (these circumpolar stars were the realm of Eternal Life since they never set but constantly circled the pole start). It was the uninterrupted circuit of these stars that the most blessed dead would join, the realm beyond the Dwat, the realm of pure spirit.

In no other country are directions in space so clearly defined in the landscape. One feels "held" by this landscape as one does nowhere else in the world. In the fact that the directions in space were each felt to correspond to sides of the human body, one glimpses something of the rootedness, the absolute belonging, of the ancient Egyptian to this landscape. One understands how this landscape must have nurtured a great confidence in the orderliness of the universe: there is the Great River, there is the fertile Black Land, there is the desert, and there is the sun journeying from east to west each day. No matter where a person stands in the Nile valley, he or she is at the center of a cross whose axes are described by the Nile and its embankments on the one hand, and by the sun's course on the other. Wherever one is in the Nile valley, one can imagine how the ancient Egyptians must have felt to be always at the center of a metaphysical universe.

EGYPT...A PICTURE FOR THE WHOLE OF HUMANITY

It is an interesting fact that the Egyptians regarded their land not only as being at the center of the world but also as being, in a certain sense, the whole world. Thus they called their country "that which the sun encircles," with the implication that it stood for the whole planet. It was not through ignorance of other countries beyond Egypt's frontiers; neither was it through a condescending or dismissive attitude toward the "foreign lands." Rather, it was due to a feeling that characterized the relationship of all ancient peoples to the earth: the feeling that in the part of the earth that they inhabited, the whole was present. But more than in any other country, because of its unique qualities of climate and landscape, in Egypt such a feeling could arise with the force of a self-evident truth. This metaphysical landscape provided the source and impetus for their religious myths that explained the workings of God; both a God of life and death.

THE COSMIC CHALLENGE TO WORLD ORDER...THE BATTLE OF HORUS AND SET

Osiris, in Egyptian mythology, was the god of the dead and the underworld in Egypt. He married his sister, Isis, and formed a great triad of abydos. Osiris also had a brother named Set and a son named Horus. Osiris also did good things and was kind. Osiris was then killed by Set and at 2400 B.C., became funerary god and personification of dead pharaohs. He also represented the resurrection into eternal life. His life was then brought back by Isis. Isis, in Egyptian mythology, is known as the goddess of fertility and nature (the personification of rebirth and fertility). Isis, having the power to bring back life was instrumental in bringing back the life of Osiris. Horus, her son from an immaculate conception with Osiris following his death and resurrection, in Egyptian mythology, is the god of light and heaven. Those who didn't know his name but knew about his existence would call him The Great King of Gods, The King of the Land, and The King of the World. He personified the life giving power of the sun and then, became the ruler of Egypt. Even though Horus had a great life, there was a sad tragedy. Horus's evil uncle, Set, had killed Horus's father, Osiris. Because of this, Horus killed Set for killing his father. Horus also knew that Set was his uncle, but never seemed to like him. After the tragedy of his father's death, Horus was known as the god of the living. A follower named Hetephras started to follow him and soon became his ancient follower. As he traveled, he was known as a national god and started to know many animals. His sacred animal became the falcon. He then got the head and body of a falcon. After that, the Greeks knew him as Harpocrates and was worshiped as the god of silence. As Horus' news went on as to how he killed Set, he was known as a national god and also the life giving god of Egypt. Soon enough, he was worshiped all over Egypt. He got a double crown and his life went on in peace. Set, in Egyptian mythology , was the evil god of darkness.

It is worth noting that in the beginning of Egyptian dynastic history Seth was a member of the venerated gods of Egypt. It is Seth that stands in the bow of the boat of Ra and slays the enemies of Ra as the ship traverses the sky on it's daily journey. It seems that in very early times the followers of the god Seth may have been conquered by the followers of the god Horus whom went on to unite upper and lower Egypt. If that is true then Seths fall from power has historical and political beginnings. It also must be considered that the roots of these stories may lie in the fact that Seth was a deity of the night and darkness. Therefore, these battles may represent day verses night or dark verses light as well as the ideas of good verses evil. If we look at these stories with that in mind we find ideas like; "an aging king fighting the powers of darkness that are conspiring against him". This concept can easily be equated with the sun setting and being overpowered by the darkness of night. We can also assume that this battle rages through the night only to find that the sun is once again victorious with the sunrise. By midday, the enemy is all but defeated but the victory slips away as the forces of darkness join the battle as the day grows older towards sunset. And so the battle goes.

Answer for yourself: Do you see in this myth the ancient battle of darkness vs light, evil vs good? These myths only tell a Divine truth but were never intended to be taken literally (as if Horus and Set were real people or real gods). But the reality of evil and its challenge to light, love, and goodness and world order is very real and myth was the vehicle used by the ancients to teach such truths and capture them for all of history.

In different parts of Egypt, Set was also known as Seth or Sutekh. He was known to be represented with pointed, muzzle horns on his crown. He also had a human-like body but it was made of a shadow. Set had once had an argument with his brother, Osiris, and killed him. After this, Set was known to be very evil and was known as the god of evilness. Greeks even called him Typhon. After Set's evilness to the death of his brother, Set's nephew, Horus, killed Set for what he had done. That was the end of Set and Egyptians believe that if it wasn't for Horus, Set would have ruled the world with evilness.

I have presented above the basics of this myth but following is a more concise understanding of the myth as it finds its way to us today: The Great Quarrel:

Once Horus was grown, he came out of the Delta to claim his right to his father's "office" following the death of his father Osiris by Set. The counsel of the gods was considering giving the office to Set, because he was the larger and stronger of the two. After much discussion and consulting (supposedly, the discussion went on more that eighty years), it was decided to give the crown to Horus. Set became enraged and challenged Horus to a battle in the sea, both of them taking the form of hippopotamuses. Horus accepted. His mother, Isis tried to help him, but ended up not really doing so at all, but rather, made it worse. First, she harpooned him accidentally and released him. Then she harpooned Set, but released him as well because Set was able to persuade her to do so. This angered Horus so much that he came up from the water and cut off his Mother's head. He took the head to the mountains to hide from the punishment he had just earned. He hid under a tree in an oasis and the company of gods looking for him could not find him. Set was able to find Horus, however. He tore out Horus's eyes and planted them the ground, where they bloomed into lotus flowers. Set denied being able to find Horus to the counsel, but another god, Hanthor, found Horus again, restored his eyes, then brought him to the counsel. A truce was called and Set and Horus went off to rest together.

This point in the story is a good example of how this myth was not to be taken seriously. The material is vulgar in this portion. In not so many words, Set violated Horus that night. Horus ran to his mother (who obviously did not die from decapitation) with Set's semen (seed) on his hand. Isis cut off Horus's contaminated hand, threw the hand in the ditch, and put some of Horus's semen on Set's garden. Set became pregnant when he ate from the garden. Obviously, it was not a moral crime to violate homosexually as it was to be violated homosexually, because Set and Horus went before the counsel and Set declared that Horus was unfit for the crown because he allowed Set to "treat" him homosexually. Horus claimed this was untrue and that the gods should call the "seed" of each to see who had "treated" whom. The gods did so. Set's seed answered from the ditch, while Horus's answered from Set. The gods declared Horus right. However, once again, Set challenged Horus to a contest. This time, it was a boat race in boats made of stone. Horus built his in the night, when no one could see. He made his of wood, but covered it with gypsum, making it look like stone. Set saw the boat, and made his of stone, thinking Horus's was also. The next day, Set's boat sank immediately, of course. He was enraged and tried to kill Horus, but the gods intervened. After more discussion and consulting, Set finally agrees to let law rule over brute force and resigns. Horus was given the crown, and in compensation, Set was made god of storms. His main duty was to fend off the serpent dragon of darkness, Apopis, as he tried to overcome Osiris's divine barge at sunrise and sunset. This leads us to the myth of Set and Apopis. The tone of this myth was the same as that of the Great Quarrel; however, it was not told in direct speech, but was an actual dramatic piece. During a confrontation with Set, Apopis insulted and embarrassed Set by mentioning Set's loss of his testicles during battle with Horus. This enraged Set and he wanted to kill the serpent, but was not brave enough to do so face to face. He tricked Apopis into turning his head, then Set cut it off and chopped it up. He was disgraced by this and driven away from the company of the other gods.

We call this concept of the challenge to world order as expressed in the above myth "Dualism" today and it figures prominently in the writings of the Essenes and the Gnostics and often we read this in our Bibles as stories which were never meant to be taken literally as applied to Biblical characters or even Jesus himself. These are often just pictures told expressing Divine truth in the form of allegory, legend, metaphor, or myth and never meant to be literally events in the lives of real persons. Such is the role of personification.

THE DEAD AND THEIR CONNECTION WITH THE SKY AS FOUND IN PYRAMID GEOMETRY

You may not have considered this but each person's life echoes the cycle of cosmic order we see played out in the sky. Our ancient ancestors saw a parallel between cosmic creation and each individual birth. For them the ancients realized that man was made in the image of God. Each life meant growth and the preservation of order. Each death was an intrusion of chaos and was a break with the Divine order of the Cosmos as pictured above and around them in Mother Nature. And just as our ancestors saw rebirth, renewal, and restoration of order in the sky, they also believed in an afterlife for the soul, a resurrection. Death, the key transformation in each soul's share of the cycle of cosmic order, initiated a transcendental journey to the realm of the gods and immortality. Very often the destination of the dead was the domain of sacred order-the sky itself. We say the exact same things today as Christians for when we die we believe we go to Heaven (the ancients called this the sky).

For this reason, in culture after culture, we find celestial metaphor in the ceremonies of the funeral, celestial imagery in the paraphernalia of the dead, and astronomical significance in the architecture of the tomb. By recognizing the relation between death and the sky, we can understand what death meant to our ancestors and what they judged was the role of the dead.

THE GREAT PYRAMID....ASTRONOMY...AND THEOLOGY

Death meant no rest for the pharaohs of Old Kingdom Egypt. Their destiny was overhead. Pyramids today stand as a reminder of the ancient Egyptian glorification of life after death, and in fact, the pyramids was built as monuments to house the tombs of the pharaohs. Death was seen as merely the beginning of a journey to the other world. In this society, each individual's eternal life was dependent on the continued existence of their king, a belief that made the pharaoh's tomb the concern of the entire kingdom. Believed to be aligned with the circumpolar stars, the King's spirit is then able to commute between heaven and earth in life after death.

Prayers carved into the stone walls of chambers within Fifth and Sixth Dynasty (ca. 2494-2181 B.C..) pyramids describe the pharaoh's "ascent to the sky among the stars," where he "regulates the night" and "sends the hours on the way." In some of thesePyramid Texts, in the monuments at Saqqara (about 40 miles up the Nile from Cairo), he joins the circumpolar stars and governs them. These stars, called circumpolar, never rise and never set, and so they never die. Circumpolar means to circle around the pole. Circumpolar stars or constellations daily trace circles around the north celestial pole, without setting or dipping below the horizon. They move in a counterclockwise direction. By joining these eternal stars, the pharaoh becomes eternal; he, personified as a star, never sets (allegory for death).

The pharaoh also makes another celestial journey: to Orion. This constellation is a symbol of his soul's rebirth because Orion stood for Osiris and the great cycle of birth, life, death, and resurrection.

Osiris was the Egyptian "god of the underworld." However, he was much more than this, because he also symbolized the Sun. Therefore, he also had a cyclic death and rebirth sequence. Every year he would die, and every winter solstice be "reborn." Hence, the religion of Osiris was essentially sun worship. In the Egyptian Osiris myth, he was killed by his brother and torn into 14 pieces; then resurrected by his sister/wife Isis (after she conceived their son Horus), to become lord of the underworld and Egyptian judge of the dead. The number 14 is further significant to the worship of Osiris because of his other association with the Moon, which has two 14 day cycles (waxing and waning). The waning cycle of the Moon also stands for Osiris' journey into the underworld (as the Moon grows dark, it goes "into darkness," the equivalent of the underworld), and the waxing cycle as the Moon grows brighter, Osiris' ascent from the underworld. Without going into too much detail, suffice to say that the number 14 is a very important number to the worshippers of Osiris, for more reasons than his death. Osiris, in his association with both the Sun and Moon, represents the principle of cycles; that everything has a beginning and an ending, but that life still goes on and new life takes the place of the old. Isis, the sister and "wife" of Osiris, was as important to the Egyptians (if not more so) than the god Osiris. She is represented by the star Sirius in Egyptian mythology. A "star configuration" used to sanctify Julius' new calendar that lacks Sirius or references to Sirius, would not be representative of Egyptian belief and worship. Isis was, for the Egyptians, the great nurturer and source of all "good things."

In the company of Osiris and guided by Sirius (in roughly the same part of the sky), the dead king maintains the calendar and administers the seasons. The pharaoh is busy in heaven. According to the texts, he takes "possession of the sky, its pillars and its stars" after death. On earth he maintained order and vitalized the system; in the sky, among the spirits, he activates the great cosmic cycles. His soul, or ba, has become a "living star at the head of his brethren." The tomb in which he was buried was the point of his departure for the sky.

Later Egyptian tombs are filled with astronomical imagery of the journey of the sun, the body of the sky, and the destinations of the stars: like the pyramids that contain hieroglyphic texts, they confirm that the Egyptians sensed a link between death and the sky (our Heaven). The builders of the earliest pyramids, however, and the builders of the greatest-those Fourth Dynasty (ca. 2613-2494 B.C..) mountains of stone blocks at Giza-left no written records of their intentions. Later commentators filled this void with fanciful speculation, downright misinformation, and plain silliness.

About 80 pyramids are known, all built on the Nile's west bank-the realm of the dying sun-but the Great Pyramid outstrips the others in fame as well as in size. The date of its erection is debated today but evidence reveals that it is much older than many want to concede; possibly 10,000 B.C.E. or earlier. It is recognized by Classical writers as one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, and it is the only one of the seven still standing. With amazing success, it has resisted the assaults of the desert, earthquake, quarrymen, and tourists. Herodotus, the Greek historian, marveled at its antiquity-and he visited Egypt in the fifth century B.C. Now with more justification than ever, an old Arab proverb counsels, "Man fears time, but time fears the pyramids."

THE GREAT PYRAMID... ITS ASTRONOMICAL INTERPRETATION

Various astronomical interpretations of the Great Pyramid at Giza have been proposed, involving alignments of its internal corridors and shadows cast by its profile. Some people have even suggested that it was used as an observatory. This pyramid's dimensions also have been said to encode practically everything from the number of days in the year to prophecies of the world's history. In our supposedly rational era, the Great Pyramid-or at least its shape-has been touted as a focuser of an as-yet-unidentified energy that can do everything from sharpening razor blades to mummifying milk.

It has been estimated that the volume of the Great Pyramid is as large as that of St. Peter's in Rome, St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey in London, and the cathedrals of Milan and Florence combined. Nearly 2,300,000 blocks of stone, each weighing on the average 2½ tons (the heaviest being 15 tons with none less than a ton and a half) were piled into an artificial mountain whose four sloping sides originally merged at a point 481.4 feet above the limestone plateau of Giza. Today, the top, including the gold-covered capstone, or pyramidion, is missing, and the Great Pyramid is 31 feet short of its original height.

The sides of the Great Pyramid once competed in brightness with the golden cap, for the rough limestone blocks that comprise the bulk of the pyramid were covered with a fine surface of shiny, white tura limestone. Only a little of the original tura now remains, however, in the bottom course on the north side.

Sheer size qualifies the Great Pyramid as "great," but its architectural details make it unique. First, whatever else may be hypothesized about the pyramid, there is no doubt that it is aligned astronomically, and with extreme precision, the four sides of its immense base (covering more than 13 acres) running north, south, east, and west. The worst agreement of any side with exact cardinal orientation is on the east, and even there the misalignment from a true north-south line is but 5½ arcminutes. The other three sides agree even better. Accuracy of this sort is possible, even with very simple techniques, provided that care is taken in setting out the lines. Preserving this accuracy on the monumental scale of the Great Pyramid, however, means not "twisting" the sides at higher levels, and the Egyptians' success is impressive. The corners of the base are very nearly right angles, and the entire base is almost a perfect square. The greatest difference in length between any two sides is 7.8 inches. This accuracy emphasizes the concern the builders had for the four cardinal directions, what the Pyramid Texts of the later Fifth and Sixth Dynasties call the "pillars" of the sky.

The internal details of the Great Pyramid are equally remarkable. A cross-section reveals a confusing collection of corridors, chambers, and shafts. Numerous claims for astronomical alignment of these vents and passages have been made, and most are wrong. There is astronomy among them, however. To appreciate it we must enter the pyramid.

22. The stellar alignments of the Great Pyramid's four shafts in the epoch of 2500 BC.

The Great Pyramid reveals much of the religious beliefs of the Egyptians. There are 4 mysterious shafts emanating from the King's and Queen's Chambers of the Great Pyramid. Two of these shafts, once thought to be only "air ventilation shafts," are aligned perfectly to due north and the other two are perfectly to due south. They thus target, at varying altitudes, what astronomers refer to as the "meridian" - an imaginary line "dividing the sky" that is best envisioned as a hoop connecting the north and south poles and passing directly over the observer's head. What is terribly interesting is the theology that is written into the architecture of this Great Pyramid which not only instructs us but the precise alignments of these 4 shafts with key astral bodies operates as a time clock to pinpoint the time frame when this great wonder of the world was built. Recent investigators have established beyond any shadow of doubt that in circa 2500 B.C.E. - the era recognized by Egyptologists as the "Pyramid Age" - each of these shafts targeted a special star as it culminated at the meridian:

THE QUEEN'S CHAMBER

- From the Queen's Chamber, the northern shaft is angled at the star Kochab (Beta Ursa Minor) in the constellation of the Little Bear - a star associated by the ancients with "cosmic regeneration" and the immortality of the soul.
- The southern shaft, on the other hand, was aimed at the bright star Sirus (Alpha Canis Major) in the constellation of the Great Dog. This star the ancients associated with the goddess Isis, cosmic mother of the kings of Egypt.

THE KING'S CHAMBER

- From the King's Chamber, the northern shaft was aimed at the ancient Pole star, Thuban (Alpha Draconis) in the constellation of the Dragon - associated by the Pharaohs with notions of "cosmic pregnance and gestation."
- The southern shaft was angled at Al Nitak (Zeta Orionis), the brightest of the three stars in Orion's belt- which the ancient Egyptians identified with Osiris, their high god of resurrection and rebirth and the lengenday bringer of civilization to the Nile Valley in a remote epoch referred to as "Zep Tepi," the "First Time" when the Elohim walked the earth (see Genesis).

Both shafts, then, are oriented toward celestial zones that are mentioned in the Pyramid Texts. Thuban, as the North Star, was in a sense first among the circumpolar stars or "Imperishable Stars," as the Egyptians phrased it to acknowledge their ability to circuit eternally without ever setting. Its importance is further highlighted in that it is the Alpha star of Draco (the Dragon). Thuban, then, made an appropriate target for the north shaft. Meanwhile, the stars in Orion's belt, the objective of the south shaft, were among the decans, the stars whose risings or transits marked the hours of the night throughout the Egyptian year. Orion (as Osiris), of course, was Osiris, who presided over the resurrection of souls.

These celestial alignments don't make an observatory out of the Great Pyramid, for neither Thuban nor Orion's belt could actually be seen through the shafts' openings inside the King's Chamber. Both shafts bend horizontally for a short distance before they reach the King's Chamber and also at their other ends, prior to opening on the north and south faces of the pyramid. The shafts are symbolic references to the pharaoh's celestial destinies and to the starry realms that ordered heaven and earth. They mark the Great Pyramid as the site of his celestial transformation (Graham Hancock and Robert Buval, The Message of the Sphinx, Crown Publishers, New York, pp. 58-82).

Just as the orientation of the Fourth Dynasty pyramids to the four cardinal directions stressed the cosmic order, so the burial chamber of Tutankhamun (Ca. 1345 B.C..) incorporated north-south and east-west alignments. References to the stellar destiny of this pharaoh may now be seen in Cairo's Egyptian Museum. The inscriptions on the four gold-covered, boxlike shrines that formerly encased the sarcophagus of the deceased identify the king with Osiris, and Isis is described as following behind him, just as Sirius follows Orion across the sky. On the door of one of the shrines, Isis is portrayed as a bird with extended wings; on another she says: "I am thy protection, I am behind thee."

The tomb of Seti I, whose burial chamber ceiling illustrates the Northern Group, the stars around the north celestial pole, on one half, includes Sirius and Orion (as boat-borne figures of Isis and Osiris) on the other. Both stellar destinations of the pharaoh, portrayed here, repeat the traditions expressed in the Great Pyramid's "air shafts." On the ceiling of another burial chamber, that of Ramesses VI, The Book of the Day and The Book of the Night frame, each on its own side, the double body of the sky goddess. These texts chronicled the sun's journey, hour by hour, through the day and the night. They imply yet another celestial destiny for the pharaoh: the path of the sun.

Accompanying the images of Sirius and Orion in the tomb of Seti I, and on the ceilings of many other temples and tombs as well, are lists of the decans. The Decans were groups of stars from which the night sky was divided - these Decans were used as a calendar by the ancient Egyptians: each decan would rise above the dawn horizon for ten days every year (symbolic of rising from the darkness of death). There were 36 decans (36 X 10 = 360 days), + plus 5 added days to make up to 365 days. Diagonal "star clocks" listed the names of the timekeeping stars inside the lids of coffins from the Ninth through Twelfth Dynasties (2160-1786 B.C..). These clocks are really grid diagrams of the decans in the sequence of their appearance. A single star shifts its position in the grid, up one square and over one, to mark an earlier hour of the night every ten days. Each name, in hieroglyphs, traces a diagonal path through the grid and gives the design its name. Additional decorations usually include images of the Bull's Leg (that is, Set, the Big Dipper), Isis, and Osiris. Another type of star clock was painted in the Twentieth Dynasty tombs of the Ramesside pharaohs, from about 1300 to 1100 B.C. These, too, appeared together with the Northern Group, Sirius, and Orion. There is no reason to think Egyptian astronomers ever entered tombs to consult the star clocks. Their purpose was funereal. They belonged to the dead.

The decans themselves were selected because they imitated the behavior of Sirius and disappeared from the nighttime sky for 70 days. During this time they were up in the daytime, with the sun, and remained, therefore, invisible (they were "alive" but you could not see them...as in life after death). In Egyptian texts, a decan's departure from the night sky was called its death. It resided in the dangerous realm of Tuat, where the sun traveled each night. An astronomical treatise from the second century after Christ, the Papyrus Carlsberg I, quotes inscriptions from the cenotaph, or symbolic tomb, of Seti I at Abydos. Explicit references liken the decanal cycle to death and resurrection:

Here the language of the decans is the language of the mortuary. In a direct turnabout the mortuary customs mirrored the stars. The deceased was said to be a star, and mummification, also a process of purification, took 70 days. Then the dead pharaoh was reborn, like the decans.

In a similar manner it makes sense that the moon-which first appears as a crescent, grows full, and then wanes-is linked with the afterlife and immortality as we see this same cycle of birth, life, death, rebirth. In that celestial cycle of birth and death there is always another new moon. Through the cycle of cosmic order the moon guarantees its own immortality, and it is a fitting image for the belief of mankind of birth, life, death, and rebirth from the dead which has been understood by the ancients since the beginning of time.

So as you can see the dead were associated with the sky. This may seem strange at first, but we can understand the ideas behind it. The souls of the dead journey to a celestial paradise; as Christians we call it "Heaven." Paradise is a realm of immortality and divinity, and that is what people see in the sky. Celestial objects, through their cycles of rising and setting, coming and going, waxing and waning, seem to die but are always reborn. They are the immortal gods, and the patterns of their movements establish order in time and space. The dead have access to their kingdom. Tombs are points of the soul's departure for the celestial realm. The astronomical components of these tombs are intimations of immortality (Dr. E.C. Krupp, Echoes Of The Ancient Skies, New American Library, 1983, pp. 100-125).

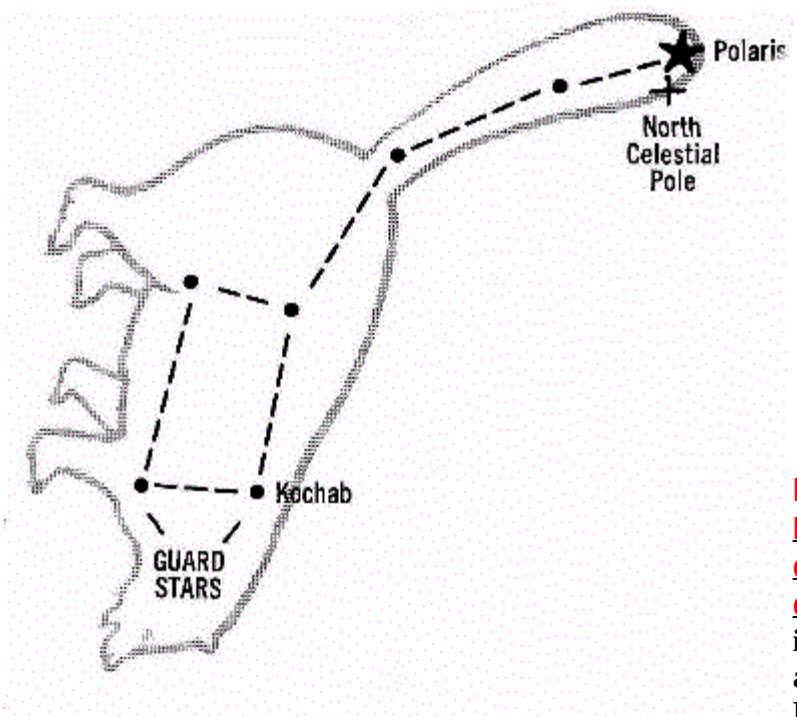
URSA MINOR...THE CONSTELLATION OF ETERNAL LIFE

Mentioned by Aratus as one of the Bears, it was thought of as the Lesser Bear because, although it is made up of seven main stars, it is considerably dimmer in appearance and also occupies a smaller place in the heavens. The constellation has also been known as a dog, with the Egyptians calling it the Jackal of Set (Allen, Star Names p. 450). In this sense it has been called the Dogμ' Tail. The Little Bear draws on the same symbolism as the Great Bear, for they both share the sacred pole. The Little Bear was also important as a navigational aid to sixth-century B.C.E. sailors because, along with the stars of Draco, it occupied the important pole position at different times in history. The Greeks incorporated the Little Bear into their mythology as either another wood nymph, apart from Callista or her child, or as Callista herself.



In ancient times the Little Bear was surrounded on three sides by the constellation Draco, the Dragon, and when the brightest star of the Dragon, Thuban, was the pole star in 3,000 B.C.E., the Little Bear was considered to be the wings of the Dragon. The current pole star is Polaris.

STARS OF URSA MINOR

There are seven main stars of Ursa Minor, the brightest being Polaris, called by medieval Arabs, Alracubba. Some of the others that are named, in descending order or magnitude, are: Kochab, Pherkad Major, Pherkad Minor, Yidun, and Farkadain. From the Queen's Chamber in the Great Pyramid the northern shaft is angled at the star Kochab (Beta Ursa Minor) in the constellation of the Little Bear - a star associated by the ancients with "cosmic regeneration" and the immortality of the soul.

The two Bears, Ursa Major and this constellation Ursa Minor and the whole Northern Hemisphere sky, are seen to revolve around a star that doesn't appear to move; Polaris, the North Star; located at the tip of the tail of the Little bear or Little Dipper and the orientation of the bear figures changes dramatically through the course of the night. From earliest times the two bears, Ursa Major and Ursa Minor, have been paired together.

With the exception of Polaris, the seven stars making up the Little Dipper, or Lesser Bear, are much fainter than the seven star making up Ursa Major, the Big Dipper, which is the most prominent group of stars in the sky. Although the Little Bear is famous as the home of the Pole Star, it was in fact invented in the 6th century B.C. as a guide to sailors and was created from the Dragon's wing, now long forgotten, which it replaced. The Little Bear is enclosed on three sides by the coils of the Dragon. To many cultures Ursa Minor was the Hole in which the earth's axle found its bearing, The stars of Ursa Minor appear on the planisphere of Denderah as an enormous hippopotamus (the bear being unknown in Egypt), or sometimes as a crocodile, who devoured the dead who had lived a life of dreadful sin. Some of these stars have also been identified as the goddess Hesmut, a mother goddess and midwife of ancient Egypt, or Shesemtet, the Raging Mother. Quote from a post to sci. archaeology by Franz Gnaedinger, Zurich: "Ursa Minor (and Ursa Major) can bestow 'Eternal Life'. According to Robert Bauval, Ursa Major and Minor resemble the adze used for the ritual opening of the mouth while according to a physician such a device was really used by the then physicians for life-saving reasons (opening the trachea when someone was bitten by a snake or stung by a scorpion). Hence we have 3 times the aspect of giving life, and as Ursa Major and Minor never sink below the horizon, they could have meant not only life but "eternal life". The northern shaft of the so-called Queen's Chamber was aiming at the then culmination of Kochab, beta Ursae Minoris. This may mean that a hypothetical statue at the upper end of the northern shaft would face the constellation of Eternal Life, while the statue behind Gantenbrink's door would face Sahu (Orion) and Sothis (/Sirius). The southern shaft of the so-called Queen's Chamber was aiming at the then culmination of Sothis/Sirius. And the Nile means life for Egypt. Hence the deified king would gain eternal life from Ursa Minor and pass it on to Egypt via the rising Nile, river of Osiris".

Frequent references are made within early records to some mountain located in the North (Polaris the celestial north pole) as the seat of the gods and the habitation of life, the south (pole) being "the abode of the prince of death and of demons". "In early-Sumerian days the heavens was believed to rest on the peak of the 'mountain of the world' in the far Northeast, where the gods had their habitations (cf. Isai xiv, 13) [the mount of congregation, in the uppermost parts of the world], while an ocean or "deep" encircled the earth which rested upon its surface, referred to as a "dazzling mountain, on which was held the assembly of the gods", and alluded to in the Book of Prophet Ezekiel xxvii 14.

Polaris has long been an important star to sailors, caravans of old winding their way over the desert by night and others who navigated their way by the stars. Located almost directly overhead as seen from the North Pole, it is situated at the tip of the tail of the Little Bear, Ursa Minor, the Lucida of that constellation. It does not rise or set but simply brightens with the coming of night and fades with the advent of day, "a never-failing, or imperishable star". Its place of honor has been acknowledged under various names, in many cultures. Perhaps more than any star other than the Sun; Polaris has been regarded as the most important star in the heavens. The polar star is the visible point in the sky where the axis mundi connects the Earth with the heavens. It is a cosmic pillar or column, the peg in the sky or the nail of heaven. The Arabs of old regarded Polaris as a hole in the sky in which the Earth's axis found its bearing. The Norsemen and the Moguls looked on Polaris as holding the Universe together, Moguls calling it the Golden Peg. Astronomers of India called it the Pivot of the Planets. A symbolic representation of Spirit as the axis mundi or center of the world.

The World Column is often portrayed as the link between Earth and the heavens. This connection is symbolized by Polaris, the northern Pole Star. The supreme deity of many culture was generally considered to have its throne at the North Star. The Egyptian god, Ra, was the central power around which a circle of lesser gods revolves, the texts say, the "stars who surround Ra". "These gods shall revolve round about him".

The ancients considered the structure of the universe to be in correspondence with the structure of the body. The universe was the "macrocosm" and the body was the "microcosm;" hence man was made in the image of the God of the Cosmos. The Egyptians also saw it as the Dog of Set, the jackal god, Anubis, who was the inventor of embalming, his task became to glorify and preserve all the dead in order to live again.

To our eyes Polaris appears to be motionless at the center of the field of circumpolar stars, "the still point in the turning world". All the other stars appear to circle around Polaris which appears fixed but this is not so, because the earth wobbles on its axis like a slowly spinning top. Polaris has long been moving nearer the North Celestial Pole as it is still doing now. It will be closest to that position around 2100 AD. The Pole Star was Thuban, alpha Draco, in 2700 BCE, the third star from the end of the tail of Draco, and was then known as the "Judge of Heaven" during the time of the building of the pyramids. 4000 BCE the star was Iota Draconis, Edasich. 12,000 years ago, before recorded history, the very bright star Vega, alpha Lyra, was the pole star. In a little more that 5000 years from now, Alderamin, the brightest star in the constellation Cepheus, the King, will be the Pole Star. In the eternal drama of the mythic universe, the galaxies and stars are not static but whirling around, interacting and playing gravitational games with each other through the mill of time. Quoting Bryce Self by a contributor to alt.history 1998/12/25, "Thuban, in the Dragon, did not want to yield to Polaris, in the Little Bear, - which was heading for the center stage. Thus he is the 'lord of (the) rebellion' and 'lord of the black void of the north'. In many passages throughout the Bible the following associations are made; the serpent in Eden, Leviathan the sea monster, the dragon, 'that ancient serpent', 'the god of this age', the king of Babylon, the king of Tyre (Phoenicia), the king of Egypt (pharaoh), the father of lies, the prince of the power of the air, etc. In Isaiah 14 he is spoken of as the instigator of war in the heavens by attempting to 'ascend to the sides of the north', in order to seat himself upon the throne of God and thus to rule the universe. At the most prominent place in the heavens the constellation Draco, the dragon, which lies coiled about that point of the sky they called 'absolute north'. This portion of the Dragon is depicted as attempting to encoil the constellation Ursa Minor which was originally called the 'little flock', or 'little sheepfold', the the faithful remnant of Israel or the people of God. We find this exact picture written in the prose of the Book of Revelation, Chapter 12, describing events yet to be enacted in human history: "And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of 12 stars (12 constellation of the zodiac, 12 tribes); And she being with child cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered. And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born, (see also Isaiah 27:1), and she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne....." Revelation 12:1-3. So this is all pictured in the stars. What the people would have seen in Jesus' day is that when he was born, there was no North Star, but Polaris was entering into the ring area that the North axis of the earth points to (actually the North Pole). The Fisherman was the constellation and Alpha Draconis, Thuban did not want to yield to Polaris, which represents Aquarius as its vortex was heading for the coveted 'spot'. That is, the most devastating battle of all is yet to be fought on earth and in the heavens. The pole star today is of course Polaris in Ursa Minor and will next enter the constellation Cepheus, which constellation pictures God as the triumphant king over all the earth". Uranus discovered March 13 1781 by Hershel one degree from Polaris (and on the declination of the Pleiades 29 Taurus). In past ages, poles stars were worshipped as the star of the age; Polaris is now the star of our age.

CANIS MAJOR..."SIRIUS"...THE DOG STAR

Not far form the stern of the argo lie two dogs, a large one lying in the south, Canis Major, and a smaller dog, Canis Minor, sitting above it on the equator. These are the dogs of Orion, chasing a hare, Lepus, and harassing the mighty bull of Taurus.

Aratus refers to Canis Major as one of Orion's hunting dogs, sitting up in a begging position but with a watchful eye on the nearby hare (Mair, Callimachus, Lycophron, Aratus, p. 233). But this dog was in the sky long before Aratus recorded it in the fourth century B.C .E. The dog was one of the first animals that human beings domesticated, thousands of years before the written word, and was worshiped universally as a guardian, usually guarding the dead or taking the dead souls back to their mother, the goddess. In early times, dogs in myth only accompanied the goddess and guarded the gates of death (Walker, The Woman's Encyclopedia Of Myths And Secrets, p. 240). The Egyptians called this guard or judge of the dead Anubis, who became their god of mummification (Ibid., p. 241). In Christian mythology, he seems to have been represented by Saint Peter at the pearly gates of heaven, playing the same role as the dog-guarding, and sometimes judging who could pass through.

This image of the dog guarding the doorway to another world is an easy extension of the domestic dog guarding its owner's door. It is from this tradition that we have the custom of carrying the bride across the threshold so the spirit guardians would think of her as a resident rather than an intruder (Ibid., p. 242).

Canis Major has been called by many names over its long history, and in earher writings it is not clear whether writers are talking about the constellation or its alpha star, Sirius.

STARS OF CANIS MAJOR

The brightest star is Sirius, and the other named stars, in descending order of magnitude, are: Murzims, in the paw, also known as The Announcer; Wezen, in the chest; and Aludra, in the tail.

About five millennia ago in ancient Egypt the new year was marked by the dawn rising of Sirius. The people of the Nile watched the early morning sky to catch the first glimpse of the star sitting in twilight glow. When it appeared on the morning side of the Sun Egyptians rejoiced for they knew that soon the Nile waters would rise, spreading out in shallow lakes along its banks to deposit fertile soil and renew the fields for abundant crops. Temples were aligned to the direction of rising of the Great Star they named Sothis, "mistress of the year." The southern shaft, as we saw in the Great Pyramid, was aimed at the bright star Sirus (Alpha Canis Major) in the Constellation of the Great Dog...Canis Major. It is easy to see the cocept of guarding the gates of death, guarding the dead, and carring the souls back to God (allegorized as the Mother goddess of Isis). This star the ancients associated with the goddess Isis, cosmic mother of the kings of Egypt. In Egypt Orion was the celestial symbol of Osiris, god of resurrection, indeed "god of everything," and Sirius was symbol of Isis, goddess of fertility. They said that the tears Isis continued to shed over the death of her husband, Osiris, added to the melting snows running down from high mountains to cause the Nile to overflow each year as the light of her star blended with the glow of morning sunlight. The two stars follow each other up and across the sky. You can easily find Sirius (Isis) by simply following the line of the belt of Orion (Osiris) down to the left. Although the passage of time has changed the relationship between the morning appearance of Sirius and the flooding of the Nile (modern Egyptians have changed it even more by constructing the Aswan Dam), we can remember what these brilliant stars meant to those people as we watch them glide across our sky.

Sirius is one of the great stars of the sky and, with its magnitude of -1.43, it is the brightest star in the heavens apart from our Sun. The Egyptians called it The Shining One or The Scorcher (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 368). The heat from Sirius was thought to cause rabies or madness in dogs, and its risings and settings were so regularly recorded it formed the foundation of the Egyptian calendar. It was worshiped as early as 3,285 B.C.E., the dog symbol being a predominant feature in hieroglyphics (Ibid., p. 364). Sirus was linked to the life-giving rising of the Nile and in that capacity it was also called the Nile Star (Allen, Star Names, p. 124). The Egyptians called it Sirius Isis (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 196). By a quirk of the Julian calendar, it did not appear to be affected by precession over thousands of years, for its precessional movement was in perfect timing with the error of the calendar-thus Sirius always rose on the same calendar date. The Egyptian year opened with the hehiacal rising of Sirius which, from about 5,000 B.C.E. to around the time of Christ, occurred every fourth year, on July 19 and 20 in the Jalian calendar. Thus it appeared that only goddesses were not subject to precession, for they were the points of stillness, or what we know as the Pole Star. However, the Egyptian priests knew of her seasonal movement; to maintain her immortality and her secret they adjusted the calendar to totally match her heliacal rising. The Pharoahs would only be crowned by the priest after they had sworn a holy oat to maintain this Sirius based calendar. To adopt a more accurate calendar would mean that Isis would lose her power as an immortal goddess. The eventual abandonment of this calendar after thousands of years, and its replacement by the Alexandrine year in 23 B.C.E. (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 281) shifted this star's heliacal rising calendar date, thereby subjecting the star to the effects of precession. And so for the first and only time, it was thought that a goddess had "died."

Dc Santillana and von Dechend in their book, Hamlet's Mill discuss the wide range of myths which are announcements that a god or goddess has died. They talk of the lament, "The great Pan is dead," that was heard floating down the Aegean during the reign of Tiberius, and how this Pan was not the Greek or Roman god, but a far more ancient Egyptian figure of some 15,000 years in age. They suggest that this Egyptian Pan was indeed the star Sirius and the goddess Isis, and that the fall of this star symbolized the death of this ancient god (De Santillana and von Deschend, Hamlet's Mill, p. 286) who was linked to Isis and thus Sirius through the goddess connection with the dog. There is also the lament to Tammuz, an Egyptian grain god allegedly called out on the night between July 19 and 20, the exact night which used to be the heliacal rising of Sirius before the new calendar was instated. Sirius did not rise before the Sun on that day and, therefore, the unthinkable had happened: a goddess had been affected by precession and slipped into the whirlpool of death. A death had occurred, not gradually, as in the case of Osiris over several thousands of years, but in one night. For in that night, 5,000 years of precession was applied to Sirius. Thus, with the change of calendar, a divine being was struck down or fell, which de Santillana and von Dechend suggest was also the time that oracles began to fail.

All this is very interesting to astrologers as it suggests the end of an era or an age where the world of interconnectedness and cycles, the foundation stones of oracles and astrology, was center stage, and now they would be put to one side for the sake of the development of logic and science. This leads one to speculate that it may be the death of another goddess, or the birth of one, that will mark the reemergence of cycles and their importance into mainstream thought.

The goddess Isis was the wife of Osiris (constellation Orion), the great god who was the first to be swallowed by precession into the whirlpool of death. In mythology he is killed and his body dismembered. Isis in mourning traveled through the land and found all the pieces of his body and, binding them together, she breathed life back into him. He lived long enough to impregnate her with their son Horus (Aldebaran in the constellation of Taurus), who later became heir to the throne (J. F. Bierlein, Parallel Myths, New York, 1994, p. 212).

DRACO, THE DRAGON

Khufu's burial chamber was fashioned deep inside the Great Pyramid. Two skinny shafts bore outward from the chamber. For decades, scholars thought they were airshafts. But in the 1960s, astronomers found that they have an astronomical purpose. At the time the pyramid was built, one of the shafts aimed toward the star that was then closest to the north celestial pole. The north celestial pole is the "hub" of the northern sky. All the stars appear to rotate around this hub. Today, the star Polaris marks the north pole. But Earth wobbles on its axis. It takes about 26,000 years to make one full wobble, and in that time, the north pole points to different stars. When the pyramids were built, the star closest to the pole was Thuban, in Draco, the dragon. Thuban, also known as Alpha Draconis, was considered a symbol of immortality since it never left the night sky, so it was natural for King Khufu to make plans to join both Thuban and Orion, symbol of Osiris, the god of the dead. Khufu's burial chamber included two shafts, one aimed at Thuban and the other at Orion, to expedite the king's journey into the afterworld. Known as the Lord of Everything, Osiris symbolized the birth, growth, death, and rebirth of the natural world. In Egyptian mythology, Osiris was murdered and dismembered by his jealous brother, Seth, then briefly brought back to life by his sister and consort Isis to father the god Horus. Egyptians saw Osiris in the Moon, whose phases caused the all-important Nile to rise and fall each month, and in the constellation Orion, whose appearance was connected with the annual flood. As god of the dead, Osiris welcomed the recently deceased to their new world. King Khufu, eager to join Osiris as quickly as possible after his death, had a shaft constructed in his burial chamber not only to Thuban but another pointing directly to Orion, which was considered to be the final resting place of the pharaohs.

Thuban, as well as Polaris, are called circumpolar stars. The texts refer to circumpolar stars as being imperishable stars, meaning that they were stars which did not die, that did not go below the horizon into the underworld. The texts also frequently reference the King ascending the sky to be amongst the imperishable stars. To explain, circumpolar stars are stars that are so near to the celestial pole that they never set, they merely revolve round the pole, like dancers round a maypole. In 3000BC, when ancient astronomers observed the heavens and saw the circumpolar stars rotate around the polestar they did not observe them rotate around Polaris they observed them rotate around Thuban the Alpha star in the constellation of Draco. The North star (pole star) also changes with the precession of the equinoxes. The North star was Thuban (Alpha Draconis) when the Great Pyramid was constructed to align with true North. The descending passage of the Great Pyramid points to Thuban, the most accurately aligned pole star of all the North stars in the 25,800-year cycle of our Earth. The Egyptian belief that stars "die" when they drop below the horizon made the circumpolar stars especially important. They were identified with immortality, which was an obsession with the Egyptians.

Magical incantations inscribed on the interior walls of some Egyptian pyramids pinpoint the destiny of the pharaohs once buried within them. These prayers are known as the Pyramid Texts, and they tell us that the final destination of a dead king's soul was the sky. In particular, the pharaoh flew to the circumpolar stars. Neither rising nor setting, these stars migrate around the north celestial pole without ever slipping into the underworld below the horizon. To the Egyptians they were the "undying" stars, and their immortality would naturally attract a soul in search of everlasting life. In ancient Egyptian belief these stars advanced as a celestial army, parading eternally around the hub of heaven and keeping the cosmos on course with the daily rotation of the sky.

According to the Pyramid Texts, the pharaoh also rose to the stars of Orion, the Hunter. Egyptian astronomy recognized Orion, or at least his Belt, as the celestial incarnation of Osiris, the god who presided over cyclical change, seasonal renewal, and the transformation of the soul.

This explains why that the two "soul shafts" from the King's Chamber pointed to Orion and to Thuban in the constellation Draco.

Throughout the ages this constellation has been seen as a snake, a dragon, or a serpent. It was worshiped by the Babylonians as Bel the Great Dragon (Allen, Star Names, p. 203) and was referred to in Christian mythology as the serpent in the Garden of Eden. It once occupied a much larger space in the heavens, encompassing the two Bears, Ursa Major and Minor. The Little Bear was originally known as the Dragon's wings. Half bird and half snake, this is the original mythical animal that occurred in the mythologies of all cultures. Draco's stars were the Pole stars from about 4,500 B.C.E. to about 2,000 B.C.E.; therefore dating the Great Pyramid. Thuban, in the fifth coil of the Dragon, is the brightest star of the constellation. In 2,700 B.C.E., when it occupied the pole position, the Dragon rotated around the "unmoving point of the world" like the hands of a clock, in a reverse direction, guarding its center.

So the mighty Celestial Dragon guarded the greatest treasure of all, the pivot-point of the world. It never slept, because it never set. This was the Crocodile of the Egyptians who devoured any dead beings whose hearts were too heavy for the scale of judgment, thus stopping them from immortal life at the Pole. This is the nonsleeping, hundred-eyed dragon that the Greeks had guarding the golden apples in the Garden of Hesperides (Jobes, Outer Space, p. 170). Apples were also the dragon's treasure offered to Eve in the Christian Garden of Eden. Rowan berries of eternal life were protected by its counterpart in Celtic mythology. By the time of the Arthurian legends, the dragon was seen to protect or guard material treasure of gold and jewels, and when its symbolism was in tatters with the decline of all things feminine, it was considered the perfect hunting game for knights. As the feminine has reemerged, however, the image of the dragon is no longer seen to be the fearftil creature that Saint George had to kill. Draco, the Dragon, is still the guardian of both spiritual and physical treasure.

For the Dragon, even though reduced in size by modern cartographers, still coils around the unmoving point of the world, still guards the entrance to a forgotten place of immortality and creation. The predominant theme for this constellation is the guarding feminine, so another possible approach to this alpha star, Thuban, or its sisters, is to see it as one who actively guards or protects, in contrast to Ursa Major, which is linked to passive guardianship and proctection.

ORION/OSIRIS...GOD IN THE SKY

Around 6000 B.C.E., when the stars of Gemini rose Gemini rose at the spring equinox, the Egyptians, like most other cultures, measured their year by the rising and setting of the brightest stars, notating their calendars with their heliacal risings.

The importance of a heliacal rising star, one that rises just before the Sun, is that the star acts as a herald for the sunrise.

The rising Sun was considered by the Egyptians to be the infant Horus in the arms of Isis. As the Sun rose, signifying the return of the god (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 36), it appeared to sweep up the star in its light and carry it across the sky. Thus the god mixed his energy with that of the star, and the star was illuminated by the god. By noon the Sun was no longer seen as the infant Horus; rather, it was the adult Horus, or Ra; and at sunset it became Osiris, the god of the underworld since the sun was believed to have died just like Osiris (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 25).

Lockyer implies that between 6,000-4,000 B.C.E. the importance of the solstice and spring equinox had been established (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 78) as the beginning of the agricultural cycle, and that the Egyptians would have noted that Orion rose on the important morning of the spring equinox, which was linked to the annual flooding of the Nile (Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, p. 85). Indeed this connecting of the rising of Orion and the equinox has been placed at a far earlier time by Sellers, who points out that the last time a star in Orion rose at the equinox would have been about 6,700 B.C.E. (Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt, London: Penguin, 1992, p. 43). Then, as now, the brightest and most spectacular constellation of the night sky was Orion, and the image of this huge humanlike constellation, rising in the predawn light and being scooped up into the fiery boat of the Sun, would have been quite impressive, to say the least.

Orion/Osiris was, to the Egyptians god (Wallis E.A. Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol 1 (New York: Dover Books, 1969), p. 41). The constellation was not a symbol of god, it was god; god's physical place or appearance, in the same way that Sirius in Canis Major was the dwelling place of Isis (Wallis E.A. Budge, The Gods of the Egyptians, vol 2 (New York: Dover Books, 1969), p. 215).

Orion rose with the spring equinox Sun and claimed rulership of the world age. The Egyptians knew Orion as Osiris and the Pharaohs were believed to have come from him; they were his physical flesh, and were returned to him.

However, as hundreds of years went by, the Egyptians observed that less and less of the constellation Orion rose before the dawn on the equinox morning. The effects of precession caused the god to slip lower and lower in the sky. So, whereas at one time he was fully risen before sunrise, there came a time when only a part of the constellation was above the eastern horizon before the equinoctial sunrise. The constellation Orion managed to rise for roughly two thousand years but the Egyptians knew that their immortal god was slipping below the horizon which was symbolic of "death," taking the journey across the water as he slipped into the underworld.

Mary Settegast, in her book Plato Prehistorian, talks of the death of Osiris occurring in the sixth millennium (the period when the constellation Orion was slipping from the equinox position) as it seemed to influence the spread and design of the pottery of pre-dynastic Upper Egypt (Mary Settegast, Plato Prehistory (New York: Lindisfarne, 1990), p. 156). At this time there was a sudden spreading of pottery into other areas, which Settegast suggests is reflected in the myth of the journeys of Isis in seeking her dead husband.

To account for these observations, the Egyptians developed the concept of an immortal god dying and passing on his throne to his son. Now, one of the features of the constellation Orion is that it contains a bright red star called Betelgeuse, found in Orion's right shoulder. By coincidence, the constellation Taurus, the next constellation to herald the dawn of the equinox, also contains a bright red star, by the name of Aldebaran. So, as Osiris died and was replaced by the stars of Taurus, the natural "heir" to the solar throne appeared (Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt, p. 33). This constellation was therefore considered to be the son of Osiris, Horus. Osiris became the god of the underworld or afterlife, and Horus, his son, ruled the new world order. With a religious philosophy that ran for over six thousand years, the Egyptians had to create a religion that would allow for three generations of gods, as three constellations slipped over the equinox.

Important for successive theologies in Egypt is the effects of precession upon the constellations at the vernal equinox as they slipped below the horizon: Scorpio, Libra, Virgo, Leo, Cancer, Taurus, Aries, Pisces, etc. Each of one these various constellations had its own unique "theology" that held sway over the minds of mankind during the times they ruled over the vernal equinox.

Many modern theologians/mythologists agree that this precessional movement of Orion is the source of the religious concept of an afterlife given to us by a god who dies. Osiris/Orion is a "prefiguring of Christ" (Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt, p. 47). God is immortal; yet the god also dies, however, in some manner. The dead god then promises us an afterlife in his presence (Sellers, The Death of the Gods in Ancient Egypt, p. 122-123). The following pyramid text captures this Egyptian concept.

You sleep that you may wake

You die that you may live (Pyramid Text, 1,975 B.C.E., quoted in Sellers, p. 127).

The constellation Orion is, therefore, an paradigm of god. The constellation Orion was again believed to be the place of God in the Heavens; the Dwat and it was this area to which one of the secret chambers in the Great Pyramid pointed.

We humans have modeled our male gods on this constellation for probably well over eight thousand years. This is in contrast to the never-setting circumpolar Ursa Major and Ursa Minor, the goddess, for goddesses do not die in our philosophy (circumpolar stars that circle the pole star never set therefore they never die...they are immortal). Goddesses may fade, but they are immortal. The She-Bear (never sets as she circles the pole). However, the male god on the equator and the gods of the ecliptic are subject to the hero's journey of the whirlpool as they are swept below the horizon due to precession. This one constellation, Orion/Osiris, more than any other group of stars, has affected the human race in a most profound way.

OSIRIS AND THE CONSTELLATION ORION

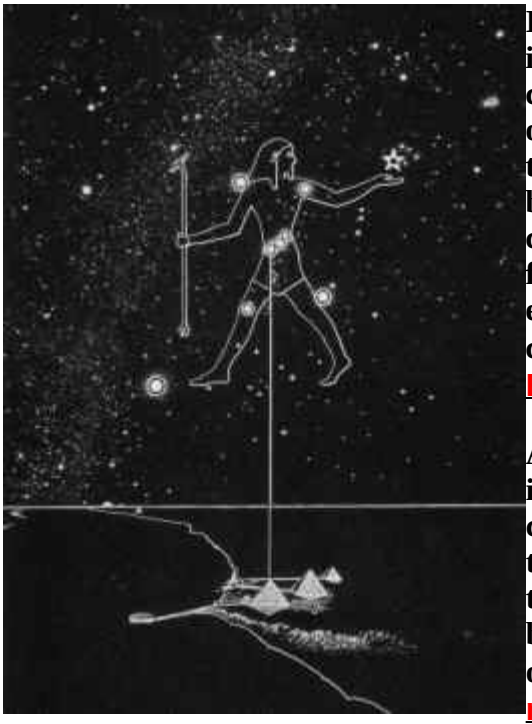
The constellation Orion is, therefore, an archetype of god. We humans have modeled our male gods on this constellation for probably well over eight thousand years. This is in contrast to the never-setting circumpolar Ursa Major and Minor, the goddess, for goddesses do not die in our philosophy. Goddesses may fade, but they are immortal. The She-Bear never sets as she circles the pole. However, the male god on the equator and the gods of the ecliptic are subject to the hero's journey of the whirlpool of all stars as they slip beneath the horizon and "die." This one constellation, more than any other group of stars, has affected the human race in a most profound way.

It has long been accepted by Egyptologists that the imagined skyward ascent of the King's soul was either in the north of the sky among the "Imperishable Stars" [thus the shaft pointing to Thuban in the King's Chamber in the Great Pyramid] or in the south of the sky amongst the stars of Orion [thus the other shaft pointing to Orion in the King's Chamber in the Great Pyramid] (I.E.S. Edwards, The Pyramids of Egypt, Penguin, London 1993, p. 285.) This specific belief is materialized in the Great Pyramid of Giza by the so-called star-shafts emanating from the King's Chamber, where one was targeted north to the circumpolar stars and the other targeted south to Orion (E.C. Krupp, Echoes of the Ancient Skies, Oxford Univ. Press, 1983, p.102). In consideration of this, it is justified to understand that the pyramids were in some symbolic way not only a picture and imprint of the "sky upon earth" but an eternal monument of Gods' Revelation of Eternal Life left for all mankind.

AS ABOVE...SO BENEATH

Answer for yourself: Is there any scientific evidence that the layout of the 3 great Pyramids at Giza (Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure) correspond to an image of the three belt stars of Orion (Alnitak, Alnitan and Mintaka)?



Answer for yourself: How closely do the 3 Great Pyramids at Giza match their heavenly counterparts?

As we have learned the Pharaoh was identified with Osiris. This god is represented in the sky by the constellation Sahu which we know today as Orion. What strikes us is the almost identical alignments of not only the three stars in Orion's belt but the alignment of the pyramids on the Giza Plateau.

Answer for yourself: Could the Egyptians have perhaps tried to copy this constellation on earth? With pyramids as representations of stars, is it possible that these pyramids were built to be a representation of "Heaven on Earth"?

By superimposing a plan of the Giza plateau with a star chart of the area of the three belt stars of Orion. On can see that the match is almost perfect. The error is about 8' 11" or 0.1364° for the pyramid of Menkaure by aligning the stars Alnitak and AlNilam with Khufu and Khafre.

If we look at a picture of the pyramid arrangement at Giza and compare it with Orion's belt - three remarkable stars exactly in the centre of the constellation - we can quickly find striking similarities. The arrangement of the three objects in both cases is almost identical: three pyramids and three stars, both running diagonally on a line from south to north, and both with a significant deviation of one object from this line. And in both cases the "deviationist" is smaller than its brothers: The deviating star is fainter, and the deviating pyramid smaller than the rest. It should be evident for all to see that the Egyptians were expressing their religious concepts in the building of the pyramids of Giza: As Above, So Beneath.

According to Buval in his The Orion Mystery there is a catch: the inclination of the belt of Orion when standing due south does not correspond to the diagonal of the pyramids on the ground. But only today! Due to a slow cyclical motion called precession the inclination of the belt varies with a cycle of 25,800 years. And in the year 10500 B.C.E. both lines made a perfect match. This dates these Giza Pyramids as much older than many Egytologists want to admit. The sky above was mirrored by the pyramids on the ground! Since it was believed the soul of the Pharaoh ascends to Orion/Osiris we now understand that Heaven had come to earth and such alignments again caught in stone for all time the understanding of the Egyptians, the first monotheists, concerning their beliefs about God and the afterlife.

CONCLUSION

For many years classical Egyptologists maintained that the Pyramids were merely grandiose tombs to commemorate dead Pharaohs, built by slave labor and laid out in a relatively unstructured manner. However, recent work by Robert Bauval has shed an intriguing new light on the issue. He realized that the relative sizes, and detailed positioning of, the Giza pyramids were a faithful mimicry of the stars forming the 'belt' in the constellation of Orion. In addition, it transpired that the supposed 'air shafts' in the pyramids actually pointed directly towards Orion, as well as other stars and constellations which had religious significance to the Egyptians. The Orion shaft was seen to be a vehicle signifying the projection of the soul of the deceased king out towards the constellation which represented Osiris' resurrection. These discoveries concerning the placement of the pyramids at Giza let alone the religious significance of the alignments of the 4 shaft in the Great Pyramid alone re-wrote our understanding of the motivations for building the pyramids and the state of technological advance of the ancient culture. Literally Egypt was writing in stone for eternity the earliest religious beliefs concerning God and His revelation to them and the ancients. It was a Bible in stone revealing God's message to His creation that Eternal Life awaits us at the end of our journey as we partake of the path of Osiris when we die.

As Christians and followers of Jesus we say it differently today but understand the message is the same: we believe and hope that when we die we go to God, we go to the sky, we go to Heaven. Egypt taught us this first!

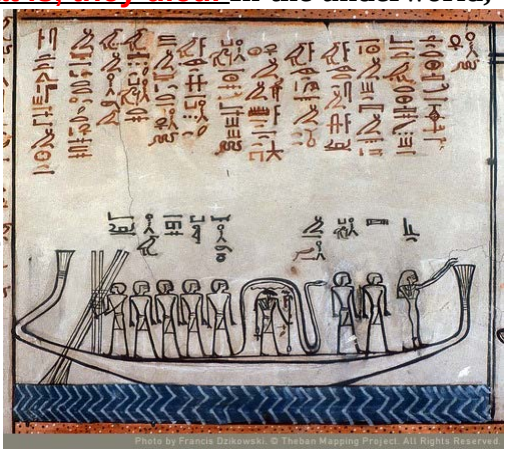
RESURRECTING THE SOUL

Although people in traditional cultures take part in the renewal of cosmic order through seasonal ceremonies and other calendrical rituals that are locked in step with intervals of cyclic time, their ultimate participation is the journey of their souls. When, at death, they imitated the setting of the sun, the waning of the moon, the end of the year, or the completion of a cosmic age, they also prepared for the next life that must follow like the dawn, the moon's first crescent, the new year, and the next era. Ceremonies that called upon celestial imagery were devised, then, to revive the dead and provide them with new life. For example, the symbols of ancient Egypt's funeral ceremony, "the Opening of the Mouth," though not seasonal, still were borrowed from the sky.

"The Opening of the Mouth" ceremony was intended to restore the ka, or personality, to the body for existence in the afterlife. A touch on the eyelids and a touch on the mouth with an adze-like ritual instrument reanimated the senses. This adze was called by the same name as the word for the constellation of the Big Dipper. To the Egyptians these stars represented a celestial bull (not Taurus) or just its leg or thigh, and they were portrayed as part of the bull's body, stylized as a haunch or an actual leg. The name of the constellation was Meskhetiu, which identifies it as the leg of Set, the Adversary of Osiris. Tethered to the sky's "mooring post," the circumpolar leg of Set swings around the celestial pole.



The ceremonial adze even looks like a dipper, as it appears, for example, in the painting on the north wall of the celebrated tomb of Tutankhamun. Tutankhamun's successor, Ay, dressed in the leopard skin cloak of the sem-priest, is portrayed here using it to perform the Opening of the Mouth on Tutankhamun. Between Ay and Tutankhamun, a bull's leg, another adze, and more funeral paraphernalia sit upon a small table.

In charge of the ceremony, the sem-priest impersonated Horus, the son and successor of Osiris. By spiritually reviving the deceased, the priest in effect reenacts the victory of Horus in his battle with Set and the reestablishment of the authority of Osiris. This authority was, of course, transferred to Horus just as Tutankhamun's authority was handed over to Ay. In the myth of the Triumph of Horus, Horns lost an eye. A judgment by the gods returned it to him, however, and the "Eye" became one of the trophies of the contest. Set's leg also became such a trophy and is sometimes called the "Eye" as a result. This symbol of the victory - and therefore of resurrection - also turns up as the actual leg of a bull that is slaughtered as part of the ceremony. This leg, like the adze, is used to give new life to the dead.

The leg of the slaughtered bull, the dipper-like adze, and the Big Dipper in the sky all represent the same thing: the symbolic renewal of life. But all three of them are associated with Set, the personification of chaos. Because chaos was defeated by Horus, these emblems of Set belong to the new order. They are powerful symbols to be used in what is a parallel renewal - resurrection, itself a victory over chaos. The Big Dipper was already associated with eternal life because its stars are circumpolar. They were the undying, imperishable stars. In death the king ascended to their circumpolar realm, and there he preserved the cosmic order. The Egyptian belief that stars "die" when they drop below the horizon made the circumpolar stars especially important. They were identified with immortality, which was an obsession with the Egyptians. There were a set of circumpolar constellations that they depicted in tomb paintings, called the Northern Constellations. The only one of these that we have identified is the Big Dipper, which was represented as the leg of a bull. Curiously, the Big Dipper is not currently circumpolar when viewed from Egypt. But taking precession into account shows that the Big Dipper was much closer to the North Celestial Pole in 2000 BC and it was circumpolar at that time. The Egyptians believed that when the Sun (or other celestial bodies) dropped below the horizon, they entered the underworld. That is, they died. In the underworld, the Sun god navigated a river in a barque (boat). At the various hours of the night, the Sun faced different dangers in its journey. Rituals were carried out to ensure that the Sun could overcome these perils and be reborn in the morning. Similar dangers were faced by a pharaoh after death. The book Amduat described the dangers and the rituals needed to overcome them; the book was illustrated on the walls of some tombs. Boats were sometimes entombed with the pharaoh so he would be able to navigate the underworld river. Understand that this first understanding of the perilous journey of the soul of the pharaoh after death in the underworld will become the pattern for all the mystery religious that will follow. "Death and spiritual rebirth" is the basic theme which pervades all of the ancient mysteries, in one form or another.

Christians did not reject the religious hope of salvation through the blood of a bull or a ram; they did not deny the existence of Cybele and Attis or Mithra. What they did was to claim that in Jesus the mythical hope had become an historical reality (for them allegory and metaphor had become literal). The same can be said of the relationship between Dionysus and wine. In Christian communion, according to Christians, this ancient mythical dream becomes a reality. Christians drew upon the myths and images of the ancient world as vehicles for expressing the new Christian experience. The question posed for us is if these "myths and allegories" as understood for thousands of years had indeed become a historical reality in the literal sense with Jesus. Many opinions exist upon this matter but when one sees the falsification of the Hebrew Bible in order to make this so and the taking of hundreds of Hebrew Scriptures out of context or purposefully mistranslating them in order to make it appear if these "allegories" had become a historical reality in Jesus of Galilee then the thinking believer has quite a problem on his hands.

TRACING THE COSMIC GODMAN DOWN THROUGH HISTORY...FROM OSIRIS TO JESUS

"A Christian's religious belief system, when tested and exposed to contradictory facts from Biblical languages, Biblical history, Biblical culture, and archeology, must in the Spirit of Truth and Repentance, be flexible enough to change"...Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

THE ASTRO-THEOLOGY OF THE ESSENES AND THEIR "GODMAN-SAVIOR" CONCEPT

In order to make accurate comparisons and trace the theological evolution of the Essene "Godman concept" it is necessary to acquaint ourselves with the fundamental tenants of such "Astro-Theology" and beliefs. Only when you have become familiar with each individual religious tenant connected with the "Cosmic Godman Redeemer" and how such "beliefs" were begun can one fully understand and recognize them accurately as they were later applied and written about Jesus in the New Testament. Let us begin at the beginning.

TRACING THE ORIGINS FOR ESSENE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS....THE PAGAN SOURCES

The following articles and information will be new to the vast majority of our readership, and that being so, it is very important when reading the following information concerning world religions that you take careful note as to the various religious doctrines that you encounter. It won't take long before you begin to recognize the repetition of the vast majority of these different "religious beliefs" as you follow the evolution of world religions. What is of major interest to us is that many of these "core" religious beliefs can be shown to have originated from Sun-Worship in one way or the other. These "core" religious beliefs that find their root in Sun-Worship of the nation will later be synthesized into a concise set of beliefs by Pythagoras and others and will ultimately finds their home in the Essene religious community owing to their rejection of Biblical Judaism in the first century. That being so then it becomes very problematic when these same religious beliefs again surface as Divine and unique revelations in Christianity which is just another form of Essene religious expression. So, take a note pad and read carefully and look for repetitions of religious doctrines involving soteriology (salvation), redeemers (godmen), Eucharists (eating the body and drinking the blood of gods), etc. One you compile your notes then it will come in handy for a quick reference when we enter our Essene studies. One familiar with these "core" religious doctrines we will deal with Sun-Worship later in the web-site where you can see the origin for most of the world religious though.

SIMILARITY BETWEEN THE EGYPTIAN GOD OSIRIS AND THE JESUS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT...COINCIDENCE?

Having been requested by several of our readership at Bet Emet Ministries to share information we might have on the similarities between Jesus and the Egyptian God-man Osiris I thought this might be a good time to share some of the unique similarities between both these "godmen." You, the reader, will have to evaluate and study it out for yourself if the truth as been told concerning the Jesus of the New Testament or if "copies" of pagan gods have found their way into the Jesus story of the New Testament. Let us not be confused to believe that such a "similar pattern" only existed in Egypt because such similarities of various "godmen" found their way down through the path of Gentile history until it finally culminated in Rome and its final expression of Gentile Christianity. Now, let us look at the similarities.

OSIRIS AND JESUS SIMILARITIES COINCIDENCE?

What form the details of the history of Osiris took in the early dynasties it is impossible to say, and we know not whether Osiris was the god of the resurrection to the predynastic or prehistoric Egyptians, or whether that role was attributed to him after Mena began to rule in Egypt. There is, however, good reason for assuming that in the earliest dynastic times Osiris occupied the position of god and judge of those who had risen from the dead by his help, for already in the 17th dynasty, about B.C. 3800, king Men-kau-Ra (the Mycerinus of the Greeks) is identified with him, and on his coffin not only is he called "Osiris, King of the South and North, Men-kau-Ra, living for ever," but the genealogy of Osiris is attributed to him, and he is declared to be "born of heaven, offspring of Nut, flesh and bone of Seb." It is evident that the priests of Heliopolis "edited" the religious texts copied and multiplied in the College to suit their own views, but in the early times when they began their work, the worship of Osiris was so widespread, and the belief in him as the god of the resurrection so deeply ingrained in the hearts of the Egyptians, that even in the Heliopolitan system of theology Osiris and his cycle, or company of gods, were made to hold a very prominent position. Osiris represented to men the idea of a man who was both god and man, and he typified to the Egyptians in all ages the being who by reason of his sufferings and death as a man could sympathize with them in their own sickness and death. The idea of his human personality also satisfied their cravings and yearnings for intercourse with a being who, though he was partly divine, yet had much in common with themselves. Originally they looked upon Osiris as a man who lived on the earth as they lived, who ate and drank, who suffered a cruel death, who by the help of certain gods triumphed over death, and attained unto everlasting life. But what Osiris did they could do, and what the gods did for Osiris they must also do for them, and as the gods brought about his resurrection so they must bring about theirs, and as they made him the ruler of the underworld so they must make them to enter his kingdom and to live there as long as the god himself lived. Osiris, in some of his aspects, was identified with the Nile, and with Ra, and with several other "gods" known to the Egyptians, but it was in his aspect as god of the resurrection and of eternal life that he appealed to men in the valley of the Nile; and for thousands of years men and women died believing that, inasmuch as all that was done for Osiris would be done for them symbolically, they like him would rise again and inherit life everlasting. However far back we trace religious ideas in Egypt, we never approach a time when it can be said that there did not exist a belief in the Resurrection, for everywhere it is assumed that Osiris rose from the dead; sceptics must have existed, and they probably asked their priests what the Corinthians asked Saint Paul, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" But beyond doubt the belief in the Resurrection was accepted by the dominant classes in Egypt.

The centre and home of the worship of Osiris in Egypt under the early dynasties was Abydos, where the head of the god was said to be buried. It spread north and south in the course of time, and several large cities claimed to possess one or other of the limbs of his body. The various episodes in the life of the god were made the subject of solemn representations in the temple, and little by little the performance of the obligatory and non-obligatory services in connection with them occupied, in certain temples, the greater part of the time of the priests. The original ideas concerning the god were forgotten and new ones grew up; from being the example of a man who had risen from the dead and had attained unto life everlasting, he became the cause of the resurrection of the dead; and the power to bestow eternal life upon mortals was transferred from the gods to him. The alleged dismemberment of Osiris was forgotten in the fact that he dwelt in a perfect body in the underworld, and that, whether dismembered or not, he had become after his death the father of Horus by Isis (immaculate conception). As early as the XIIth dynasty, about B.C. 2500, the worship of this god had become almost universal, and a thousand years later Osiris had become a sort of national god. The attributes of the great cosmic gods were ascribed to him, and he appeared to man not only as the god and judge of the dead, but also as the creator of the world and of all things in it. He who was the son of Ra (son of God) became the equal of his father, and he took his place side by side with him in heaven (forming a type of coequality with God & basis for the Egyptian Trinity).

We have an interesting proof of the identification of Osiris with Ra in Chapter XVII. of the Book of the Dead. It is a noticeable fact that even at his meeting with Ra the soul of Osiris preserves the human face, the sign of his kinship with man.

Now Osiris became not only the equal of Ra, but, in many respects, a greater god than he. It is said that from the nostrils of the head of Osiris, which was buried at Abydos, came forth the scarabaeus which was at once the emblem and type of the god Khepera, who caused all things to come into being, and of the resurrection. In this manner Osiris became the source and origin of gods, men, and things, and the manhood of the god was forgotten (human nature deemphasized and Divinity emphasized). The next step was to ascribe to him the attributes of God; thus we see how a man became a God and served as the "prototype" for all other Godmen which would come after in the "image" of Osiris..the first Godman.

WAS HORUS THE PROTOTYPE FOR THE JESUS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT?

The story of Horus, a major Egyptian God, is told in the Book of Vivifying the Soul Forever over 3,000 years before the birth of Christ. The Jesus story in the Bible is in many places a recycled version of the Horus story. The comparisons given below prove without a doubt that much in the New Testament is full of myths and stories recycled from earlier times and made to fit the various characters of the Bible.

- Horus is the Father seen in the son.. Jesus said he was the way, the truth and the life.
- Horus claims to be the light of the world represented by the symbolic eye, the sign of salvation. Jesus stated that he is the light of the world.
- Horus said that he was the way, the truth, the life. Jesus said he was the way, the truth and the life.
- Horus was the plant, the shoot. Jesus says "I am the true vine."
- Horus says It is I who traverse the heavens, I go round the Elysian Fields. Eternity has been assigned to me without end, Lo! I am heir to endless time and my attribute is eternity. Jesus says I am come down from heaven, for this is the will of the Father, that everyone who beholdeth the Son and believeth in him should have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.
- Horus...I open the Tuat that I may drive away the darkness. Jesus says I am come a light unto the world.
- Horus says I am equipped with thy words O Ra [Father in Heaven] and repeat them to those who are deprived of breath. These were the words of the Father in heaven. Jesus says The Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak. Whatsoever I speak therefore even as the Father said unto me, so I speak. The word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's which sent me."
- Horus baptized with water by Anup. Jesus baptized with water by John the Baptist.
- Horus-Aan, the name of the divine scribe. Jesus-John the divine scribe.
- Horus born in Annu, the place of bread. Jesus Born in Bethlehem, the house of bread.
- Horus The good shepherd with the crook on his shoulders. Jesus The good shepherd with a lamb on his shoulders.
- Horus Seven on board the boat with him. Jesus Seven fishermen on board the boat with Jesus.

- Horus The morning star. Jesus The morning star.
- Horus Who gives the morning star to his followers. Jesus who gives the morning star to his followers.
- Horus The name of Ra on the head of the deceased. Jesus The name of the father written on the forehead.
- Horus The paradise of the Pole star...Am-Khemen. Jesus The Holy City lighted by one luminary that is neither the sun nor the moon.
- Horus Har-Seshu or servants of Horus. Jesus The servants of Jesus Christ.

Now it is up to the "thinking" believer to decide for himself if the above examples are plagiarism as applied to Jesus by the New Testament writers, coincidental, or Divine Revelation!

VICARIOUS ATONEMENT...FIRST FOUND IN EGYPTIAN RELIGION...AND YOU THOUGHT JESUS WAS THE FIRST?

As we approach this article it is important to recap what we have learned so far. We have seen that the Ancient Egyptians saw "God" in the Heavens and over times such observations "spoke" to them about the Creator and His "message in the stars" as they understood it. Over time these "observations" in the Heavens and in Nature (which was influenced by the Heavens and the Sun) were correlated and later personified by the Ancients into stories of gods and godmen and every Gentile nation saw these same things and made similar observations. The Egyptians saw in the Heavens the only God they knew: A Creator which creates, sustains, and destroys. With such "death" of stars and the receding of constellations below the horizon (seen as death) came similar ideas of a "return" to one's Creator where judgment was to be awaited. Of course this was later applied to mankind as well and in such judgment man needed favor with the judge...in this case Osiris. This explains why almost every Gentile nation of the world has such similarities to the "Osiris Myth" or the "Osiris Pattern" in their religions histories and why most of the "Jesus story" as found in the New Testament is little more than a retelling of Egyptian religious myths as found recorded in Egyptian and other Gentile ancient religious writings since the beginning of mankind's earliest written records. Understand as well with this "judgment" would come alternate ways to procure a favorable verdict from Osiris; the judge of the dead. This is where we trip up as Christians as concepts understood as "symbolical" and "allegorical" are applied in a literal way to the new Osiris named Jesus. Understand as well that to them this was understood as an "allegory" of what they perceived as they looked on the Creator's handiwork in the Heavens. They even made connections in Nature since the Heavens influenced the growing seasons and the food chain. But again it has to be said these understandings of these Egytpians were "allegories" of higher spiritual truths as they perceived them in their lives. We as Christians and followers of Jesus fall into idolatry and blasphemy of the Creator when we attach similar religious beliefs to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua/Jesus and believe them in a "LITERAL" way as we have been taught under the influence of Western Christianity.

Failing to understand the difference between "allegory" and "literalism" has resulted in a false atonement which unfortunately has been applied to the Jesus of history as it was of the original "Jesus figure".....Osiris. It is my hope that after seeing what the ancient Egyptians saw in the heavens then you will be able to see how such "allegories" later became "literal" religious beliefs which were attached to false gods and dying godmen in almost every nation under the sun and finally to Jesus/Yeshua by the Essenes and later Rome. Understand that we desire the truth about Jesus and not just the re-telling of the "Osiris" myth over and over again through countless generations where finally it was again applied to a Jewish Rabbi named Yeshua in the Fertile Crescent in the first century B.C. One's relationship with God should be built upon truth and not Astro-theology and concepts personified from nature. It is to this task of recovering such Divine truth that we now turn.

That solemn trial of every man for his conduct in this life, which was to fix his reward or punishment in the next, is one of the most interesting of the pictures on the Egyptian funereal papyri, and was enacted by the priests as part of the funeral ceremony. They put on masks distinctive of the several gods, and thus received the body in due form. Osiris sat on a raised throne, holding his two scepters, and wearing the crown of Upper Egypt. Before him were placed the offerings, and near him were seated the four lesser gods of the dead. The deceased holds up his hands in prayer, and is introduced by two goddesses, each wearing on her head the emblem of truth. The wicked Typhon, as an hippopotamus, the Cerberus of the Greeks, accuses him to the judge, and demands that he shall be punished; while the four lesser gods of the dead intercede as advocates or mediators on his behalf. One only needs to see these four gods as positioned on the altar before Osiris, the judge of the underworld and the dead, as these four gods give their lives for an atonement for the soon to be judged "sinner."

A scene from the the Book of the Dead depicts the Judgement of the Dead. Anubis watches the scales; on the right, Thoth records the results; Amemet, next to Anubis, waits to eat sinful hearts. In the scales are shown the deceased's heart on left, and the feather of Maat on the right. But a large pair of scales is set up, which is quietly adjusted by the dog-headed Anubis and the hawk-headed Horus. In one scale is placed the heart or conduct of the deceased, and in the other a figure of the goddess of truth. A small weight is moved along the beam by Horus, to make the two scales balance, and to determine how much the conduct falls short of the standard weight. In some stories it is taught that Anubis is the son of Set and Isis. In others He is seen as the son of Ra and Isis. He is the God who weighs the heart at death. He stands before the scales of judgement, a feather in one hand and the heart of the deceased person in the other. Gently He places the heart upon the scales. Then placing the feather upon the opposite scales He weighs to see how just the deceased has been in life. From this He could tell where your soul would go. The rank and importance of Anubis was seen as great as that of Osiris. In the embalmment of Osiris Anubis was called Khent Sehet, "Governor of the Hall of the God". One of His names as the god of the funeral mountain was Tep-Tu-f, "He who is upon his hill". Forty-two assessors are at hand to assist Osiris in forming his judgment, and each declares the deceased mans innocence of that particular crime of which that assessor takes notice. The judgment, when pronounced, is written down by the ibis-headed Thoth, as recording angel, or god of writing. Thus are measured the goodness and the failings of the life lately ended. Those who were too uncultivated to listen to a sermon might thus learn wisdom from what they saw with their eyes, and this ceremony was a forcible method of teaching the ignorant multitude that a day of judgment awaits us all after death, and that we should so regulate our lives that, when weighed in the great balance, they may not be found wanting.

But notwithstanding this show of a trial, and this ceremony of the great scales, the Egyptians, like other Pagan nations, had very little trust in the justice of the Judge; and to bribe him, and to appease his wrath, they prudently brought their sin-offerings, which in our figure lie upon the altar in the form of a Lotus flower. The same offerings are laid before the assessors in the hope that they also may thereby be persuaded to return favorable answers to the questions that the judge may put to them. Again the four lesser gods, who come forward as the friends and advocates of the trembling sinner, may be seen at the head of a tablet in the British Museum, strengthening their mediation on his behalf by laying their own gifts upon the altar before Osiris. On other tables we see other gods joining him in his prayers as his advocates, and making their offerings jointly with him. Nor was this always thought enough to obtain from the judge a verdict in favor of the deceased. The greater the sacrifice, the greater would be the chance of a favorable verdict. Accordingly, the four lesser gods are themselves supposed to offer themselves as an atoning sacrifice on behalf of the sinner; and on a funeral tablet in the British Museum, dated in 62nd year of Rameses II., we see the deceased has placed them (the four lesser god who give their lives for the sinner) on the altar before Osiris, as his sin offering.

RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD

The resurrection of the dead to a second life had been a deep-rooted religious opinion among the Egyptians from the earliest times. They told Herodotus that when the soul left its own body, it took up its abode in the bodies of other animals, and was there imprisoned during a number of other short lives; and thus, after passing for three thousand years through the bodies of birds, beasts, and fishes, it was again allowed to return into its old dwelling. Among the sculptures on the sarcophagus of Oimenepthah II., we see the human race mounting the steps of a lofty throne, on which is seated the Judge Osiris, with the great scales before him, and the soul of one unhappy man, who has been found guilty, has been lodged in the body of a pig, as the representative of impurity, and in that form is carried away in a boat by the god Anubis from the presence of the judge. On the other hand, on a papyrus in the British Museum we see a painting of the mummy of a good man placed inside the body of a ram, the animal sacred to the god Kneph, and thus the proper dwelling place for goodness.

The figures on the ornamental mummy cases abundantly prove to us that the reason for saving the body from decay, by embalming it as a mummy was, that it might be ready for the soul to re-enter when the years of wandering were at an end. The painting represents the mummy lying on its lion-shaped couch, with the soul returning to it, in the form a bird with human head, and putting back life and breath into its mouth, while the god Anubis is preparing to unwrap the bandages. The character for life is a key, in the form of a cross with a ring at the top; that for breath is the mast and sail of a ship, which naturally remind us of wind. It was only at a late time, perhaps not till after their intercourse with the Greeks, that some few of the Egyptians entertained the opinion of a spiritual resurrection, without the help of the dead body. They show this opinion in the painting by giving to a man at the moment of his death two bodies, the one earthly and mortal, and the other angelic and immortal. The vault of heaven is represented by the outstretched figure of the goddess Neith, painted blue. On each side sits a figure of the ram-headed Kneph, holding the feather, the character for Truth, to show that the dead man is righteous, or has been acquitted by the judge Osiris; In the middle is the earthly body, painted red, falling to the ground in death, while the heavenly body, painted blue, stands upright and holds up his hands in the attitude of prayer. This picture describes the opinion of the Apostle Paul, who says, in First Corinthians 15:44, "There is an animal body and there is a spiritual body." But this more spiritual view of the resurrection to a future life was never generally received by the Egyptians. They clung to the old opinion of the resurrection of the body, and continued to make it into a mummy to save it for the return of the soul. The two opinions are both spoken of in Acts 23:8, where we read that the Sadducees say there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit, but the Pharisees acknowledge both.

Many of these opinions about the resurrection and a future state of rewards and punishments were borrowed by the Greeks directly from Egypt, as we see by the Egyptian names which they took with the opinions. Thus Rrot-amenti, or King of Hell, the title of Osiris, gave a name to Rhadamanthus, the Greek judge of the dead. Menes, the fabulous founder of the Egyptian monarchy, became Minos, a second judge of the dead. From the word Charo, silent, the boatman of Greek mythology, who ferried the dead into the next world, was called Charon, and the river which he crossed was called Acheron. Hecate, the sorceress, one of the titles of Isis, was given by the Greeks and Romans as a name to their queen of Hell. The hippopotamus who stands before Osiris, when he is judging the dead, is one of the Cabeiri gods, and became among the Greeks, with but little change in figure and name, the dog Cerberus. The goddess Thmei, or truth, with the ostrich head in the same figure, became the Greek Themis, or goddess of justice. Herodotus tells us that though he did not believe much that was told him on these matters, yet that he thought them too serious to relate in his book. And thus the Greeks, as soon as Egypt was open to them by the rise of a race of kings at Sais, who favored Greek intercourse, readily copied the more solemn of the Egyptian superstitions.

Among the Jews, on the other hand, these views of a life after death were very little accepted; we find very few traces in the Hebrew writings of a belief in a future state as we have come to understand in Christianity. What is of interest for the Christian is that from Egypt on we find traces in almost all Gentile nations involved in sun worship where sun-gods or sun-godmen gave themselves for their followers as a "propitiation" for sin and redemption into the future life. Coupled with this fact, if you have been keeping up with the studies of Bet Emet Ministries, is the fact that when one comes to the understanding that the early Jerusalem church and even Paul continued to observe the sacrificial system which consisted of sin offerings and atonement offerings (see Nazarite vow in Acts 21 couples with Numbers 6) then one is faced with harsh reality that in the days following Jesus' death and even up to 70 C.E. no Jew, let alone the Jerusalem church, believed Jesus' death was a final sacrifice for anything. When one comes to the understanding that crucial chapters and passages in the New Testament were "added" well after 150 C.E. and later that taught the death of Jesus as an atonement (now recognized as a godman who died for others), and penned in the name of long dead disciples and apostles, little wonder where these Gentile redactors and editors got these notions. Nothing new under the sun; pardon my pun and these Gentile sunworshippers only applied to Jesus what they already had believed about their multitude of sun-godmen. The harsh facts of Acts 21 and Num. 6 reveal that "AT THAT TIME" none of the followers of Jesus following Pentecost believed in the final sacrifice or atonement connected in any way with Jesus' death. It would be much later at the hands of the non-Jews where their pagan concepts would be written into the traditions of Jesus and we have such an terrible state today where the only effective atonement that God gave mankind (repentance and obedience to the Torah and the Law of your specific covenant with God) have been replaced with a false atonement that finds it's origin in the sun worship of Egypt. It is time for serious study if you are a Christian.

ARE MAJOR TEACHINGS CONCERNING JESUS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT A COMPILATION OF PAGAN MYTHS HANDED DOWN BY ROME?

Simply said...I found it to be so. Let me see if I can prove it to you in seven pages. This explains why I have unwaveringly the last several years of my life been devoted to the Historical Yeshua/Jesus of Biblical Judaism and have turned away from the Christ of Faith given to me by the Gentile Anti-Semitic Christian Church.

After you read this article you will no longer wonder why our articles consistently warn of the errors and pit-falls in Christianity today which robs its people of a pure worship of God.

ASSIMILATION ABOUNDS AMONG THE PAGES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

It is evident that there was no single historical person upon whom the Christian religion was founded, and that the "Jesus Christ" as revealed in the Catholic Church altered New Testament is a compilation of legends, heroes, gods and godmen. There is not adequate room here to go into detail about each god or godman that contributed to the formation of the Jewish Jesus character; suffice it to say that there is plenty of FACTUAL documentation to show that this issue is not a question of "faith" or "belief." The truth is that during the era Yeshua lived there was an extensive library at Alexandria and an incredibly nimble brotherhood network that stretched from Europe to China, and this information network had access to numerous manuscripts that told the same narrative portrayed in the New Testament with different place names and ethnicity for the characters. In actuality, the legend of Jesus nearly identically parallels the story of Krishna, for example, even in detail, as was presented by noted mythologist and scholar Gerald Massey over years ago, as well as by Rev. Robert Taylor years ago, among others. The Krishna tale as told in the Hindu Vedas has been dated to at least as far back as 1000 B.C.E. The same can be said of the well-woven Horus mythos, which also is practically identical, in detail, to the Jesus story, but which predates the Christian version by thousands of years.

The Jesus story, as found in the New Testament, incorporated elements from the tales of other deities recorded in this widespread area, such as many of the following world saviors and "sons of God," most or all of whom predate the Christian myth, and a number of whom were crucified or executed.

- Adad of Assyria
- Adonis, Apollo, Heracles ("Hercules") and Zeus of Greece

- Alcides of Thebes
- Attis of Phrygia
- Baal of Phoenicia
- Bali of Afghanistan

- Indra of Tibet/India
- Jao of Nepal
- Krishna of India
- Mikado of the Sintoos
- Mithra of Persia
- Odin of the Scandinavians
- Prometheus of Caucasus/Greece
- Quetzalcoatl of Mexico
- Salivahana of Bermuda
- Tammuz of Syria (who was, in a typical mythmaking move, later turned into the disciple Thomas)

PATTERNS FOR THE CHRIST OF FAITH….AS SEEN IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.....

BUDDHA

Buddha…500 years before Yeshua/Jesus

Although most people think of Buddha as being one person who lived around 500 B.C.E., the character commonly portrayed as Buddha can also be demonstrated to be a compilation of godmen, legends and sayings of various holy men both preceding and succeeding the period attributed to the Buddha.

The Buddha character has the following in common with the Christ figure:

- Buddha was born of the virgin Maya, who was considered the "Queen of Heaven."
- He was of royal descent.
- He crushed a serpent's head.
- He performed miracles and wonders, healed the sick, fed men from a "small basket of cakes," and walked on water.
- He abolished idolatry, was a "sower of the word," and preached "the establishment of a kingdom of righteousness."

He taught chastity, temperance, tolerance, compassion, love, and the equality of all.
- He was transfigured on a mount.
- Sakya Buddha was crucified in a sin-atonement, suffered for three days in hell, and was resurrected.
- He ascended to Nirvana or "heaven."
- Buddha was considered the "Good Shepherd", the "Carpenter", the "Infinite and Everlasting."
- He was called the "Savior of the World" and the "Light of the World."

HORUS OF EGYPT

The stories of Jesus and Horus are very similar, with Horus even contributing the name of Jesus Christ. Horus and his once-and-future Father, Osiris, are frequently interchangeable in the mythos ("I and my Father are one"). The legends of Horus go back thousands of years, and he shares the following in common with Jesus:

- Horus was born of the virgin Isis-Meri on December 25th in a cave/manger, with his birth being announced by a star in the East and attended by three wise men.
- He was a child teacher in the Temple and was baptized when he was years old.
- He had disciples.
- He performed miracles and raised one man, El-Azar-us, from the dead.
- He walked on water.
- Horus was transfigured on the Mount.
- He was crucified, buried in a tomb and resurrected.
- He was also the "Way, the Truth, the Light, the Messiah, God's Anointed Son, the Son of Man, the Good Shepherd, the Lamb of God, the Word" etc.
- He was "the Fisher," and was associated with the Lamb, Lion and Fish ("Ichthys").
- Horus's personal epithet was "Iusa," the "ever-becoming son" of "Ptah," the "Father."
- Horus was called "the KRST," or "Anointed One," long before the Christians duplicated the story.

In fact, in the catacombs at Rome are pictures of the baby Horus being held by the virgin mother Isis - the original "Madonna and Child" - and the Vatican itself is built upon the papacy of Mithra, who shares many qualities with Jesus and who existed as a deity long before the Jesus character was formalized. The Christian hierarchy is nearly identical to the Mithraic version it replaced. Virtually all of the elements of the Catholic ritual, from miter to wafer to water to altar to doxology, are directly taken from earlier pagan mystery religions.

MITHRA, SUNGOD OF PERSIA

The story of Mithra precedes the Christian fable by at least 400 years. According to Wheless, the cult of Mithra was, shortly before the Christian era, "the most popular and widely spread 'Pagan' religion of the times." Mithra has the following in common with the Christ character:

- Mithra was born of a virgin on December 25th.
- He was considered a great traveling teacher and master.
- He had companions or disciples.
- He performed miracles.
- He was buried in a tomb.

- After three days he rose again.
- His resurrection was celebrated every year.
- Mithra was called "the Good Shepherd."
- He was considered "the Way, the Truth and the Light, the Redeemer, the Savior, the Messiah."
- He was identified with both the Lion and the Lamb.
- His sacred day was Sunday, "the Lord's Day," hundreds of years before the appearance of Christ.
- Mithra had his principal festival on what was later to become Easter, at which time he was resurrected.
- His religion had a Eucharist or "Lord's Supper."

KRISHNA OF INDIA

The similarities between the Christian character and the Indian messiah are many. Indeed, Massey finds over similarities between the Hindu and Christian saviors, and Graves, who includes the various noncanonical gospels in his analysis, lists over likenesses. It should be noted that a common earlier English spelling of Krishna was "Christna," which reveals its relation to '"Christ." It should also be noted that, like the Jewish godman, many people have believed in a historical, carnalized Krishna.

- Krishna was born of the Virgin Devaki ("Divine One").
- His father was a carpenter.
- His birth was attended by angels, wise men and shepherds, and he was presented with gold, frankincense and myrrh.
- He was persecuted by a tyrant who ordered the slaughter of thousands of infants.
- He was of royal descent.
- He was baptized in the River Ganges.
- He worked miracles and wonders.
- He raised the dead and healed lepers, the deaf and the blind.
- Krishna used parables to teach the people about charity and love.
- "He lived poor and he loved the poor."
- He was transfigured in front of his disciples.
- In some traditions he died on a tree or was crucified between two thieves.
- He rose from the dead and ascended to heaven.
- Krishna is called the "Shepherd God" and "Lord of lords," and was considered "the Redeemer, Firstborn, Sin Bearer, Liberator, Universal Word."
- He is the second person of the Trinity, and proclaimed himself the "Resurrection" and the "way to the Father."
- He was considered the "Beginning, the Middle and the End," ("Alpha and Omega"), as well as being omniscient, omnipresent and omnipotent.
- His disciples bestowed upon him the title "Jezeus," meaning "pure essence."
- Krishna is to return to do battle with the "Prince of Evil," who will desolate the earth.

PROMETHEUS OF GREECE

The Greek god Prometheus has been claimed to have come from Egypt, but his drama took place in the Caucasus mountains. Prometheus shares a number of striking similarities with the Christ character.

- Prometheus descended from heaven as God incarnate as man, to save mankind.
- He was crucified, suffered and rose from the dead.
- He was called the Logos or Word.

Five centuries before the Christian era, esteemed Greek poet Aeschylus wrote Prometheus Bound, which was presented in the theater in Athens and which included the following stanza:

- "Lo, streaming from the fatal tree,
- His all-atoning blood!
- Is this the Infinite? 'Tis he -
- Prometheus, and a God!
- Well might the sun in darkness hide,
- And veil his glories in,
- When God, the great Prometheus, died,
- For man, the creature's sin."

In the Prometheus story are clear and exact precedents for some of the most important elements of the Christian doctrine, e.g., being placed on a "fatal tree" in a blood-atonement for man's sins. Besides such obvious correlations, the sun hiding in darkness parallels the Christian fable of the darkness descending when Jesus was crucified. This remarkable occurrence is not recorded in history but is only explainable within the Mythos and as part of a recurring play.

THE CREATION OF THE "JESUS MYTH" BY THE GENTILE CHURCH

The Catholic Christians went on a censorship rampage that led to the virtual illiteracy of the ancient world and ensured that their secret would be hidden from the masses, but the scholars of other schools/sects never gave up their arguments against the historicizing of a very ancient mythological creature. They even went so far in the 4th century as to destroy the world renown library at Alexandria, Egypt, because within it was the evidence that the "Divine Roman faith called Christianity" was anything but that; it was the same Astral and Nature worship of primitive man only recently "personified" in the latest of the Roman gods...Jesus. We have lost the arguments of these learned dissenters because the Christians destroyed any traces of their works. Nonetheless, besides the gifts of archeology today which have recovered much information once thought lost to mankind forever, the Christians preserved the contentions of their detractors through the Christians' own refutations. It is amazing to read the early Church Fathers for often their "works" incriminate themselves and their honesty as to their untenable theological positions are recorded for the reader to examine for himself; but few do. I have.

TESTIMONY OF EARLY CHURCH FATHERS TO THE TRUTH OF THE "CHRISTIAN MYTH"

For example, early Church Father Tertullian (400 C.E.), an "ex-Pagan" and Bishop of Carthage, ironically admits the true origins of the Christ story and of all other such godmen by stating in refutation of his critics, "You say we worship the sun; so do you." Interestingly, a previously strident believer and defender of the faith, Tertullian later renounced Christianity.

This is but one testimony among hundreds as to the pagan origin for many of the beliefs the early Gentile church maintained and applied to Jesus.

Please understand that in my studies I never set out to find what I did. I never intended to learn that my faith was false in many areas, but the faithfulness of God is seen in all that I have done. Diligently seeking God I found Him as He revealed the hidden truths to me. These I share with you hoping and praying your worship of our loving Father be in Spirit and in Truth. It is time for the Church to meet the Historical Jesus, and this can only be done by exposing the Christ of Faith for what he really is; namely, a mixture of legends of the Gentile's godmen with a Jewish Zaddik named Yeshua…the real Historical Jesus. Shalom.

THE ROMAN PURGE OF TRUTH AND THE DESTRUCTION OF THE LIBRARY OF ALEXANDRIA, EGYPT

"One day in AD 391, the Roman-appointed Bishop Theophilus marched from his headquarters in the Brucheion Royal quarter of Alexandria, at the head of a large howling mob, heading west for the Serapeum in the heart of the Egyptian quarter of Rhakotis. The Serapeum, which had been the centre of Egyptian worship for seven centuries, was adorned with extensive columned halls, almost breathing statues, and a great number of other works of art, as well as being the house of the Great Alexandrian library. The frenzied people rushed through the streets along the Canopic way, turning into the short street that led to the temple-area of Serapis, meeting other crowds there, before climbing up the great flight of marble steps, led by Bishop Theophilus. They jumped across the stone platform and into the temple, where the events of the final tragedy took place."

"In their agitated mood, the angry mob took little heed of the gold and silver ornaments, the precious jewels, the priceless bronze and marble statues, the rare murals and tapestries, the carved and painted pillars of granite and many marbles, the ebony and scented woods, the ivory and exotic furniture - all were smashed to pieces with cries of pleasure. But that was not all. Those shouting men, full of demoniac delight, then turned to the library, where hundreds of thousands of papyrus rolls and parchments, inscribed with ancient wisdom and knowledge, were taken off their shelves, torn to pieces and thrown on to bonfires. A few years later the last of the Alexandrian scholars was torn to pieces by a gang of Christian monks. On a Lenten day in March of the year AD 415 they stopped the carriage of Hypatia, who had succeeded her father as Professor of Philosophy in Alexandria, stripped her naked, dragged her into a nearby church, killed her, cut most of her flesh from her body with sharp oyster shells, and burned what remained of her in the street. The charge against Hypatia, who had taught the philosophy of Plato, was heresy."

"As a result of this barbaric killing of Alexandrian scholars and destruction of its library, which contained texts in Greek of all aspects of ancient wisdom and knowledge, the true Egyptian roots of Christianity and of Western civilization have been obscured for nearly 16 centuries." (Ahmed Osman, Out of Egypt, The Roots Of Christianity Revealed, Aarow Books Limited, 1999, prologue).

The above description tells only part of the story; how antisemitic Gentile Christianity altered the earliest Divine Revelations of God on this planet and through "personification" and later "literalization of this Divine Revelation" constructed an entirely new religion that has obscured and altered what the ancients knew best about God and Creation. Simply said the end result is that 2.5 billion people today who are named by the name "Christian" live and worship in idolatry never knowing until they die the tragic consequences of the destruction of the Alexandrian Library by Rome which was undertaken to cover-up their plagiarism, alteration, mutation, and adulteration of the world's oldest Revelation of God given to mankind. The aim of Bet Emet Ministries is to rediscover these roots, with the help of new historical and archaeological evidence and we have done just that in the various websites provided by this ministry.

With the loss of this knowledge collected by the world since the earliest of time mankind was swept into the Dark Ages by the Roman Church.

- Lost is the understanding that Egyptian thought was presented in allegory and in term of mythology: myth was used to convey insights into the workings of the Divine and Nature and the ultimately indescribable realities of the soul
- Covered up for centuries is the fact that many of the stories of both the Old and the New Testaments are firmly established on models of Ancient Egyptian historical facts.
- Many essential religious doctrines that Judaism and Christianity are credited with, in fact came out of Egypt.
- Covered up throughout history was the fact that all the central characters of both the Old Testament and the New Testament were actually real historical Egyptian figures, who lived in a different period than we have believed up till now.

All of this knowledge was lost when the Alexandria library was razed to the ground by Rome.

Western scholars, whether Christian, Jewish or Atheist, tend to ignore Egyptian views when interpreting the accounts of ancient history. Even Manetho, the great Egyptian scholar responsible for the arrangement of the Alexandrian library, has been dismissed as unqualified to write about scientific matters to the Greeks. Commenting on an account that Manetho wrote in Epitome of Physical Doctrines, W. G. Waddell wrote:

That an Egyptian priest should seek to instruct the Greek-speaking world of his time in the history of Egypt and the religious beliefs of the Egyptians. . . is not at all surprising, hut it seems strange that Manetho should feel called upon, in the third century BC, to compose an Epitome of Physical Doctrines with the apparent object of familiarizing the Greeks with Egyptian science [Manetho,* London, 1940, p. xxvii]

In addition, Islamic documents are completely disregarded as a source of ancient tradition, when arguing the history of biblical stories. This cannot be justified, for the stories in the Koran come from the same source as the books of the Bible. Moreover, the Koran accounts agree with those of the Bible in the majority of cases, which makes it more important to examine the reason for various points, of divergence.

The time has come for Egypt's voice to be heard again. If Egypt's voice is heard then Christian theology will be shown to be a fraud and a terrible misrepresentation of the earliest Divine Revelation of God given to mankind which treasured.

Until the destruction of its library in AD 391, Alexandria had remained the most important cultural centre of the ancient world, and the focal point of the mutual influence exercised in the conjunction of Christianity and Hellenism, in spite of four centuries of Rome's political supremacy. Founded by Alexander the Great in 331 BC, it was the first real cosmopolitan city in history, where Macedomans and Greeks lived together with Egyptians and Jews, and scholars flocked from all over the world to do their research. The Essenes would be the dominant force behind this Library and had in this city their own theological university as well. Scholars came from Italy and Greece, from Anatolia and the Levant, from north Africa, Arabia, and even from Persia and India. Not only did they share a common habitation in Alexandria, they all had the same longing for knowledge and the same interest in philosophy and ancient wisdom, as represented in the teaching of Hermes Trismegistus and the worship of Serapis. Thoth, ancient Egyptian god of writing, became identified with the Greek god Hermes. Hermes Trismegistus means 'Hermes the Thrice-greatest'.

As stated before with my comment about the Essenes this city was also the center of Hellenistic Judaism. It was in Alexandria that Philo Judaeus, the first Jewish philosopher, wrote his 38 books in the 1st century AD. The city had, in addition, the only library containing almost all the books of ancient civilizations, including the Greek text of the Old Testament. Hence it is not astonishing that Alexandria rapidly became the main Christian intellectual centre.

The rich collection of ancient written knowledge in the Serapeum proved irresistible for Diodorus Siculus, a Sicilian scholar, when he set out in the first century BC, in the time of Julius Caesar, to research his ambitious Bibliotheca Historica - the "bookshelf of history". The historian Ammanius Marcellinus (c. AD 330-391), who himself visited Alexandria, wrote about this temple: ". . . the Serapeum, which, although no description can do it justice, yet is so adorned with extensive columned halls, with almost breathing statues, and a great number of other works of art, that next to the Capitolium, with which revered Rome elevates herself to eternity, the whole world beholds nothing more magnificent. In this were invaluable libraries . . ." (22: 16, 12-13). Diodorus, who was an enthusiast of the teachings of Hermes Trismegistus (which have survived until today in the teachings of Islamic Sufis, Jewish Qabbalah and Christian Rosicrucians and Freemasons), became convinced of Egypt's importance as a source of knowledge. The Greek and Roman gods, he believed, had been born there, life had originated there, and there the first observations of the stars had been made. Astro-theology was the earliest revelation of God that mankind received. This might sound wrong but not so when such observations of the Heavens and Nature spoke the clearest message about God and His message to mankind. Only later when these observations were personified and then later "literalized" does mankind lose Divine truth. This is explained in great detail on our Essene website and the Essenes are primarily responsible for the loss of such Divine Truth. The last famous scholar associated with the Serapeum before its destruction was Theon, a celebrated mathematician whose recension of Euclid's Element was the only text of this work until the last century, and whose daughter Hypatia was to meet a terrible death at the hands of Theophilus's nephew Bishop Cyril.

Up to the end of the fourth century AD, the time when the Alexandrian library was destroyed, Egypt was regarded as the holy land of the ancient world, the source of wisdom and knowledge where God became known for the first time. Pilgrims then, including Roman emperors, came from all over the world to worship in the temples of Isis and Serapis, as well as at the foot of Mount Sinai.

This situation came to an end, however, in the latter years of the reign of the emperor Theodosius I, who was zealous in his suppression of both paganism - the belief in the many gods of pre-Christianity - and heresy - any opinion contrary to orthodox Roman religious doctrine. Emperor of the East (AD 379-392), and then sole emperor of East and West (AD 392-395), he enforced the Creed of the Council of Nicaea (AD 325) as a universal norm for Christian orthodoxy and directed the convening of the second general council at Constantinople in AD 381 to clarify the formula.

"It is our wish and pleasure that none of our subjects, whether magistrates or private citizens, however exalted or however humble may be their rank or condition, shall presume in any city or in any place to worship an inanimate idol"* declared Theodosius in his last edict. Fanatical mobs of the Church then roamed the lands, razing old temples to the ground and plundering their wealth. Ancient tombs were desecrated, walls of monuments scraped clean of names and depictions of deities, statues toppled over and smashed. In Alexandria, Bishop Theophilus was as ambitious as the emperor, Theodosius I, who had appointed him. It was one of his zealous actions that led to the burning of an estimated half a million books stored in the Alexandrian library, described above.

Theophilus of Alexandria (AD 385-412) was one of the orthodox leaders who represented the imperial government dispatched from Rome to impose official orthodoxy on the Alexandrian Church. He led a campaign against paganism and heresy in Egypt that included destruction of the Serapeum (the temple of Serapis - originally an ancient Egyptian god of the underworld, subsequently reintroduced as the official deity for Alexandria and Egypt by Ptolemy I [305-284 BC]) where the Alexandrian library was placed. The Serapeum, at the same time as being the centre of worship for the ancient Egyptian trinity of Osiris, Isis and Horns, became a focal point for the emerging Christian Gnostic sects - those Christians who sought to gain spiritual knowledge through mysteries and the attempt to know oneself, interpreting the Scriptures allegorically.

The first Christian emperor, Constantine I (AD 324-337), had made Christianity the official religion of the Empire. He also granted political power to the Church. Bishops were not only recognized as councillors of state but obtained juridical rights: their solutions to civil suits were legally enforced. The bishops used their newly acquired power to spread the word of God and stamp out His enemies, who in this case were not only the pagans but the heretics - and Rome regarded Egyptian Christians as heretics. According to tradition, the Church of Alexandria was founded neither by St Peter nor by St Paul but by St Mark the Evangelist, even before what is said to have been the first Apostolic Council of Jerusalem in c. AD 50 (mentioned in the Book of Acts, 15:28). The first theological school to be established in the world also flourished in Alexandria before the end of the 2nd century AD, and became an influential centre of Christian scholarship. Among its directors were the famous Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Christian monasticism as an institution was initiated principally in Egypt by St Antony the Copt (c. AD 251-356), who fled to the solitude of the western desert from his native village of Coma, not far from Tell al-Amama, in Middle Egypt. Others followed his example and a monastic colony arose around his cave in the Red Sea mountains.

Although Alexandria made an important contribution in developing the first systematic Christian theology, the Alexandrian theologists were strongly influenced by the Neo-Platonists' philosophy. Neo-Platonists were Alexandrian philosophers who followed the same philosophy as the Athenian Plato; Plotinus of the 3rd century AD is the most celebrated. Biblical exegesis at Alexandria was allegorical and mystical, following the same method as Philo Judaeus, who tried to harmonize philosophy and the Bible. From the start, Alexandrian exegesis did not attach to the literal sense of the Bible. Their primary interest was concentrated on the mystery of divine revelation revealed in the historical and literary details of the Old Testament. It was therefore a question of discovering Christ in the older revelation.

The Alexandrian authors sought out in the Old Testament symbols of the New. For early Egyptian Christians, accepting one God was an evolutionary process in which the old system was assimilated into the new, and old deities became angelic beings and mediators between man and the unseen Lord. Idols, for them, did not represent the deities themselves, but were merely a physical form in which the spiritual beings could dwell during prayer. The Gnostic teachers found their followers at Alexandria, and much of the ecclesiastical history of this city was concerned with the heresies that appeared there.

The Serapeum, originally established by the Ptolemies (the Macedonian kings who ruled Egypt after the death of Alexander the Great), later became also a centre for Gnostic communities, both Hermetic (i.e. adhering to the teachings of Hermes Trismegistus) and Christian. Some Gnostic Christian sects grew from within the cult of Serapis, who made no distinction between Christ and Serapis - this, too, will be explained as this book unfolds. The general library at the Serapeum gradually became a focal point for scholars and intellectuals, from all over the Roman Empire, whose views contradicted the teachings of the Church. For this reason it became regarded as heretical and had to be destroyed.

With the destruction of the Serapeum, not only Egyptian knowledge was lost; Mesopotamian, Syrian, Phoenician, Jewish and Greek learning also vanished. The whole scientific achievement of the old civilizations, regarded as heresy by Bishop Theophilus, disappeared in a single day - books on astronomy, anatomy, medicine, geometry, geography, history, philosophy, theology and literature, as well as copies of the early Gnostic gospels of Christ. The result was the beginning of the dark ages, which lasted for more than ten centuries after that. All branches of science, as well as heretical writings which did not adhere to the teaching of the orthodox Church, were forbidden by the state. This left the canonic books of the Scripture as the main source of Western knowledge until the Renaissance in the 15th century.

While the discovery of some remaining copies of old forbidden manuscripts, especially the Hermetic and NeoPlatonic philosophies, produced the age of the Western renaissance from the 15th century in art, science and technology, history had to wait for modern archaeologists to dig out old remains and inscribed papyrus rolls before we could regain our memory. In his book Archives In The Ancient World, Ernst Posner, the American historian, has said of the achievements of archaeologists during this period that they are ?momentous - comparable in a way to the discovery of America. . . a new dimension of almost two millennia has been added to the history of mankind as it was known in 1850..."Now we can view with profound respect the cultural achievements of the countries surrounding the eastern Mediterranean, and we can begin to assess their interrelations with, and their possible influence on, the cultures of Greece and Rome."

Egypt was the birthplace of our spiritual teachers - from Imhotep, the first pyramid builder of the 27th century BC, to Moses and Akhenaten, who first recognized one God, to the followers of Osiris (Egyptian god of the underworld and judge of the dead), Hermes Trismegistus and of Jesus Christ who looked for spiritual salvation and eternal life. Thanks to modern archaeologists, a new age now appears on the horizon, with Egypt restored to its original place.

It looks like a fulfillment of an old prophecy which predicted that woes will come upon Egypt, but also promised that order would finally be restored again. This prophecy is found in the Hermetic text of Asclepius, discovered among the Nag Hammadi library. Asclepius is a dialogue between the mystagogue Hermes Trismegistus and an initiate, Asclepius. In an apocalyptic section with significant Egyptian and Israelite parallels, the speaker predicts the fall, then rise again, of Egypt:

are you ignorant, 0 Asclepius, that Egypt is (the) image of heaven? Moreover, it is the dwelling place of heaven and all the forces that are in heaven. If it is proper for us to speak the truth, our land is (the) temple of the world. And it is proper for you not to be ignorant that a time will come in it (our land) (when) Egyptians will seem to have served the divinity in vain, and all their activity in their religion will be despised. For all divinity will leave Egypt and will flee upward to heaven. And Egypt will be widowed; it will be abandoned by the gods. For foreigners will come into Egypt, and they will rule it. . . And in that day the country that was more pious than all countries will become impious. No longer will it be full of temples, but it will be full of tombs. .. Egypt, lover of God, and the dwelling place of the gods, school of religion, will become an example of impiousness . . . [Then Egypt will be restored again] And the lords of the earth... will establish themselves in a city that is in a corner of Egypt that will be built toward the setting of the sun.

Isaiah, the Old Testament prophet of the 6th century BC, confirms this prophecy and foretells the appearance of a saviour in Egypt:

The burden of Egypt. Behold, the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt: and the idols of Egypt shall he moved at his presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it. And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians: and they shall fight every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbour. . . And the spirit of Egypt shall fail in the midst thereof. . . In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt. . . and he shall send them a saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them.* [Isaiah 19:1-3; 19-20]

Helmut Koester, Professor of the History of Ancient Christianity at Harvard University, who was responsible for translating the Nag Hammadi Gospel of Thomas (which includes many previously unknown sayings of Christ) into English, spoke about the need for "a thorough and extensive revaluation of early Christian history". He went on to say: "The task is not limited to fresh reading of the known sources and a close scrutiny of the new texts in order to redefine their appropriate place within the conventional picture of the early Christian history. Rather it is the conventional picture itself that is called into question."

CONCLUSION

The Library of Alexandria, in reality two or more libraries in the ancient Egyptian capitol, has achieved an almost mythic stature in the study of classics from the time of the Renaissance. The apocryphal burning of the Library during Julius Caesar's occupation of the city has been described as the greatest calamity of the ancient world, wherein the most complete collection of all Greek and Near Eastern literature was lost in one great conflagration. In reality, the Library and its community of scholars not only flourished during the Hellenistic era of the Ptolemies, but continued to survive through the Roman Empire and the incessant turbulence of the Empire's most volatile and valuable city. For valuable indeed was the granary of the empire, which was also a prosperous trade center between east and west, linked to the Mediterranean and, not far to the east, to the Red Sea and Indian traderoutes via a canal. This cosmopolitan city drew Greeks, Egyptians, Romans, and Jews into a unique and not entirely harmonious coexistence. The Alexandrian Museum and Library, then, was an ideal place for scholars from these different cultures to meet and exchange learning, and was a repository for the literature and accounts of the Alexandrian intelligensia and the Roman Empire in general. However, while sources agree on the Museum's uniqueness and value, no surviving account of its activities actually exists, and modern scholarship has largely ignored this poorly-documented portion of history.

I need to say something about the religion of Serapis and Sophia. At this time the old gods of Egypt, meanwhile, had not died out, but merely been woven together with the pantheons of newcomers. Strabo's contemporary, Vitruvius, describes a festival of the Muses in Alexandria, almost certainly based at the Museum, so it seems that the religious aspect of the institution continued to play an important part in Imperial Alexandria. By Roman times, the worship of purely Olympian gods had altered as the population had become a Greek-Egyptian mix, and all the gods were now worshipped as their Egyptian counterparts with Greek attributes. Besides the Egyptian Greeks, the Jews accounted for a significant amount of the population, living in their own quarter, governed by an ethnarch, and originally exempted from many of the taxes; their ethnarch was replaced by a Council of Elders under Augustus. An intriguing dialogue between Pagan, Jewish, and, later, Christian thought developed among the scholars of Alexandria, as religious thought was refined and ideas adapted not only from the other theologies common in Alexandria, but from the Zoroasterism of Iran, and even, through the founder of Neoplatonism, Ammonius Buddhism and Hinduism from India. Thus, Jewish theologian Philo could discuss a mother goddess figure, Sophia, spirit of wisdom, the messenger from Jehovah, whose logos or existence would otherwise be incomprehensible to humanity. We see the same religious concept written in the Book of Proverbs:

Prov 1:20-21 20 Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets: 21 She crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates: in the city she uttereth her words, saying, (KJV)

Understand that this is nothing more than the personification of the wisdom of God expressed in allegory. This is not meant to be LITERAL.

Christian thought was both refined and bizarrely altered during this turbulent era in Alexandria. Introduced by the Alexandrian St. Mark according to tradition, it was initially mistaken by the Emperor Hadrian as a troublesome offshoot of the cult of Serapis. Indeed, the Eucharist, resurrection, and reverence to the Mother were developed in Alexandria during this period, and seem to have echoes in the cult of Serapis, with its Dionsian-style feasting and resurrection, and his consort Isis/Cybele/Demeter. And while the religion had previously been a popular movement of the masses, it was at Alexandria that learned intellectual debate discussed the more philosophical parts of the religion and paved the way for Medieval theological debates. Branches of thought such as Arianism and Gnosticism were to be developed here, and, although later declared heretical, grew side by side with what later became Christian orthodoxy. Gnosticism continues to this day in Egypt; it held that the world was actually a mistake created by the Demiurge, son of the true God and Sophia, who was the Jehovah of the old Testament; God pitied humanity and sent Christ to help humanity reunite with Himself. Some held that Jesus had been a man, and the Christ His spirit after death. The Ophites, an offshoot of the Gnostics with Cretan influences, carried the religion a step further, worshipping snakes and the divine mother Sophia, who had actually sent the serpent of Eden to warn Eve and Adam that Jehovah was the Demiurge and that they should seek wisdom or knowledge to link with the true God. And, lest these heresies seem too wild, it should be remembered that the first patron saint of Alexandria for the orthodox Christians of the 4th century was St. Anthony, "who thought bathing was sinful and was consequently carried across the canals of the delta by an angel".

After a mere twenty years since the abdication of Diocletian, Constantine became Emperor and declared Christianity Rome's official religion. Diocletian's First Edict, as described by Lactantius in his How the Persecutors Died, Chap. 13 Date: February 23/24, 303 A.D., teaches us about the beginning of the "Great Persecution" against Christians which directed that the churches to be leveled, the Scriptures burned, Christians in places of honor to be degraded, and provided the loss of freedom to Christian household servants. It deprived the Christians of all honours and dignities; ordaining also that, without any distinction of rank or degree, they should be subjected to tortures, and that every suit at law should be received against them; while, on the other hand, they were debarred from being plaintiffs in questions of wrong, adultery, or theft; and, finally, that they should neither be capable of freedom, nor have right of suffrage. By 391, the Emperor Theodosius had reversed Diocletian's edict and commanded all paganism to be stamped out, signalling the end of the Museum and ultimately the Library as well.

In 412 Theophilus' nephew Cyril succeeded him as Patriarch of Christianity. The Patriarch exercised control of Alexandria, and the conflict between secular and religious authority was decided in 415, when the Roman prefect Orestes, officially still in charge of the province, objected to Cyril's order that all Jews be expelled from Alexandria. Cyril's army of monks murdered the prefect and were canonized by him for this deed. For, throughout the fourth century the power of the church grew and it was this army of Gnostic monks that became the main tool of the Patriarch of Alexandria and enforced his will. After the edict of Theodosius, the mob was led by the Patriarch Theophilus to demolish the Serapeum. Cyril, the Archbishop of Alexandria, persuaded himself that Hypatia's good name and talents were giving the cause of Paganism a dangerous prestige, and thereby preventing the progress of the new faith. Upon his orders these same monks, while marauding through the city came across Hypatia, daughter of the Museum's last great mathematician Theon. She was a Neoplatonist philosopher and astronomer whose teachings are partially recorded by one of her admirers and pupils, the Christian Synesius, and she was also one of the last members of the Museum.

It is said of her: "Her beauty did astonish the survey of eyes, Her words all ears took captive" (From: "The martyrdom of Hypatia, or, The death of the classical world." A speech given before the Independent Religious Society at the Majestic Theater in Chicago By Mangasar Magurditch Mangasarian). Her renown as a lecturer on philosophy brought students from Rome and Athens, and all the great cities of the empire, to Alexandria. It was one of the great events of each day to flock to the hall in the academy where Hypatia explained Plato and Aristotle."

Driving home from her own lectures without attendant, this independent woman and scholar who epitomized the glory of the knowledge bestowed upon mankind by God was dragged from her chariot by the mob, stripped, flayed, and finally burned alive in the library of the Caesareum as a witch (as denoted above). Cyril, who was behind this terrible deed, was made a saint. After Hypatia's death Alexandria became steadily less stable and was soon overrun by the monks who evolved into the Copts who incorporated the old Alexandrian prejudices towards foreigners (already expelled the Jews) with the new prejudice towards any scientific or classical knowledge. The Patriarch Cyril was made a saint for his action behind the destruction of the Library. The library itself was ransacked of any gold or silver and then put to the torch by these monks. Too turbulent even to bow to the Emperor, Alexandria eventually revolted against Constantinople, wound up with two factions contending between two Patriarchs, and eventually fell to Arab conquerors, who had the last of the Library burned as fuel in the bath-houses of the city in 686.

The following is an account of the actual destruction of the Alexandrian Library:

Theodosius was at the time, of which we will now speak, the Christian ruler of the Empire. In reply to a request by the Archbishop of Alexandria, he sent a sentence of destruction against the ancient religion of Egypt. Both the Pagans and the Christians had assembled in the public square to hear the reading of the Emperor's letter, and when the Christians learned that they may destroy the gods of the Pagans, a wild shout of joy rent the air. The disappointed Pagans, on the other hand, realizing the danger of their position, silently slipped into their homes through dark alleys and hidden passage-ways. Yet they did not stand aside and see the temples of their gods razed to the ground without first offering a desperate resistance. Under the leadership of a zealot, Olympus, the Pagans fell upon the Christians, maddened with the cry in their ears of their leader, "Let us die with our gods!" Then came the turn of the Christians. Theophilius, the Archbishop of Alexandria, with a cross in his hand, and followed by his monks, marched upon the temple of Serapis, and proceeded to pull its pillars down. When they came to strike at the colossal statue of the god, for centuries worshiped as a deity, even the Christians turned pale with superstitious awe, and held their breath. A soldier armed with a heavy axe, was hesitating to strike the first blow. Will the god tolerate the insult? Will he not crash the roof upon the heads of the sacrilegious vandals? But the soldier struck the thundering blow right in the cheeks of Serapis, who offered no remonstrance whatever. The sun shone as usual, and the laws of nature maintained their even pace. Encouraged by this indifference of the god to defend himself, the Christian rabble rushed upon the statue, and pulling Serapis off his seat, dragged him in pieces through the streets of Alexandria that the Pagans might behold the disgrace into which their great god had fallen. Thousands of Pagans, seeing how helpless their gods were to avenge this insult, deserted Paganism and joined the Christians.As soon as the ground of the temple was sufficiently cleared, a church was erected on the ancient site. The Alexandrian library was the next point of attack. Its shelves were soon cleared, and you and I, and twenty centuries, were most lamentably deprived of the intellectual treasures which our Greek and Roman forefathers had bequeathed unto us.

Thus the Library of Alexandria and the Museum wended its way through the turbulent history of the Empire and outlived it by a short space of time, although paucity of sources makes it difficult to reconstruct an exact chronology of events. Its research probably reflected the foment of the times, and, while Neoplatonist in the main, also attracted other religious scholars, especially Jews, from Hellenistic times onward. Repeatedly rebuilt, modified, and burned, the few facts that can be determined about its long history justify its semi-legendary status. Haven for scholars of all kinds, its purpose as a center for learning was its eventual downfall. Enduring through Hellenistic civil strife, Dynastic war, the transition from kingdom to Roman province, and the abuses and good fortune it received through the sometimes capricious actions of successive emperors, it could not withstand the violent beginnings of Christianity which the city of Alexandria itself largely shaped.

Now, in closing, if you have been a reader of Bet Emet Ministries for any length of time by now you have seen the corruption of the Hebrew Scriptures when translated into Greek by the Hellenized Essenes of Alexandria, Egypt. Whereas the Ancient Egyptians understood the God of the Cosmos and related Eternal concepts and His message to mankind in allegory, symbolism, and myth many who would come later would take these simple truths of Egyptian Religion and "LITERALIZE" them into religious dogmas at Alexandria that blind us to the simple truths that God originally gave mankind. Later Rome will emerge upon the screen of world history with its desire to mix politics and religion and in so doing make sure that all mankind, to the best of their ability, will fall prey to their "brand" of religious thought where these "literalized" religious tenants were to be accepted by all; either through proselytizing or sword. But the task was not easy as first thought knowing as they did that they had to destroy and bury for all time all remnants of the knowledge that existed that betrayed their plagiarism and literalization of these prior allegories and myths. There was no bigger threat to Roman domination of the world than the Library of Alexandria which housed these precious volumes of collected world knowledge (science and religious works) which betrayed not only the Roman theology of the day as false but exposed them for what they truly were: apostates themselves from the original Divine Revelation first given mankind in this world. This Library and storehouse of world knowledge was the greatest threat to the Roman civil-religious agenda and it had to be destroyed and this knowledge kept from the common man. It was been estimated that the library contained more than a half a million volumes before its destruction. This kind of information had to be destroyed and Rome would make sure that it was, and with the later battle for supremacy between Eastern and Western Christianity in which Western Christianity and Constantine would win then the world is plunged into the Dark Ages to which mankind lived blind to these Divine Truths once cherished by the sages of the past who first gave us the revelation of God in the first place.

The Museum of Alexandria was founded at a unique place and time which allowed its scholars to draw on the deductive techniques of Aristotle and Greek thought, in order to apply these methods to the knowledges of Greece, Egypt, Macedonia, Babylonia, and beyond. The location of Alexandria as a center of trade, and in particular as the major exporter of writing material, offered vast opportunities for the amassing of information from different cultures and schools of thought. Its scholars' deliberate efforts to compile and critically analyze the knowledge of their day allowed for the first systematic, long-term research by dedicated specialists in the new fields of science suggested by Aristotle and Callimachus. Whole new disciplines, such as grammar, manuscript preservation, and trigonometry were established. Moreover, the fortuitous collection of documents in an Egyptian city allowed the transmission and translation of vital classical texts into Arabic and Hebrew, where they might be preserved long after copies were lost during the Middle Ages in Europe. Alexandria and its cousins, the Lyceum, Academy, and the younger Pergamon library, were probably the prototypes both for the medieval monastery and universities. While modern scholars often lament the amount of information lost through the centuries since the Museum's fall, an amazing number of Alexandrian discoveries and theories, especially in mathematics and geometry, still provide the groundwork for modern research in these fields. Finally, the methods of research, study, and information storage and organization developed in the Library are much the same as those used today.

Today, several diggings where the library stood, have revealed scientific and historical documents that would have resulted in the industrial revolution having occurred 1500 years earlier. Among the lost documents included the methods used to build the pyramids and the parthenon, alchemy, natural plant medicine and utopian philosophy.

Mankind is yet today struggling to regain the knowledge and ground that Roman Christianity took from mankind. They don't call it the Dark Ages for nothing and there is nothing any more dark than the truth concerning the origins of Christian Dogma!

THE SUPPRESSION OF THE FACTS CONCERNING THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN FAITH & THE DEAD SEA SCROLLS

The first officially authentic Essene scriptures were published shortly after an Arab goatherd, following one of his animals, stumbled into a cave near the Dead Sea, where a treasure-trove of ancient documents was found, several of which were virtually intact. By a strange succession of fortunate incidents, these were quickly published, and thus made available to the world.

This set off one of the most intensive archeological hunts in history; scholars and scientists hastened to the Judaean desert in search of additional Scrolls. In this, they were signally successful: remnants, large and small, of hundreds of Essene scriptures were recovered, all of which had been secreted in sealed jars about 69 A.D. Material was found in at least five caves, of which that in Cave 4 alone constituted a corpus of original Essene scripture sufficient, should it be translated and published, to fill two volumes the size of the King James version of the Bible.

Then, however, strange things began to occur. Up until just a few years ago, no portion of this treasure, deposited in the Jordanian Museum in Jerusalem, has been published, or even made available to scholars. Of the 8 men, appointed to collate, arrange, publish, and translate these documents, 4 were Roman Catholics; and only John Marco Allegro, the English researcher, was without denominational affiliation. When he quickly translated and published the Copper Scroll and the few fragments entrusted to him; and then when he declared that the Essene Teacher of Righteousness, executed by the Jewish priests about 70-68 B.C., may have been crucified, he was denied all further access to the Scroll material.

As year after year passed away without the appearance of any more Essene scripture, although from time to time elaborate promises were made that they would soon be available, many began to question the reasons for the delay and the concealment. Since then, ample time has elapsed for the preparation and publication of all Essene material. But not one line of the hundreds of pages found in the caves has been released until stolen and made public just a couple of years ago.

Although additional Essene scriptures failed to appear, there was a plethora of books and articles dealing with the cult and its Scrolls during the years following 1950. Dozens of books and hundreds of articles, expressing every conceivable point of view, have appeared. It is probable that a complete bibliography of all material printed in this field might comprise somewhere between 1,500 and 2,000 titles.

During the Six-Day War of 1967, the Jewish forces overran Jerusalem and captured the Jordanian Museum. To the best of our knowledge, nothing has been published concerning the fate or the whereabouts of the Essene Scrolls up until just a couple of years ago.

Answer for yourself: Why not?

These scrolls are the most precious concentration of ancient literature ever discovered in modern times. No outsider, of course, knew the contents of these documents; but it seems difficult to doubt that there was a constructive conspiracy to conceal them and to prevent their publication forever. All discussion concerning the Scrolls seems to have been silenced up until just a couple of years ago.

The motive for this concealment, we believe, is not far to seek. Although the evidence linking pristine Christianity to the Dead Sea Covenanters is already very substantial, there are still men of stature who deny the existence of such a relationship. However, since these scrolls are available today, the remaining Essene documents establish beyond all doubt that Christianity grew out of Essenism/Qumran cult and their adaptations of Sun-worship and was not a unique expression or revelation from God.

Answer for yourself: Who, then, was so desperately bent on concealing the Essene scriptures?

- First, the Jewish religious community wished to suppress them because these scrolls are filled with condemnation of the Jewish rulers and nation; and because it would prove that pristine Christianity developed from an esoteric Jewish cult.
- Secondly the whole orthodox or so-called Christian world, with its material assets worth hundreds of billions of dollars, wishes to preserve the myth of its unique origin, founded on the inspired message of a god-man whose only source of doctrine or inspiration was the creator of the universe.

The vested interests of those religious communities are therefore at stake; they did not for the longest time, allow the publication of authentic materials which reduce their influence and credibility and, more importantly, cause a decline in their wealth and income.

But the day has come when the Essene Scrolls have come to light.

Since most people read only what reinforces the persuasions they have already accepted, we realize that few indeed among those already committed to some creed will be motivated to read about these documents. Edwin Franden Dakin once remarked that the greatest miracle in the world is the capacity of humanity to believe without evidence. Most people are nurtured by their delusions. However, true education or enlightenment cannot exist except among those who follow St. Paul's dictum to try all things and in the end retain the good.

In this study and forthcoming articles, therefore, we seek the truth of Christianity and its composite religious parts by examining each religions assimilated into Christianity and their own sacred scriptures.

Answer for yourself: How can divine infallibility be claimed in Christianity for "revelations" which bear every earmark of forgery or folk-myth which has been handed down from paganism for thousands of years?

That is a tough question, but the answers forthcoming are even harder. It is to these answers we now turn.

DISTURBING QUOTES ABOUT THE CHRISTIAN FAITH....COULD THIS BE POSSIBLY TRUE AND WE NOT KNOW IT?

Let us begin this serious study with a series of very disturbing quotes. The information presented in these Web Pages is not provided as a form of entertainment. I strongly suggest that you do not continue your study and search for truth in these pages unless you are willing to take responsibility for what you learn.

2 Peter 2:21..."For it had been better for them not to have know the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandments delivered unto them. (KJV)

THE TESTIMONY OF THE APOSTLE PAUL INCRIMINATES THE FAITH THAT HE IS TEACHING THE GENTILES

We find Saint Paul, the first Apostle of the Gentiles, avowing that he was made a minister of the Gospel which had already been preached to every creature under heaven...

Col 1:23 23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; (KJV)

Answer for yourself: Did you catch that?

Paul is stating that he, the Apostle to the Gentiles, is preaching a message that HAS ALREADY BEEN PREACHED TO EVERY CREATURE UNDER HEAVEN! This bears some deep thought. I did just that. This opened my heart and mind to considerable in-depth study to fathom out the depths of what this one verse alluded.

Simply said, Saint Paul was preaching a God manifest in the flesh, who had been believed on in the world before the commencement of his ministry. Dear one, this could not have been Jesus of Nazareth, who had certainly not been preached at that time, nor generally believed on in the world till ages after. Saint Paul owns himself a deacon, which is the lowest ecclesiastical grade of the Therapeutan church. Many wonderful books yet exist which explains this verse. Unfortunately it is not comforting to a Christian to learn the truth about "the Gospel" which Paul taught. I will now quote from a rather old book by Bunsen called The Angel-Messiah published in London in 1867. The following quote is taken from page 240:

"The Gospel of which Paul's Epistles speak had been extensively preached and fully established before the time of Jesus by the Terapeutae or Essenes, who believed in the doctrine of the Angel-Messiah, the Aeon from heaven; the doctrine of the "Anointed Angel," the doctrine of the atoning sacrificial death of Jesus by the blood of his cross; the doctrine of the Messianic ante-type of the Paschal lamb and of the Paschal omer, and thus the resurrection of Jesus Christ the third day according to the Scriptures-these doctrines of Paul can with more or less certainty be connected with the Essenes...It becomes almost a certainty that Eusebius was right in surmising that Essenic writing have been used by Paul and the evangelists. Not Jesus, but Paul, is the cause of the separation of the Jews from the Christians."

What Bunsen fails to tell us here explicitly, and which is alluded to only implicitly, is that the origin of this crucified "Angel-Anointed, Angel-Messiah" had its roots in the paganized worship of the Sun by the Gentile nations.

What one fails to understand when he hears the word "Essene" is that in the time of Yeshua these "Essenes" were no longer a holy lineage from Zadok, but were rather Pythagorean in their beliefs. Such a religious synthesis explains on the part of the Essenes of the first century how they came to believe in the crucified Sun god-men of which I will explain later. Let us resume for now.

The very ancient and Eastern doctrine of an Angel-Messiah had been applied to Gautama-Buddha, who predicted that another Avatar (an incarnated deity in some shape in the earth; usually of Hindu origin) would come upon the earth in six hundred years after his death. This time had nearly expired; so Jesus of Nazareth was proclaimed as the expected Messiah by these Buddhist Jews, and the Sun-Myths were interwoven with his real history. Jesus unquestionably possessed a nature as divine as it is possible for a human being to possess, or he would not otherwise have been received as the Angel-Messiah by a sect so pure and holy as were the Essenes.

But let us not stop short of the other disturbing quotes.

THE EARLY CHURCH FATHERS INCRIMINATE THEMSELVES AND THE GENTILE CHRISTIAN FAITH...AND I BET YOU NEVER KNEW THIS...DID YOU?

In Seminary I remember looking at the Library shelves that supported the multiple volumes of the Ante-Nicean Fathers. I beheld thousand and thousands of pages of their writings. I even amused myself that to read and understand such a large volume of literature would take years. It did!

What I came to admire about such writings is when you read enough of them you find that these "pro-Christian" writers often incriminated themselves with what they wrote. The following examples are for your benefit.

JUSTIN MARTYR

Eusebius, in his Church History, tells us that Justin, in his Dialogue with Trypho, says "there exists not a people, civilized or semi-civilized, who have not offered up prayers in the name of a crucified Savior to the Father and Creator of all things" (Hist. Eccl. lib i. ch. iv).

The honesty of Justin Martyr as portrayed here is the heart of the subject matter of these web pages. I intend to show you that from the beginning of time the pagan nations had their "crucified Sun-gods" and much recorded about Jesus of Nazareth in the New Testament is nothing more than the "re-telling" of the same Sun-Myths; the only difference is that now they are applied to the life of Jesus the Jew. Do you want the truth before you die? Then keep reading.

EUSEBIUS

Eusebius says that "the names of Jesus and Christ were both known and honored by the ancients" (Hist. Eccl. lib. i. ch. iv). How could this be?

Eusebius, the great champion of Christianity, admits in his book: "that which is called the Christian religion is neither new nor strange, but-if it be lawful to testify the truth-was known to the ancients"

(Hist. Eccl. lib. 2, ch. v.). How could this be?

Eusebius, who is our chief guide for the early history of the Church, confesses that he was by no means scrupulous to record the whole truth concerning the early Christians in the various works which he has left behind him (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., ch. viii. p. 21).

Edward Gibbon, speaking of Eusebius says: "The gravest of the ecclesiastical historians, Eusebius himself, indirectly confesses that he has related what might rebound to the glory, and that he has suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace, of religion. Such an acknowledgment will naturally excite a suspicion that a writer who has so openly violated one of the fundamental laws of history has not paid a very strict regard to the observance of the other; and the suspicion will derive additional credit from the character of Eusebius, which was less tinctured with credulity, and more practiced in the arts of courts, than that of almost any of his contemporaries" (Gibbon, Rome, vol. ii., Philadelphia, 1876).

SAINT AUGUSTINE

Augustine is quoted as saying: "That in our time is the Christian Religion, which to know and follow is the most sure and certain health, called according to that name, but not according to the thing itself, of which is the name; for the thing itself which is now called the Christian Religion really was known to the ancients, nor was wanting at any time from the beginning of the human race until the time when Christ came in the flesh, from whence the true religion, which had previously existed, began to be called "Christian;" and this in our days is the Christian religion, not as having been wanting in former times, but as having in later times received this name" (Opera Augustini, vol. i. p. 12; quoted in Taylor's Diegesis, p. 42).

Now if you read these quotes you have to admit that they are very troubling to the contemporary Christian. I always heard: "Where there is smoke there is fire" [pardon the pun please]. If you find the courage to look beyond these quotes then you will find the kindling used for the paganization of Christianity by the Gentile Church whereby it become little more than another manifestation of Sun Worship. Jesus know the difference and you should as well.

TERTULLIAN

Tertullian, one of the Christian Fathers (A.D. 200), originally a Pagan, and at one time Presbyter of the Christian Church in Africa, reasons in the following manner on the evidences of Christianity: "I find no other means to prove myself to be impudent with success, and happily a fool, than by my contempt of shame, - as, for instance, I maintain that the Son of God was born. Why am I not ashamed of maintaining such a thing? Why, but because it is itself a shameful thing. I maintain that the Son of God died. Well, that is wholly credible, because it is monstrously absurd. I maintain that after having been buried he rose again; and that I take to be mainly true, because it was manifestly impossible" (Taylor, Diegesis, p. 326).

For example, early Church Father Tertullian (@ 160-220 C.E.), an "ex-Pagan" and Bishop of Carthage, ironically admits the true origins of the Christ story and of all other such god-men by stating in refutation of his critics, "You say we worship the sun; so do you" (Wheless, Forgery in Christianity, p. 147).

Interestingly, a previously strident believer and defender of the faith, Tertullian later renounced Christianity. (Wheless, Forgery in Christianity, p. 147).

OTHER INCRIMINATING QUOTES CHALLENGING THE TRUTHFULNESS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH

THOMAS PAINE

“The Christian religion is a parody on the worship of the Sun, in which they put a man whom they call Christ, in the place of the Sun, and pay him the same adoration which was originally paid to the Sun.”

AMMONIUS SACCUS

Ammonius Saccus, a Greek philosopher, founder of the Neoplatonic school, taught that Christianity and Paganism when rightly understood, differ in no essential points, but had a common origin, and are really one and the same religion" (Taylor, Diegesis, p. 329).

GODFREY HIGGINS

Godfrey Higgins, in Anacalypsis, states: "that every part of the vulgar Christian religion is the same as that of the vulgar religion of the Gentiles; that there is nothing new in the Roman Catholic religion; that, in short it is Reformed or Protestant Gentilism." He goes on to say: "several of the most important doctrinal parts of corrupt modern Christianity are nothing more than scraps of the Heathen mythologies of various kinds taught by different nations, long previous to the Christian era...the immaculate conception, the incarnation, the trinity, with its various hypostases, and the crucifixion and resurrection..." He further states: "It is more than probable that every part has been copied from some former religion; that no part of what has been really the system of the Christian priests was invented originally for their use. To tradition it is indebted for every doctrine and rite which it possesses; to fraudulent and dishonest practices it is chiefly indebted for their establishment."

CELSUS

Celsus, the Epicurean philosopher, wrote that "the Christian religion contains nothing but what Christians hold in common with heathen; nothing new" (Justin, Apol 2.).

Celsus, in the Octavius of Minucius Felix, says: "All these fragments of crack-brained opiniary and silly solaces played off in the sweetness of song by deceitful [Pagan] poets, by you too credulous creatures [that is, the Christians] have been shamefully reformed and made over to your own god]."

ISAAC DE CASAUBON

Issac de Casaubon, one of the greatest ecclesiastical scholars, says: "It mightily affects me to see how many there were in the earliest times of the Church, who considered it as a capital exploit to lend to heavenly truth the help of their own inventions, in order that the new doctrine might be more readily received by the wise among the Gentiles. These officious lies, they were wont to say, were devised for a good end" (Taylor, Diegesis, p. 44).

FAUSTUS

Faustus, writing to St. Augustine, says: "You have substituted your agape for the sacrifices of the Pagans; for their idols you martyrs, whom you serve with the very same honors. You appease the shades of the dead with wine and feasts; you celebrate the solemn festivals of the Gentiles, their calendars, and their solstices; and as to their manners, those you have retained without any alteration. Nothing distinguishes you from the Pagans, except that you hold your assemblies apart from them" (Draper, Science and Religion, p. 48. New York: 1876).

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS

Gregory, writing to St. Jerome, says: "A little jargon is all that is necessary to impose on the people. The less they comprehend the more they admire. Our forefathers and doctors have often said, not what they though, but what circumstances and necessity dictated" (Hieron ad. Nep.,quoted in Volney's Ruins, p. 177, Boston, 1872).

ALBERT CHURCHWARD

Mythicist Albert Churchward stated a century ago: "The canonical gospels can be shown to be a collection of sayings from the Egyptian Mythos and Eschatology"(The Origin and Evolution of Religion).

JOSEPH WHELESS

"The reason why all these narratives are so similar, with a god-man who is crucified and resurrected, who does miracles and has 12 disciples, is that these stories were based on the movements of the sun through the heavens, an astro-theological development that can be found throughout the planet because the sun and the 12 zodiac signs can be observed around the globe. In other words, Jesus Christ and all the others upon whom this character is predicated are personifications of the sun, and the Gospel fable is merely a rehash of a mythological formula (the "Mythos," as mentioned above) revolving around the movements of the sun through the heavens." The logical question arises: Why, if Jesus is a historical character, are there are presently two dates for both Christmas and Easter? This purportedly well-known character, who set the world on fire, has no birthdate whatsoever, and the "historical" references and genealogies found in the gospel accounts differ from each other. The gospels are not history at all but a retelling of the Mythos. The historical Jesus is a phantom. "These, which cannot both be historical, are based on the two birthdays of the double Horus in Egypt." In addition, early Christian "doctors" were constantly contradicting themselves as to when exactly "the Lord" died or "ascended to heaven" after "he" was resurrected. Two of the most powerful early bishops, Irenaeus and Papias recorded that Christ lived to be very old, "flatly denying as 'heresy' the Gospel stories as to his crucifixion at about thirty years of age."

Joseph Wheless states, "The gospels are all priestly forgeries over a century after their pretended dates." "As said by the great critic, Salomon Reinach, 'With the exception of Papias, who speaks of a narrative by Mark, and a collection of sayings of Jesus, no Christian writer of the first half of the second century (i.e., up to 150 A.D.) quotes the Gospels or their reputed authors.'"In The Book Your Church Doesn't Want You to Read, John Remsburg states: "The Four Gospels were unknown to the early Christian Fathers. Justin Martyr, the most eminent of the early Fathers, wrote about the middle of the second century. His writings in proof of the divinity of Christ demanded the use of these Gospels had they existed in his time. He makes more than 300 quotations from the books of the Old Testament, and nearly one hundred from the Apocryphal books of the New Testament; but none from the four Gospels. Rev. Giles says: 'The very names of the Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, are never mentioned by him (Justin) - do not occur once in all his writings.'" In A Short History of the Bible, Keeler says, "The books [canonical gospels] are not heard of till 150 A.D., that is, till Jesus had been dead nearly a hundred and twenty years. No writer before 150 A.D. makes the slightest mention of them." (J. Wheless, Forgery in Christianity).

"Those who concocted some of the hundreds of "alternative" gospels and epistles that were being kicked about during the first several centuries C.E. have even admitted that they had forged the documents." Wheless quotes the Catholic Encyclopedia: "Enterprising spirits responded to this natural craving by pretended gospels full of romantic fables, and fantastic and striking details; their fabrications were eagerly read and accepted as true by common folk who were devoid of any critical faculty and who were predisposed to believe what so luxuriously fed their pious curiosity. Both Catholics and Gnostics were concerned in writing these fictions. The former had no motive other than that of a PIOUS FRAUD."

Forgery during the first centuries of the Church's existence was admittedly rampant, so common in fact that a new phrase was coined to describe it: "pious fraud." Wheless, op cit. Mangasarian states: "The church historian, Mosheim, writes that, 'The Christian Fathers deemed it a pious act to employ deception and fraud.' [Ecclesiastical Hist., Vol. I, p. 347.] Again, he says: 'The greatest and most pious teachers were nearly all of them infected with this leprosy.' Will not some believer tell us why forgery and fraud were necessary to prove the historicity of Jesus. . . . Another historian, Milman, writes that, 'Pious fraud was admitted and avowed by the early missionaries of Jesus.' 'It was an age of literary frauds,' writes Bishop Ellicott, speaking of the times immediately following the alleged crucifixion of Jesus. Dr. Giles declares that, 'There can be no doubt that great numbers of books were written with no other purpose than to deceive.' And it is the opinion of Dr. Robertson Smith that, 'There was an enormous floating mass of spurious literature created to suit party views.'"

Such prevarication is confessed to repeatedly in the Catholic Encyclopedia. Wheless: "The clerical confessions of lies and frauds in the ponderous volumes of the Catholic Encyclopedia alone suffice . . . to wreck the Church and to destroy utterly the Christian religion. . . . The Church exists mostly for wealth and self-aggrandizement; to quit paying money to the priests would kill the whole scheme in a couple of years. This is the sovereign remedy" (J. Wheless, Forgery in Christianity). As Wheless says, "The proofs of my indictment are marvelously easy."

BARBARA WALKER

The assertion that Jesus Christ is a myth [reincarnation of Pagan Sun-Myths] can be proved not only through the works of dissenters and "pagans" who knew the truth - and who were viciously refuted or murdered for their battle against the Christian priests and "Church Fathers" fooling the masses with their fictions - but also through the very statements of the Christians themselves, who continuously disclose that they knew Jesus Christ was a myth founded upon more ancient deities located throughout the known ancient world. In fact, Pope Leo X, privy to the truth because of his high rank, made this curious declaration, "What profit has not that fable of Christ brought us!" (The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets, by Barbara Walker, p. 471). Rev. Taylor, in The Diegesis, reports a slightly different version of Leo X's admission: "It was well known how profitable this fable of Christ has been to us." (footnote, p. 35.)

KERSEY GRAVES

The Jesus story incorporated elements from the tales of other deities recorded in this widespread area, such as many of the following world saviors and "sons of God," most or all of whom predate the Christian myth, and a number of whom were crucified or executed. Many on this list come from The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors by Graves. This is not to suggest that all of these god-men characters were utilized in the formation of the Christian myth, as overt contact had not occurred in such places as Mexico or Bermuda. Also, modern orthodoxy does not allow for the dates provided by Graves, i.e., that Quetzalcoatl originates in the 6th B.C.E., a date far too early in the orthodox perspective. However, we utilize this list to demonstrate that the same concepts are found worldwide with and without cultural exchange, because they are derived from the same astro-theological observations. Also, we are in concurrence with the "ancient advanced civilization" theory ("Atlantis") that would allow for one or more centralized civilizations to have spread throughout the world during a very remote period in protohistory, thus taking with it the well-developed Mythos and Ritual, which would then mutate into the various forms found around the globe.

M. TURRETIN

Mr. Turretin, in describing the state of Christianity in the fourth century, says "that it was not so much the empire that was brought over to the faith, as the faith that was brought over to the empire; not the Pagans who were converted to Christianity, but Christianity that was converted to Paganism" (Taylor, Diegesis, p. 50).

EDWARD GIBBON

Edward Gibbon says: "It must be confessed that the ministers of the Catholic Church imitated the profane model which they were impatient to destroy. The most respectable bishops had persuaded themselves that the ignorant rustics would more cheerfully renounce the superstitions of Paganism if they found some resemblance, some compensation, in the bosom of Christianity. The religion of Constantine achieved in less than a century the final conquest of the Roman empire; but the victors themselves were insensibly subdued by the arts of their vanquished rivals" (Gibbon, Rome, vol. iii. p. 163).

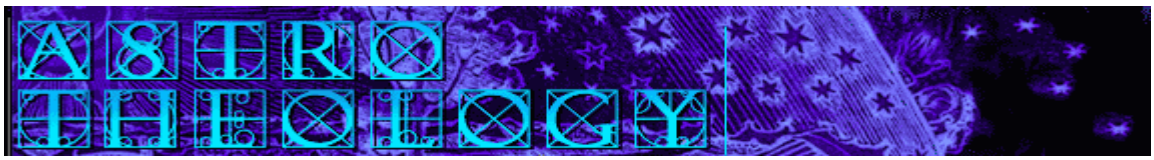
EMPEROR HADRIAN

The early Christians were charged with being a sect of sun-worshippers (Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 283). The Emperor Hadrian could see no difference between them and the followers of the ancient Egyptian god Serapis, who was the Sun. In a letter to the Consul Servianus, the Emperor says: "There are there [in Egypt] Christians who worship Serapis and devoted to Serapis are those who call themselves 'Bishops of Christ'" (Giles, Hebrew and Christian Records, vol. ii. p. 86. London: 1877).

ONE OF THE BIGGEST QUESTIONS YOU WILL EVER HAVE TO ANSWER

Answer for yourself: Are these above writers, historians, and scholars wrong in their characterization of Gentile Christianity or could they be accurate in their remarks about Christianity and we know it because we either have never studied such issues for ourselves or the religious documents that we inherited and were taught to cherish are purposeful corruptions of the Jewish Scriptures where such relgious doctrines were written in them along with the later falsification of such beliefs in the New Testament?

Answer for yourself: Could what we have accepted by "faith alone" about the Christain faith and the Jesus of the New Testament be wrong because our religious documents are forgeries in "key" places and we stand before God as idolators and blasphemers and not know it?



I would think you would want to know the facts and the truth concering such questions before you die and meet God face to face! I do!

Now lets return to our study where we left off.

THE TRUE ORIGINS OF THE ESSENE-CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS DOCTRINES: ASTRO-THEOLOGY

It has been called "The Greatest Story every told." You recognize it as the story about Jesus..but in reality it is the story about Osiris. That it is; but it is not what you think. Sadly, as an ordained Pastor who "stumbled" onto the truth during his years of service to God I uncovered what many before me have found but few have heard. Idolatry and Sun-Worship lie at the core of many of the most cherished beliefs held by millions of Christians today; and they are sadly never to know it until they die and meet God face to face. Fate, I suppose, plays a role in one finding "the truth" and being able to distinguish it from error, but whatever the reason, maybe even answered prayers cried out for truth, before you I lay the results of my research in order that you be equipped with the facts in order for you to make an intelligent decision concerning your faith if you are a Christian. One thing I hope is that once acquainted with the facts presented your spirit and soul chooses repentance from the idolatrous beliefs we have inherited and turns in a more pure worship of HaShem for this is the sole motive for such endeavors undertaken by Bet Emet Ministries. Craig M. Lyons M.Div.

COMING TO THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRUTH...FINALLY

In the New Testament of the Christian Bible, a provocative and most serious challenge is laid on the whole of Christianity. But few recognize such a challenge because they are deficient in their understanding of "solar-theology" or "Astro-theology" which underpins most of the most cherished dogmas of Christianity. Having graduated Seminary I never learned of this; and one would thing when receiving a Master's degree in religious studies some mention somewhere would have been made of this important fact. This "fact" goes unrecognized by the vast majority of "worshippers" who call themselves "Christians" today. Pastors who know or who come to this knowledge, either by design or by accident, rarely mention this "fact" to their congregation for the fear of what would ensue if people came to this knowledge. Since it bears directly on our subject, we will quote it: "...if Christ be not risen, then our preaching is in vain, and your faith is also in vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God...And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins." (I Cor 15:14, 15, & 17)

Answer for yourself: Do you think it a serious offense to be "false witnesses of God"?

I sure do, and knowing that fact and the deficiencies of my "previous orthodox faith" I no longer can maintain or teach such "dogmas" to the unsuspecting flocks of God. I must do the opposite; warn them of the hidden errors in their religious belief system that corrupts their worship of the Creator. The sad fact is that God is aware that our worship is tainted; it is we, the unsuspecting gullible Christian flock who accepts everything "by faith" which has been deceived.

In the New Testament there is a warning given to all who would build a house. Namely, before you lay the foundation, find out what the foundation itself will rest on - solid rock, or sand? The reason is obvious...or said another way; "You need to stand under the foundation to get a true understanding!"

THE FOUNDATIONS FOR CHRISTIAN BELIEFS...WHAT ARE THEY REALLY....HISTORICAL OR ASTROLOGICAL?

Let's closely examine the original, conceptual foundations of the faith, and then decide "...if Christ be not risen. " But in order to do that, we must go back, not 2.000 years to the birth of Christ, but 8 to 10,000 years to the birth of modern man. For when one seeks to establish foundations, one must begin at the beginning.

Many thousands of years ago in what we refer to as the the "primordial world" of the ancients, human life was a far different experience to that which we enjoy today. While it is true that we have less documentation on that prehistoric world than we have on our own age, ample enough is known from the ancient writings to paint a rather clear picture of our primitive ancestry. If we have learned anything at all, it is this: The more we change, the more we stay the same. And nowhere is this more clearly demonstrated than in the history of man's quest for "God", and the ancient religion we still keep holy today.

According to the best understanding we have gleaned from the available records, life for our ancient forefathers was a mixture of wonder and fear. Each day, just finding food for one's family without becoming a meal yourself for the roaming predatory animals, was a life and death struggle (if you have ever ventured out on a cold night with insufficient clothing, and without friend or family near, you could quickly see how fearful the dark, cold primordial nights could be)... And then came winter!

It was from these meager, distressful conditions of the human race that our long history of the search for God and meaning has come. Any evolution, at it's most accelerated rate, is always agonizingly slow. But from the beginning, man's profound questions demanded answers. When no clear answers were forthcoming from the universe, man turned inward, and developed his own. Keep in mind that all the theological teachings of the Western World were developed in the Northern Hemisphere. The study of this subject is properly called "Astro-Theology" or, "The Worship of the Heavens".

ASTRO-THEOLOGY

This is the first, original, and therefore the oldest, and most respected story on Earth! It did not take ancient man very long to decide that in this world the single greatest enemy to be feared was the darkness of night, and all the unknown dangers that came with it. Simply stated, man's first enemy was darkness.

Understanding this one fact alone, people can readily see why the greatest and most trustworthy friend the human race could ever have was by far, heaven's greatest gift to the world ... that Glorious Rising Orb of Day ...the Sun

With this simple truth understood, we can begin to unravel an ancient and wonderful story. Today, as in all mankind's history, it has once again been told anew. But it is not as if this information has been lost to mankind; only misplaced. Although considering myself a rather well-educated man, it was over 15 years of intense study in varied religious subjects before I stumbled onto the wealth of information that revealed the true origins of Christianity at its roots. Once seeing the "beginning" of theology at its true origin, it was then easy to follow the evolution of this "same idea" though every succeeding Gentile nations of the world as nation conquered nation or at least influenced each other. Finally my search let me to Alexandria, Egypt, where ironically it had all begun on the same continent thousands of years earlier, where I discovered buried within the Essenes of the 3rd century B.C. the same religious tenants of "Astro-theology" of the ancients and primitive man. It was easy again to trace this "same Essene theology" into Palestine and Qumran and finally into the early Church and later to Rome as they remolded it into what we are all familiar with today as traditional Christian doctrine. If you followed such a course as mentioned one can draw a straight line from the Sun-worship of the ancients to Rome and Roman Catholicism and even to Protestantism. Within this scope the pivotal point that concerns us in this website is the influence of the Essenes on what would later be called "Christianity;" because had it not been for the Essenes and their "theological influence" upon the Messianic movement within Judaism in the two centuries before Jesus and the century following, then Christianity as we know it today would have never been infected with Sun-worship in the first place and the legacy of the Jesus Movement would not need the major correction which it needs today. With the current interest revolving around the Essenes and the Qumran Sect since the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1947, the intense investigation into this desert sect has opened again the minds of the best scholars to what history had covered over by sand for thousands of years. The "religious theology" and the "religious belief system" of the Qumran sect was never "new" or "innovative;" even less Divine. Equipped with the facts one can trace the religious evolution of the Qumran sect as they departed from normative Judaism and gravitated to an "Astro-theological religious belief system" when their hopes and dreams in a renewed Judaism were never fulfilled. The time has come to set matters straight and this information of the Essene departure from normative Judaism is presented at other places on this website.

THE CHALLENGE BEFORE YOU...COMING TO TERMS WITH WHAT YOU LEARN ABOUT ASTRO-THEOLOGY

First. no people of the ancient world believed the "Sun" to be "God". That belongs in the "disinformation file".

In point of fact, every Ancient culture and nation on Earth have all used the Sun as the most logically appropriate symbol to represent the Glory of the unseen Creator of the heavens. Here it is important to remember two points.

First, with the exception of Japan, the ancient world mythologies always understood the Sun to be masculine in qualities, and the moon feminine. Second, the English language is derived from the German. In the Germanic, the word 'Sun' is spelled 'Son'ne'. The two words can (and have been) used interchangeably. Let us look as some examples from the Bible that proves this point:

Old Testament:
"The heavens are declaring the Glory of God." (PS.19: 1)

New Testament:
"Jesus is the Glory of God." (2 Cor 4:6)

Old Testament:
"The SUN of Righteousness will arise with healings in His wings." (Mal 4:2)

New Testament:
"God's Son/Sun...he is risen!" (Matt 4:16)
Saying. "How, often I wanted to gather you under my wing. "

NOW THE FACTS AND BASICS OF ASTRO-THEOLOGY

So many times we see things and really fail to realize what we see. We often fail to recognize what is before our eyes and only see superficially. The reasons are many and varied. Quite often our failure to recognize what what we see for what it really is due to our lack of knowledge concerning what we observe. Once acquiring such information then our minds explode with understanding; understanding which comes often only by dedicated study. Presented for your examination is a picture of the Statue of Liberty; an icon familiar to almost every American. Notice if you will that the wears on her head a "crown of thorns," symbolizing the rays of the Sun. Kings to this day wear the same kind of crown symbolizing the Sun.

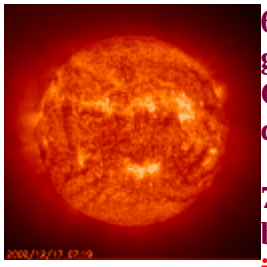
Within such a simple icon is a story dating back thousands of years.

THE "ANCIENT STORY" WENT SOMETHING LIKE THIS....

1. The ancient peoples reasoned that no one on Earth could ever lay claim of ownership to the Great Orb of Day. It must belong to the unseen Creator of the Universe. It was, figuratively speaking, not man's, but "GOD'S SUN". Truly, "God's Sun/Son was... THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.



2. As stated before, in the dark cold of night man realized his utter vulnerability to the elements. Each night, mankind was forced to wait for the "Risen Sun" to chase away the physical and mental insecurity brought on by the darkness. Therefore, the morning Sun focused man's attention on heavenly dependents for his frail, short existence on Earth, and in doing so, it became the appropriate symbol of divine benevolence from heaven.

3. So just as small fire brought limited light into man's own little world of darkness, likewise the "Great Fire of Day" served the whole Earth with its heavenly presence.
For this reason, it was said at Deut 4:24, and Heb 12:29 that the God of the Bible was a "Consuming Fire" in heaven. And so He is!

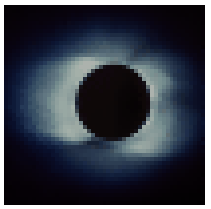
4. It was accepted by all that man was bound to a life on Earth, but the sky was God the Father's abode - His dwelling place. Naturally, God's Son/Sun would also reside with his Father " up in Heaven".

5. Ancient man saw in his male offspring his own image and likeness, and his own existence as a father was proved by the person of his son. It was assumed that God's 'Sun was but a visible representative of the unseen Creator in heaven. So it was said, "When you have seen the Sun, you have seen the Father", or "The Father is glorified in his Sun".

6. Ancient man had no problem understanding that all life on Earth depended directly on life-giving energy from the Sun. Consequently, all life was lost without the Sun. It followed that God's 'Sun' was nothing less than "Our very Saviour". If you don't think so, wait 'till it don't come up!

7. Since life is energy, and energy from the Sun gave life, and we sustained our very existence by taking energy in from our food (which came directly from God's Sun), the Sun must give up its life supporting energy so that we may continue to live. "God's Sun gives his life for us to live."

8. While it was plainly true that our life came from and was sustained each day by "Our Saviour... God's Sun", it was and would be true only as long as the Sun would return each morning. Our hope of salvation would be secure only in a "RISEN saviour". For if he did not rise from his grave of darkness, all would be lost. All the world waited patiently for His 'imminent return". The Divine Father would never leave us at the mercy of this world of darkness. His Heavenly promise concerning his Sun was surely that..."He would come again"...to light our path, and save those lost in the darkness ... And He still does...every morning about 5:30 am.



9. Logically, even if man himself died, as long as the Sun comes up each day, life on Earth will continue forever.

Therefore, it was said in the ancient texts that everlasting life was "the gift" that the Father gives through his Sun. For..."God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten SUN that we may have life everlasting"....on Earth! Not for you personally - but ON EARTH...everlasting life!

10. Since evil and harm lurked at every turn in the fearful dark of night, all evil or harmful deeds were naturally, the..."works of darkness."

11. With the return of the Sun each morning, man felt more secure in his world and therefore, was at peace. Therefore, God's 'Sun' was with his warm rays of life and hope...The Great "Prince of Peace".

12. And of course the reverse was equally true. The dark evil of night was ruled by none other than..."Prince of Darkness"... The EVIL / Dark=EVIL (Darkness=Evil)...the D-EVIL!

We call this darkness which was evil to primitive man the "Devil" today and have crafted a whole theology surrounding it.

13. Our English words 'Good' and 'God' we get from the German word 'Goth' as in 'Gothic'. Now we see God is Good, and the Devil is Evil.

14. It was only a short step to see "The Light of God's Sun" equated with the light of truth - and evil equated with darkness. From then on, it was simple to understand..."LIGHT was GOOD - DARK was BAD."

15. That being true, then the Great Orb of Day (God's Sun) could rightly say of itself, "I AM THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD, and no man comes to the Father except through me", or one comes to God Only by the Light of Truth.

16. We should all "give thanks" to the Father for sending us His "Sun". For the peace and tranquillity he brings to our life is even called 'Solace' - from "Solar"=Sun.

17. We now have before us two (2) cosmic brothers - one very good, and one very evil. One brings the "truth to light" with the "light of truth". The other is the opposite, or in opposition to the light - "The Opposer"... Prince of this World of Darkness - The "Devil".

THE ROLE OF EGYPT IN ASTRO-THEOLOGY...HOME OF THE ESSENES

18. It is at this point that we come to Egypt. More than 3,000 years before Christianity began, the early morning "Sun/ Saviour" was pictured in Egypt as the "New Born Babe". The infant saviour's name was "HORUS".

19. The early morning Sun or "New Born Babe", was pictured in two ways.
A) The Dove - Bringer of Peace
B) The Hawk - God of War- (who punishes the enemies of God!).

20. At daybreak. this wonderful, newborn child, God's 'Sun', is ... 'Born Again' Horus is Risen. Even today, when the Sun comes up, we see it on the "Horus-Risen", or "Horizon". His life was also divided into 12 parts or steps across Heaven each day: 12 HO*RU*S=12 HO*UR*S. This is the origin of the modern " 12 Step Program". Horus is the (new-born) Sun, or the Bringer of the Light. In Latin, Light Bringer is Lucis, or Lucifer, or Luke.

21. But now, what about the evil brother of God's Sun, that old rascally "Prince of Darkness" himself?

In the Egyptian, he was called "SET". We are told in the Bible that when God's Sun died, He left the world in the hands of the Evil Prince of Darkness. This evil prince took over the world at "SON-SET"...or "sunset."

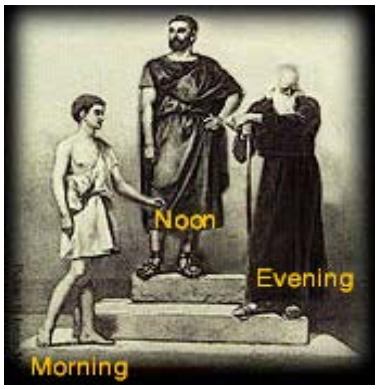
22. It was generally observed that 'God's Sun' could be depended upon to return in the same manner that he left, namely, "On a Cloud"...and that "Every eye will see Him" ... Every evening, go out and watch the Sun leave this world "on a cloud". And next morning, watch to see Him return on a cloud. And every eye will see him come again! ... Unless you're blind!

Samples of the ancient symbol of the winged-Sun flying.." Where every eye can see it"

Mal 4:2 2 But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall. (KJV)

Matt 23:37 37 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! (KJV)

23. Keep in mind 'God's Sun' symbolically represented the light of truth, but was condemned by His enemies who could not endure the light of truth in their life. The ancients taught that the very act of opposing or denying the light of truth to the point of killing it, happened in one's own mind! When we are confronted with the harsh realities of life, the light of truth, which we do not wish to face, and which runs counter to our views, such truth is judged in your mind, or judged "in the temple area" of your brain, and put to death in your head! Therefore, 'God's Sun - The Truth and The Light - is put to death at "GOLGOTHA", or "PLACE OF THE SKULL ", located somewhere between your ears!



24. And of course God's 'Sun' goes to His death wearing a "corona". Remember the Statue of Liberty? To this day, Kings still wear a round crown of thorns, symbolizing the rays of the Sun!

25. God's 'Sun' brought His wonderful light to the world, and distributed it over 12 months. So it was said, God's 'Sun' had 12 companions, or helpers, that assisted His life-saving work. So it was, God's 'Sun' had 12 apostles (or months) that followed Him religiously through His life. Incidentally, now you know why the American jury system has 12 jurors who help bring the truth to light, with the "Light of Truth".

26. As far back as we can go into the ancient world, we find that all known cultures had a "Three-in-one"Triune God. The very first trinity was simply the three stages of the life of the Sun.

A) New Born Savior at dawn.

B) Mature, full-grown (The Most High) at 12 (High) noon.

C) Old and dying, at the end of day (going back to The Father).

All three were of course One Divinity - The Sun had three different phases, but one God! The Trinity is truly a mystery...Like electricity, radio, TV, and jumbo-jets are all a mystery to the un-enlightened mind!

27. The Egyptians knew that the Sun was at its highest point in the sky (at high noon). At that point, one offered prayers to the "Most High" God! To the ancients, the sky was the abode, or heavenly temple, of the "Most High". Therefore, God's 'Sun' was doing His heavenly Father's work of enlightening all in the temple at 12 ...not 12 years old, but 12 noon! God's Sun/Son trying to bring enlightenment to the dark minds of the religious leaders.

28. The world of ancient man kept track of times and seasons by the movement of the Sun daily,monthly, and yearly. For this, the sundial and sun calendars were devised. Not only the daily movement of the Sun was tracked on the round dial, but also the whole year was charted on a round Sun calendar dial. Examples: Ancient Mexican, Mayan, Inca, Aztec, Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Egyptian, Celtic, Aryan, etc. With this method, certain new concepts emerged in the mind of ancient man.

29. The number "12" is important in "Astro-theology" and we find no better example of it except in the artist's depiction of the "Last Supper of Christ" with his 12 faithful "monthly" followers.

Since the Earth experienced 4 different seasons, all the same and equal (in time) each year, the round Sun calendar was divided into 4 equal parts. This is also why we have, in the Bible, only 4 Gospels. Of this point, there can be no doubt. The 4 Gospels represent the four 4 seasons which collectively tell the entire story of the life of God's 'Sun'. Matthew, Mark, Luke, John are Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter. This is why the famous painting of "The Last Supper" pictures the 12 followers of the Sun in four groups (of three) ... the seasons!

30. On the round surface of the yearly calendar, you can draw a straight line directly across the middle, cutting the circle in half... one end being the point of the winter solstice; the other end being the point of the summer solstice. Then you can draw another straight line (crossing the first one); one end of the new line being the spring equinox; the other end being the autumn equinox. You now have the starting points for each of the 4 seasons. This is referred to by all major encyclopedias and reference works, both ancient and modern, as "The Cross of the Zodiac". Thus, the life of God's 'Sun' is on "the Cross". This is why we see the round circle of the Sun on the crosses of Christian churches. The next time you pass a Christian church, look for the circle (God's Sun) on the cross.

The Sun, since the first day of summer, has each day been moving southward, and stops when it reaches its lowest point in the Northern Hemispheric sky (December 22nd - our winter solstice).

At this lowest point, the Sun stops its journey southward. For three days, December 22nd, 23rd , and 24th, the Sun rises on the exact same latitudinal (declination) degree.

This is the only time in the year that the Sun actually stops its movement Northward or Southward in our sky. On the morning of December 25th the Sun moves one degree northward beginning its annual journey back to us in the Northern Hemisphere, ultimately bringing our spring. Anything steadily moving all year long that suddenly stops moving for three days the Sun/Son was considered to have died (the Sun/light being submitted to Darkness for 3 days/descent into Hell). Therefore, God's Sun who was dead for three days, moves one-degree Northward on December 25th beginning its annual journey back to the Northern Hemisphere. The Sun is symbolically BORN AGAIN.

And to this day, His worshippers still celebrate His BIRTHDAY!.... Merry Christmas.

31. Today we use expressions when someone dies. We say things like, "They Passed", or "They Passed On", or "They Passed Away". The ancients said "They Passed Over" (from one life to another), And so it was with the coming of spring, as God's Sun is "Resurrected" from the Death of Winter to His New Life (in spring). In the ancient world, long before the Hebrews ever existed, the celebration of spring was called " The Pass Over", The Sun, which was dead in winter, has passed over to His new life in spring. This is the origin of the modern Pass Over celebration. This is why Christians also celebrate "The Resurrection", or His return, in spring with a "Sun Rise service"... He kept His Promise, and has returned to us with the Promise of New Life... "HAPPY EASTER-PASSOVER!"

SO WHY IS THIS IMPORTANT FOR THE CONTEMPORARY CHRISTIAN TO UNDERSTAND?

Simply because much of the above "Sun-Worship" in cleverly woven into many key cherished Christian religious dogmas and beliefs; beliefs which were included into the Scriptures held sacred by Christians and to which if followed makes one simply an idolater and blasphemer of God and most never know it until they die. It is time to come to the true understanding as to how such "solar-theology" and "Sun-Worship" became part of the Christian Faith. To accomplish that one must thoroughly understand the Qumran Sect/Essenes and their history whereby one comes to understand how this overly strict Jewish movement, which at one time were devout followers of normative Judaism, would, over time, move away from normative Biblical Judaism and evolve into an apocalyptic Buddhist-Pythagorean-Zoroastrian sect that has more in common theologically with Sun-Worship than with Judaism. The legacy of the Essenes, who became some of the earliest followers of Jesus, the Nazarenes and Ebionites, has not only blinded the eyes of traditional believers to the Divine truths concerning the Messiah but substituted a false belief in a Cosmic-Angel Messiah which is no longer a Davidic Messiah but a Godman. This belief renders those who worship him and pray to him to be idolaters and those who do this, even innocently and ignorantly, continually "do evil in the sight of the LORD!" It is time to learn the truth and repent and it is to this goal we turn next as we continue to take a serious look at the Essenes in this website.

THE FIRST GODMAN...THE ARIAN PEOPLES ADOPT THE OSIRIS MYTH

In following articles we will examine in detail both Solstices and the Equinoxes and how primitive man fashioned a "theology" around what he both saw in the Heavens and experienced in Nature. His impressions and thoughts in these areas were later "personified" as shown in concepts regarding the birth and death of the Sun and it's representative "Osiris." Osiris is the first of these "personifications" of the dying/rising Sun. But in order to understand the "Osiris Myth" and its influence upon subsequent Gentile nation, as well as the Jewish nations and the Essenes, we have to throughly understand the "Osiris Theology." I can remember my amazement when I discovered, through intense study, the "Osiris Pattern" through almost all world religions in some form or fashion. Judaism is not immune either. Therefore we find in almost all cultures the residue of such "Solar Myths" and "Sun-Worship" which again find their origin with Astro-theology and the "Osiris Myth." These "theological myths" which later came to be "personified" in the person of Osiris and others find their origin in cosmic influences in the Heavens as seen in the changing of the seasons and the agricultural cycles of nature. One must remember that the changing of the seasons is influenced by the heavens, in particular, the Sun. We must begin our study of such primitive theology with primitive man and the nation of Egypt which leaves for us ample records of their worship of Osiris. For our purpose, as you will later come to see in further study, the Essenes of Alexandria Egypt, were involved heavily in "Osiris theology."

It is important for us to note right away that the original Godman-Savior/Soter was Osiris of Egypt. More on him later.

I said in a previous article that The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important religious doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures over a period of centuries.

Answer for yourself: Can Pastor Craig prove the above statement? Yes I can but not without your help. You will need to read sufficient information to familiarize yourself with the various mystery religions and the variety of savior godmen as found in order to verify what I am saying it truthful.

This fact, that the broad appeal of Christianity is due to it being a religious synthesis of the most important religious doctrines of pre-existing, pre-Christian cultures, can be no better proven than by examining in detail the original savior-god of mankind since time immemorial and taking note of the "unique pattern" for such a savior godman throughout the Gentile nations since time immemorial.

To do so one must start at the beginning of the "pattern" for this godman and turn his attention to Sun-Worship and the nation of Egypt for the earliest records of the great Osiris, the original Godman which would serve as the "universal pattern" for all other godman saviors. Osiris, an Egyptian deity, plays a preponderant role in religious history, not only of the Nile Valley, but also of the entire area which finally became the Graeco-Roman Empire. In fact, Osiris provides the pattern for all of Godmen or Savior concepts. The facts, the legend, the myth, and the soteriology (salvation doctrines) surrounding this majestic but also pathetic figure stretch back into the very roots of western culture and civilization. Millions today believe and adhere to this "Osiris salvation myth" never knowing the origin for such doctrines of salvation; believing them to be a Divine revelation and never aware of the origin for their religious beliefs.

COMING TO TERMS WITH THE ORIGIN FOR THE OSIRIS MYTH

A powerful force of Aryans from Mesopotamia, conquered the much less developed Nilotics, about 4,000 or 3,500 B.C. These Sumerians superimposed their own economy, jurisprudence, architecture, agriculture, and general way of life upon the conquered, first, by intertwining their own Aryan religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own religious concepts the active and preponderant force. This was a long and complicated process, in the course of which cannibalism and other primitive practices were outlawed, and the flood waters of the great river placed under control; and roads, temples, and cities were constructed. Scientific agriculture was instituted, an elaborate code of equitable law established, an elevated moral code adopted, and a popular and powerful religious system perfected. The result was the greatest civilization yet known, which continued substantially intact for nearly forty centuries.

It is at least probable that Osiris was an historical personage who had married his sister, became king of Egypt, and conquered many nations; that he was murdered by a group of conspirators headed by his brother; and that Osiris was finally transformed into the god-man savior by the priests of a great cult which became dominant in Egypt and later proliferated into adjacent lands and ultimately into almost all the known world!

THE OSIRIS MYTH OF THE GODMAN SAVIOR

According to the Osirian myth, the sun-god Ra detected his wife Nut in the embrace of Seb, the earth-god. He therefore decreed that her offspring could not be born on any day of the year, which then consisted of 360 days. Nut, however, appealed for help to Thoth, the God of Wisdom; and, by playing at draughts with the moon, he won from her a seventy-second portion of each day. Thus, five intercalated days were added to the year, on each of which the curse of Ra was ineffectual. Successively, on these, Nut bore quintuplets (immaculate conception since not human conception) Osiris, Horus, Set, Isis, and Nephthys. Osiris, born on or about the 25th of December, symbolized the rebirth of the sun; in due course, he married Isis, who bore the Younger Horus, who, with his parents, made up the Egyptian Holy Family; Set married Nephthys, who became the mother of Anubis. The Elder Horus remained the celibate and intellectual Scribe. These five personalities, born of earth and heaven (types of incarnations), were equally human and divine (types of Christologies), mortals with a capacity for immortality. Osiris became the supreme god-man and Isis the ultimate mother-goddess, whose role and importance expanded over the centuries in the Osirian cult and who finally emerged as a supreme divinity in her own right.

After conferring a superior culture upon the Egyptians Osiris set out at the head of his beneficent armies to do the same for other nations; he marched all the way to India and later in Europe to the Straits of Gibraltar. Finally, according to the legend, laden with the gifts of many grateful peoples, he returned home in triumph.

In his absence, however, the evil Set conspired with the seventy-two displaced reactionary priests to seize the throne for himself. Having constructed a coffin, he induced his brother to lie down in it: whereupon the conspirators welded the lid shut with molten lead, so that Osiris died of suffocation. Thrown into the Nile, the coffin floated across the Mediterranean to Byblus (modern Jebeil), in Syria, where the body of Osiris became encased and fixed in a tree (a type of a wooden stake or cross).

Escaping the rage of Set, Isis took refuge in the Delta Swamps, where Horus was born. Leaving her child to be reared at Buto, she set out in search of her husband; finding his body at last, she returned with it to Egypt. The implacable Set, however, hacked this into fourteen pieces (body broken for you) and buried one in each of the nomes or provinces of the country.

Now began the incomparable passion of Isis, which ultimately made of her the supreme mother-goddess of the ancient world. Up and down Egypt she went, seeking and searching (Luke 24:1; women were the first to seek out the body of Jesus), until she found all the dismembered portions and reconstituted the body; then, with the help of Thoth and Horus, she resurrected Osiris into a second and immortal life. Risen from death (Mark 16:6), he could never again be subject to its power [Heb. 10:10]; (immortal-Eternal life). In due course, he entered his solar ship, which transported him to the Elysian Fields (Acts 1:9; ascension), the realm of Khenti-Amenti, where he became and forever remains the judge of all who die (2 Tim. 4:1) and the ruler of the blessed.

Osiris, then, symbolized the reborn sun; as Apis, the Bull, he was the emblem of sexual virility; but, most of all, he was the god of agriculture. This, more than anything else, elevated the Egyptians from savagery and cannibalism into civilization. Isis, meanwhile, who was identified with the moon and the cow, was the great and nurturing Mother, who taught mankind to transform the wheat into the bread of life, the barley into the joyous and invigorating ale. Osiris gave men virility; Isis made motherhood possible and even delightful. Osiris gave mankind agriculture and Isis gave them civilized food. These two divinities gave humanity "life and life more abundantly."

ASTROLOGICAL AND NATURAL SYMBOLISMS

The sexual, astronomical, and agricultural symbolism woven into the Isis-Osiris myth reflects the deepest needs and desires of mankind. The offspring of Nut and Seb were conceived at the time when Sirius the Dog Star appeared in the East, as it did then on the first of June, when also the waters of the Nile begin to rise augmented, so the people believed, by the tears of Isis, weeping for Osiris, who was called the Morning Star who brings the waters, as well as the Great Bull, and the Reborn Sun. Deeply significant is the fact that the dismembered god was buried throughout Egypt on the very day when the grain was planted; only one part of Osiris' body could not be recovered...hisphallus and Osiris' resurrection occurred when the green shoots first emerge from the soil. The great rituals and festivals of Osiris were celebrated with the planting and the sprouting of the grain. In countless images of the god found in Egyptian tombs, his body lies on its bier with the tendrils of wheat growing from his body.

BECOMING ONE WITH THE GODMAN...THE EUCHARIST

The ritual of Osiris consisted primarily in the celebration of a eucharistic rite, in which the believers and followers of Osiris ate the flesh of the god in the form of wheat-cakes and drank his blood in the form of barley-ale (Matt. 26:26, Mark 14:22, Luke 22:19, I Cor. 11:24). By "eating the God" in the form of the Eucharist as a type of communion in leavened cakes, Osiris' divinity and immortality became their own through becoming one with their Godman (John 10:38); and this divinity and immortality was diffused through their members; and they became portions of him in spirit, and the heirs of immortality (Rom. 6:5) in his eternal kingdom.Osiris gave mankind through the Eucharist the heavenly bread that came down from heaven (John 6:33); he died that men might have life and have it more richly (John 5:40, John 10:10, John 20:31); he gave his body to his followers to eat and his blood to drink that men and women might make the ultimate identification with himself, rise from the grave, divine and immortal. Through the Eucharist one was "in Osiris, and Osiris in them".

Answer for yourself: Does any of this sound familiar to what the New Testament teaches concerning Jesus?

Answer for yourself: Does not Christianity profess itself to be a Divine revelation? Should we rethink that?

This, in brief, was the central core of the Osirian mystery.

This basic pattern of the "God-man" will be reproduced through succeeding nations on a chronological basis and will find it's ultimate home in the Essene-Christian faith which will be inherited by Roman Catholicism and Protestantism.

THE SPREAD OF THE OSIRIS MYTH INTO ALL THE WORLD

It is important for our studies to understand that for millennia, the Egyptian was the principal culture of the ancient world. That being so it follows naturally that a reconstituted and "modified" Osiris myth penetrated many nations and countries, especially throughout Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean. Nation after nation was eventually influenced by the Osirian myth:

- Perhaps as early as 2,500 B.C., the Egyptian god-man was united with the Semitic Astarte to constitute the Adoni & Aphrodite cult
- Later, as Attis, he became the dying and annually resurrected god of the cult of Cybele
- In the 13th century, B.C., the Osiris myth appeared in Thrace, as Dionysus the savior-god of Orphism
- Later still the Osiris myth migrated into Greece, where he finally became the center of the great Eleusinian mystery itself, which was dedicated to the worship of Demeter, who was herself the Greek reconstitution of Isis.
- In the Roman world, Osiris was known as Father Bacchus.

THE PATTERN FOR THE GODMAN-SAVIOR-CONCEPT OF THE ESSENES....OSIRIS

I said in a previous article that The broad appeal of Christianity stems from the fact that it is a synthesis of the most important religious doctrines which had already been developed in the great pre-Christian cultures over a period of centuries.

Answer for yourself: Can Pastor Craig prove the above statement? Yes I can but not without your help. You will need to read sufficient information to familiarize yourself with the various mystery religions and the variety of savior godmen as found in order to verify what I am saying it truthful.

This fact, that the broad appeal of Christianity is due to it being a religious synthesis of the most important religious doctrines of pre-existing, pre-Christian cultures, can be no better proven than by examining in detail the original savior-god of mankind since time immortal and taking note of the "unique pattern" for such a savior godman throughout the Gentile nations since time immemorial.

OSIRIS....THE ORIGINAL SAVIOR...THE FIRST GODMAN

To do so one must start at the beginning of the "pattern" for this godman and turn his attention to Sun-Worship and the nation of Egypt for the earliest records of the great Osiris, the original Godman which would serve as the "universal pattern" for all other godman saviors. Osiris, an Egyptian deity, plays a preponderant role in religious history, not only of the Nile Valley, but also of the entire area which finally became the Graeco-Roman Empire. In fact, Osiris provides the pattern for all of Godmen or Savior concepts. The facts, the legend, the myth, and the soteriology (salvation doctrines) surrounding this majestic but also pathetic figure stretch back into the very roots of western culture and civilization. Millions today believe and adhere to this "Osiris salvation myth" never knowing the origin for such doctrines of salvation; believing them to be a Divine revelation and never

A powerful force of Aryans from Mesopotamia, conquered the much less developed Nilotics, about 4,000 or 3,500 B.C. These Sumerians superimposed their own economy, jurisprudence, architecture, agriculture, and general way of life upon the conquered, first, by intertwining their own Aryan religious concepts with those of the natives; and, second, by making their own religious concepts the active and preponderant force. This was a long and complicated process, in the course of which cannibalism and other primitive practices were outlawed, and the flood waters of the great river placed under control; and roads, temples, and cities were constructed. Scientific agriculture was instituted, an elaborate code of equitable law established, an elevated moral code adopted, and a popular and powerful religious system perfected. The result was the greatest civilization yet known, which continued substantially intact for nearly forty centuries.

It is at least probable that Osiris was an historical personage who had married his sister, became king of Egypt, and conquered many nations; that he was murdered by a group of conspirators headed by his brother; and that Osiris was finally transformed into the god-man savior by the priests of a great cult which became dominant in Egypt and later proliferated into adjacent lands and ultimately into almost all the known world!

THE OSIRIS MYTH OF THE GODMAN SAVIOR

According to the Osirian myth, the sun-god Ra detected his wife Nut in the embrace of Seb, the earth-god. He therefore decreed that her offspring could not be born on any day of the year, which then consisted of 360 days. Nut, however, appealed for help to Thoth, the God of Wisdom; and, by playing at draughts with the moon, he won from her a seventy second portion of each day. Thus, five intercalated days were added to the year, on each of which the curse of Ra was ineffectual. Successively, on these, Nut bore quintuplets (immaculate conception since not human conception) Osiris, Horus, Set, Isis, and Nephthys. Osiris, born on or about the 25th of December, symbolized the rebirth of the sun; in due course, he married Isis, who bore the Younger Horus, who, with his parents, made up the Egyptian Holy Family; Set married Nephthys, who became the mother of Anubis. The Elder Horus remained the celibate and intellectual Scribe. These five personalities, born of earth and heaven (types of incarnations), were equally human and divine (types of christologies), mortals with a capacity for immortality. Osiris became the supreme god-man and Isis the ultimate mother-goddess, whose role and importance expanded over the centuries in the Osirian cult and who finally emerged as a supreme divinity in her own right.

After conferring a superior culture upon the Egyptians Osiris set out at the head of his beneficent armies to do the same for other nations; he marched all the way to India and later in Europe to the Straits of Gibraltar. Finally, according to the legend, laden with the gifts of many grateful peoples, he returned home in triumph.

In his absence, however, the evil Set conspired with the seventy-two displaced reactionary priests to seize the throne for himself. Having constructed a coffin, he induced his brother to lie down in it: whereupon the conspirators welded the lid shut with molten lead, so that Osiris died of suffocation. Thrown into the Nile, the coffin floated across the Mediterranean to Byblus (modern Jebeil), in Syria, where the body of Osiris became encased and fixed in a tree (a type of a wooden stake or cross).

Escaping the rage of Set, Isis took refuge in the Delta Swamps, where Horus was born. Leaving her child to be reared at Buto, she set out in search of her husband; finding his body at last, she returned with it to Egypt. The implacable Set, however, hacked this into fourteen pieces (body broken for you) and buried one in each of the nomes or provinces of the country.

Now began the incomparable passion of Isis, which ultimately made of her the supreme mother-goddess of the ancient world. Up and down Egypt she went, seeking and searching (Luke 24:1; women were the first to seek out the body of Jesus), until she found all the dismembered portions and reconstituted the body; then, with the help of Thoth and Horus, she resurrected Osiris into a second and immortal life. Risen from death (Mark 16:6), he could never again be subject to its power [Heb. 10:10]; (immortal-Eternal life). In due course, he entered his solar ship, which transported him to the Elysian Fields (Acts 1:9; ascension), the realm of Khenti-Amenti, where he became and forever remains the judge of all who die (2 Tim. 4:1) and the ruler of the blessed.

Osiris, then, symbolized the reborn sun; as Apis, the Bull, he was the emblem of sexual virility; but, most of all, he was the god of agriculture. This, more than anything else, elevated the Egyptians from savagery and cannibalism into civilization. Isis, meanwhile, who was identified with the moon and the cow, was the great and nurturing Mother, who taught mankind to transform the wheat into the bread of life, the barley into the joyous and invigorating ale. Osiris gave men virility; Isis made motherhood possible and even delightful. Osiris gave mankind agriculture and Isis gave them civilized food. These two divinities gave humanity "life and life more abundantly."

ASTROLOGICAL AND NATURAL SYMBOLISMS

The sexual, astronomical, and agricultural symbolism woven into the Isis-Osiris myth reflects the deepest needs and desires of mankind. The offspring of Nut and Seb were conceived at the time when Sirius the Dog Star appeared in the East, as it did then on the first of June, when also the waters of the Nile begin to rise, augmented, so the people believed, by the tears of Isis, weeping for Osiris, who was called the Morning Star who brings the waters, as well as the Great Bull, and the Reborn Sun. Deeply significant is the fact that the dismembered god was buried throughout Egypt on the very day when the grain was planted; only one part of Osiris' body could not be recoverd...his phallus; and Osiris' resurrection occurred when the green shoots first emerge from the soil. The great rituals and festivals of Osiris were celebrated with the planting and the sprouting of the grain. In countless images of the god found in Egyptian tombs, his body lies on its bier with the tendrils of wheat growing from his body.

BECOMING ONE WITH THE GODMAN...THE EUCHARIST

The ritual of Osiris consisted primarily in the celebration of a eucharistic rite, in which the believers and followers of Osiris ate the flesh of the god in the form of wheat-cakes and drank his blood in the form of barley-ale (Matt. 26:26, Mark 14:22, Luke 22:19, I Cor. 11:24). By "eating the God" in the form of the Eucharist as a type of communion in leavened cakes, Osiris' divinity and immortality became their own through becoming one with their Godman (John 10:38); and this divinity and immortality was diffused through their members; and they became portions of him in spirit, and the heirs of immortality (Rom. 6:5) in his eternal kingdom.Osiris gave mankind through the Eucharist the heavenly bread that came down from heaven (John 6:33); he died that men might have life and have it more richly (John 5:40, John 10:10, John 20:31); he gave his body to his followers to eat and his blood to drink that men and women might make the ultimate identification with himself, rise from the grave, divine and immortal. Through the Eucharist one was "in Osiris, and Osiris in them".

Answer for yourself: Does any of this sound familiar to what the New Testament teaches concerning Jesus?

Answer for yourself: Does not Christianity profess itself to be a Divine revelation? Should we rethink that?

This, in brief, was the central core of the Osirian mystery.

This basic pattern of the "God-man" will be reproduced through succeeding nations on a chronological basis and will find it's ultimate home in the Essene-Christian faith which will be inherited by Roman Catholicism and Protestantism.

THE SPREAD OF THE OSIRIS MYTH INTO ALL THE WORLD

It is important for our studies to understand that for millennia, the Egyptian was the principal culture of the ancient world. That being so it follows naturally that a reconstituted and "modified" Osiris myth penetrated many nations and countries, especially throughout Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean. Nation after nation was eventually influenced by the Osirian myth; the Essenes were no exception:

- Perhaps as early as 2,500 B.C., the Egyptian god-man was united with the Semitic Astarte to constitute the Adonis &Aphrodite cult
- Later, as Attis, he became the dying and annually resurrected god of the cult of Cybele

THE ESSENE/QUMRAN RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS....SIMPLY A SYNTHESIS OF PRIOR GENTILE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

The simplistic summary accounts of the Essenes by Josephus, Philo, and Pliny have done more harm than good. Where one reads the accounts of these three men and their accounts of the Essenes most take for granted that they are accurate "kodak moments" and complete descriptions of the Essenes. I found such an idea to be quite foolish once my study went beyond the superficial understanding fed the public by most writers today. In accepting these three accounts as all that is necessary for adequate understanding of the Essenes one is led astray from the hidden truths concerning the Essene movement which lie beneath such overly simplified summary accounts of these religious zealots. What is totally overlooked in such simplified accounts by these historians is the elaborate religious synthesis of Essene religious beliefs as they evolved over 250 years in their struggles with the religious powers in Jerusalem which usurped their rightful claim to the High Priesthood since the days of the first Hasmoneans. Overlooked is the evolution of the Holy Ones from their pristine, pre-Chasidic beginnings as a Zadokite reaction against Hellenization among the Jews, into the frozen, rigid, esoteric, and celibate-communist mystery-cult which they had become in the days of Philo and Josephus (Larson, The Essene Heritage, Philosophical Library, New York, 1967, xiii).

The religious faith of the occident, or the western world, consists substantially of a synthesis of beliefs and doctrines which had their origin in many lands and among various peoples and which were combined and proclaimed under Essene influence in what we may call the New Testament. Dispersed among the New Testament is this synthesis of religious beliefs amidst Biblical Judaism. The creeds, disciplines, and dogmas on which almost all the churches of Europe and the Americas and many of those in Asia are based, purport to derive their authority from these Gospels and Epistles; and all these multifarious communions proclaim that theirs is the religion established by Jesus, whom they revere as the Christ.

The principal concepts of the Christian Gospels, which have played so crucial a role in occidental life, can be traced to their ultimate sources. Over the last 15 years scores of old as well as modern books and hundreds of articles in encyclopedias were first read by way of orientation; but, since profound knowledge is to be had only by a minute study of the sources, this soon became an industry. More than four years were consumed in the intensive study of ancient Egyptian, Persian, Brahmana, Gaina, Buddhist, Judaistic, Essene, and Christian literature. Quotations were copied and organized for easy reference. All the major streams of thought were then carefully analyzed. Important elements from various ancient cultures were discovered to have converged, first, in the Pythagorean thiasoi and then in the Essene Order, whence the Christian Gospel emerged, which, in turn, proceeded to penetrate the emotions and to achieve dominion over the Graeco-Roman world.

THE ESSENE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS...THEY CHANGED OVER TIME

The Essenes, lately the object of so much attention, play a central role in our drama. They were an extraordinary group of Jewish communist-celibates who, in their formative stage about 170 B.C.E., absorbed the metaphysics and the eschatology of the Zoroastrians, and then, some sixty-five years later, by becoming Pythagoreans, incorporated into their system much of the discipline and soteriology of the mystery-cults of Greece and Asia Minor. Upon all this, they engrafted a Christology which combined a Persian with a Messianic Judaic concept, which, in a period of crisis, they personalized in their martyred Teacher of Righteousness, whom they expected to return upon the clouds about 35-30 B.C.E., accompanied by myriads of angels to conduct the Last Judgment. They were wrong; he did not come! If you were to invest study into these areas it would be your conclusion, based on the evidence and facts available for your inspection, that Jesus was an Essene who, convinced that he was himself the incarnate Christ destined to redeem and judge mankind, left the Order of the Essenes (strict Pharisees) for the purpose of creating a mass-movement.

The certainty finally emerges that Christianity was a highly composite doctrine which combined many of the age-old religious concepts first developed by Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Persians, Buddhists, and Greeks, as well as by Jews, Phrygians, Syrians, and other inhabitants of Asia Minor. It was congenitally related to all of these; and when any of them accepted Christianity, they were simply recovering what was, at least in part, originally their own. This explains the ease at which Gentile Christianity became a world religion, yet had its roots in a Jewish movement. In the light of worldwide anti-Semitism this is amazing to say the least.

Historically, the Essenes religious faith began in a righteous separatist movement in protest of the Hasmonean commandeering of the High Priesthood and, in typical "sour-grapes" reaction, sadly ends up in final days of the first century as a religious movement which had rejected Judaism almost totally and which had gravitated to more of a Pythagorean, Buddhist, and Zoroastrian religious synthesis. In order to understand why the Essenes would reject Judaism one must understand the intricate history of the Essene evolution. There were intense political and religious reasons for the ultimate Essene rejection of Biblical Judaism per se. These newly acquired religious beliefs of the Essenes will follow them into the Jesus Movement as the vast majority of them will make identification of Jesus with their crucified Teacher of Righteousness following Jesus similar crucifixion.

"Unquestionably," writes Millar Burrows in his More Light on the Dead Sea Scrolls (p. 42), "Christianity is the fruit of a long historical process." He is right! The small Jewish Essene cult which cradled Christianity was simply the receptacle through which various ancient cultures transmitted their most cherished religious concepts to the Graeco-Roman world; which, upon receiving it, the Essenes remade in their own image. These assimilated religious concepts, held dear by the Essene cult of the first century, found their expression in a unique synthesis which has a name; we call it the Essene-Christian faith.

The Essene religious synthesis became the back-bone of Christianity and their religious doctrine and dogma today. Knowledge of this Essene religious synthesis provides a profound challenge to world-wide Christianity and its claims of being a "unique and Divine revelation

Answer for yourself: The real question is to ask is this: How much of these "Essene religious beliefs" did Jesus really believe and teach and how can we know for sure? There is a way we can arrive at the answer for this question and in time, as you study with us, we will share it with you as we study our way through the materials on this web-site.

IN CLOSING LET ME SAY:

The Essenes of the first century absorbed their basic ideology originally from Zoroastrianism and later from Greek-mystery sources, particularly Pythagoreanism; on the outside the Essenes might have looked Jewish, but on the inside when their sectarian writings are examined they betray their theological bias and it becomes evident that they as a group rejected Judaism in toto; and except for certain Buddhist additions, and the pristine church reproduced the Essene pattern faithfully. Since, however, this form of Christianity was unacceptable in the pagan world and since it was spurned by the Jews, it was Hellenized in the Pauline epistles and the Fourth Gospel, both of which reflect Stoic influence; these eventually became an essential foundation for that reconstruction or restitution of Christianity known as the Protestant Reformation. Ancient Hellenized Christianity itself did not long survive; for the soon-to-be victorious Roman Catholic Church, in order to establish itself as a theocracy, absorbed their most prominent elements from the great pagan cults which were its competitors.

It is for us to now consider why a righteous branch of Biblical Judaism would, in the course of 250 years, depart almost wholly from Biblical Judaism and its religious doctrines, and evolve into a celibate and communist-apocalyptic sect which would, in their rejection of Judaism and the Temple, absorb religious tenants originally from Zoroastrianism and later from Greek-mystery sources, particularly Pythagoreanism.

It is to the events and forces which were exerted upon these "pious ones" which made them depart from normative Judaism that we now turn our investigation.

ZOROASTRIANISM

We must begin with some background information. If you would like the explanation for the above graphic click on the image.

About 5000 years ago, i.e. around 3000 B.C.E. a group of people called the Proto Indo-Iranians lived on the South Russian Steppes, to the east of the river Volga [Boyce]. The Proto Indo-Iranians believed in a primitive concept of order (called rta in Sanskrit). They knew that order existed in the universe because night followed day, the moon waxed and waned and each year the seasons followed one another. They believed that this law was guarded by divinities or gods called Asuras, among which Varuna and Mithra were most popular. The Proto Indo-Iranians worshiped instinctively and often through fear. For example, when they saw lightning and heard thunder they thought that the gods were angry at them. For every natural phenomenon such as earthquakes, volcanoes, snow storms, hurricanes they would make sacrifices of animals and food to their deities in order to appease them. About a thousand years later i.e. 2000 B.C.E., the Proto Indo-Iranians split into two groups. One group migrated westwards and came to be known as the Iranians while the other group went east and was known as the Vedic Indians or Vedic Aryans. Because of this common root the early religious scriptures of the Indian and the Iranian have some similarities but after the split each of them developed separately. The Iranians were mostly nomads, they did not have a fixed place to live, for they herded cattle and would keep moving around in search of fresh pasture and water. Since they lived in the open they worshiped nature and they had a god or goddess for each of the elements of nature, i.e. they believed that one god looked after the sky (Asman), another took care of the Earth (Zam), the third looked after the Moon (Mah) and a goddess called Anahita looked after the waters. They called this whole pantheon of gods and goddesses as Ahuras. The word Ahura comes from the root Ah meaning "to be", so Ahura can be derived as the Being. The Iranians believed their Ahuras to be very powerful and their priests called Karapans had many rituals and made sacrifices of animals and plant food to fire and water. Their Ahuras were similar to Asuras of the Proto Indo-Iranians and of the Rig Vedas. Several hundred years later the Iranians learned the use of bronze and developed horse drawn chariots. Some Iranians abandoned the task of herding cattle, became warriors and would go from place to place raiding cattle. These lawless people worshiped the gods of war and were called Daevas. Their priests were called Kavis who were very shrewd and practiced black magic. It was during this time somewhere around 1500 B.C.E. that Zarathushtra/Zoroaster was born. As a young boy he was interested in nature and wanted to know as to how the world was created. His search for creation and the creator lead him to God with who he communed after several years of meditation. When he was 30 years old, he introduced a religion known today as Zoroastrianism. Zarathushtra was known to the ancient Greeks as Zoroaster and hence his followers are called Zoroastrians. Some followers who live in India prefer to be called Zarathustis.

Zoroastrianism, named after the Persian prophet known also as Zaratust, Zathraustes, Zarathustra, etc., was for centuries embraced by those ancient Caucasians known as Aryans or Iranians; and it became for them an instrument of national policy in their bitter conflicts against surrounding nomadic tribes and Semitic nations, represented primarily by the "Turanians," Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians, and Arabians. With the emergence of the first Persian Empire under Cyrus and its further expansion under Darius the Great Hystaspes, 521-486, B.C.E. the worship of Ahuramazda dominated twenty-three nations. These Iranians did more than drive the Semitic races into permanent eclipse: themselves descended from the older Sumerians, they were the prehistoric conquerors of Egypt and India as well as the progenitors of the Greeks, the Romans, and the Teutons: in short, they have ruled most of the civilized world for two and a half millenniums.

In that ancient world, one empire succeeded another, and throughout the domains of each, religious doctrines and ceremonials were carried from one country to another along the caravan routes. The Assyrian Empire with its capital at Nineveh, dominated Asia Minor from the twelfth century to about 612. B.C.E. After a brief resurgence of the Egyptian power, Nebuchadnezzar overwhelmed it in 605 B.C.E. and extended the Babylonian Empire from the African desert to the Persian Gulf and the Caspian Sea. These Chaldeans, however, did not remain long in control; for in 538 B.C.E., Cyrus captured Babylon; and thirty years later Darius ruled an empire which stood astride the world from Libya and Greece to the center of India, a territory comprising two million square miles and including dozens of great and populous cities, of which Babylon was the most fabulous. This vast domain continued substantially intact until it toppled overnight before the fierce onslaught of the Macedonians around 330 B.C.E. About 250 B.C.E. Arsaces established the loose confederation known as the Parthian Empire, which continued for four hundred and seventy-five years and in which a modified form of Zoroastrianism was the prevailing religion.

DEVELOPMENT OF ZOROASTRIAN MAZDEISM

The history of Mazdeism—the worship of the sun and of fire out of which Zoroastrianism grew—spans some four thousand years. It began among the prehistoric Iranians, occupying an upland area between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf. The Zoroastrians of Iran (pre-Islamic) were members of the Indo-European family known as the Aryans. They called themselves Zoroastrians because they believed in the teachings of the first Aryan prophet, Zarathushtra; also called Zoroaster. Although we cannot be sure just when Zoroaster lived, we need not doubt his historicity. Zoroaster was the first prophet to preach a monotheistic religion, and he was born in Iran about 1500 to 660 years B.C.E. Scholars are unsure as to his date of birth. He revealed that there was only one God, Ahuramazda and that life in the physical world was a battle between good and evil. As per man's actions, he would either cross the "Chinvato Peretu" or the sword bridge after death, and reach Heaven, or fall from it and go to the abode of the evil one. In the final days there would be a battle between good and evil, evil would be vanquished and the world would be purified by a bath of molten metal. Mazda would then judge the world, resurrecting the dead and His Kingdom would be established on earth. Surprisingly, many so-called Christian concepts actually were derived from Zoroastrian Aryan ideas which thrived in Iran for thousands of years until the Arab invasion of Iran around 1300 years ago. Concepts such as heaven and hell, God and the evil adversary Aharman, the coming of the Saviour or Saoshyant born of a virgin, the end-time purge of the world by Fire followed by the resurrection of the dead (Ristakhiz), the making fresh of the world (Frashogard) and the final battle between good and evil leading to the final defeat of evil. These beliefs filtered down to Judaism during the reign of King Khushru (Cyrus) of Iran.

Although proud to be Aryans, Zoroastrians also believe that all races in the world are created by God and are equal - a true sign of the real ancient Aryan's nobility and tolerance. Cyrus, King of Iran who was an Aryan rebuilt the temple of the Jews after freeing the Jews from Babylon - for this, he is still remembered by the Jews and called the "Anointed of the Lord" in the Bible. The Jews still celebrate that act of the true Aryans in a festival. Many Jews then stayed in Iran under Cyrus and his successors such as Darayus, as equal subjects under the King. Books of the Bible written after this stay have taken all these Zoroastrian religious concepts, from there they came to Christianity and other religions and can be found embedded within the New Testament as tenants of the early Christian Church. There are scholars who consider Zoroastrianism as such to be the mother religion of the present day world's faiths.! So, it is probable that the Jews were influenced by the Zoroastrian faith of Iran in those days - and took on the religious concepts of:

- Heaven/hell
- God's evil adversary...what would become the Christian "Devil"
- The resurrection and the final purification of the world
- The virgin birth
- The Saviour, etc.
- The idea of a Messiah

All these concepts being Zoroastrian. There are other similarities too - certain purificatory observances such as the impurity of menstruation etc. are found in both faiths. Indeed, the very idea of the Messiah, and the very concept of Jesus could be Zoroastrian in origin.

Zarathushtra's songs are called the "Gathas" which linguistically may be older than the Indian Vedic scriptures. The Gathas are written in an ancient Avestan dialect. This is a sister language to Sanskrit of India, and Greek and Latin of the West. The reason is, the common ancestors (common to the ancient Iranians, Ancient Indians, Greeks, and Europeans) were one and the same - the Indo-European or Aryan peoples. The Gathas, which are psalm-like utterances, are full of personal references and were probably composed by the prophet himself. E. W. West, who translated the Pahlavi Texts, published in Max Muller's Sacred Books of the East, places the birth of Zoroaster in 660 B.C.E. and his death in 583 B.C.E. His teachings achieved a firm foundation with the conversion of King Vishtasp, which occurred when the prophet was forty-two. Zoroaster appeared as his people were emerging from a nomadic state into a settled agricultural economy; he exerted his utmost influence to accelerate this process and place upon it the stamp of divine approval.

After the conversion of Kai-Vishtasp, the Iranians became bolder and refused tribute to the northern "Turanians." A series of wars ensued in which the Persians were victorious, and during which the new faith was consolidated. With the advent of Cyrus and the fall of Babylon, Zoroastrianism entered upon the stage of authentic history and became a preponderant world-force. Under the Achaemenides, the Avesta became the world's foremost sacred book. The great fire-temples in time erected to the glory of Ahuramazda appeared everywhere and in them burned perpetually his sacred flame. A vast literature proliferated, and tradition records that Alexander the Great seized and destroyed two copies of the complete scriptures each written on twelve thousand cowhides.

The aggressive expansion of the Persian Empire, however, came to a sudden halt with three great defeats inflicted by the Greeks: Marathon, 490 B.C.E.; Plataea, 479 B.C.E; and the decisive naval engagement at Salamis, 480 B.C.E. Had the Persians been victorious, Zoroastrianism would have conquered Europe, and it might conceivably have become the religion of mankind.

However, for better or for worse, this was not to be: and in 330, B.C.E. Alexander crushed the Persian power, and attempted to establish a new and unified world, in which race, creed, and nation were to be submerged and superseded by a universal brotherhood in which values would be determined, not by any supernatural revelation, but by the all-conquering force of Greek enlightenment. Had Alexander lived the full span of human life, he might have succeeded in this grandiose objective, but he died at the age of thirty-three and his newly-born empire was split into four divisions by his generals who were soon at war with each other.

In 226 A. D., Zoroastrianism began its great renaissance. In that year, Ardashir overthrew the Parthian Empire; this was the more remarkable, since this achievement forever eluded Roman arms. Ardashir established the Sassanian dynasty, which inaugurated the second Parthian Empire with its capital at Persepolis; and from 226 until 642 A.D. this included most of the countries over which Darius had once held sway. As soon as Ardashir came to power, he commanded the priests to compile and reconstitute the sacred scriptures. Although this was not entirely possible, the new documents were no doubt substantially the same as those used during the first Persian Empire.

What no other conqueror had been able to do in twelve centuries was accomplished by the Moslems in ten years. Islam toppled the Sassanian Empire and replaced Zoroaster; the Koran became the sacred scripture in all the lands over which Darius had ruled, and remains so to this day.

A few of the Parsees, however, who would not renounce their ancient faith fled to India, where they settled in and around Bombay. About 100,000 of them still live in that land where, since the Buddhist revolution, every religion has been tolerated. They still revere the doctrines and practice the ceremonials of Zoroaster; they are monotheists; they are distinguished from the Hindus who surround them by their thrift, industry, prosperity, and complete freedom from caste.

ZOROASTRIAN SCRIPTURES

The oldest portions of the Zoroastrian scriptures, known as the Avesta, were written in an ancient Persian dialect. Among them are the Gathas (psalms), Vendidad (laws), and the Yasts (liturgies). However, during the millennium preceding the Moslem conquest, another literature grew up, now known as the Pahlavi Texts, or commentaries on and elaborations of the Avesta, written in the Parthian dialect during the Arsacid and Sassanian dynasties. European scholars have mistakenly called the whole the Zend-Avesta; actually, the correct name is Avesta and Zend, which means revelation and commentary.

THE LIFE AND MYTH OF ZOROASTER

PRE-EXISTENCE OF THE SPIRITUAL BODY OF ZOROASTER BEFORE HIS EARTHY MANIFESTATION

As with other great personalities, tradition recorded certain historical facts concerning Zoroaster; but around these there soon grew up a periphery of myth, the purpose of which was to establish his authority and divinity. We are told that the spiritual body of Zaratust was created by Ahuramazda some six thousand years before his earthly manifestation (Dinkard, VII, ii, 14). During this period of celestial pre-existence, he dwelt with the creator and the seven archangels. Fifteen years before his birth, this supreme glory, that is, the spiritual body of the prophet, entered the wife of Frahimrvana-zois, and by this miraculous immaculate conception, she gave virgin-birth to Dukdaub, the destined mother of Zaratust (Ibid., VII, ii, 2-3; Zad-Sparam, XIII, 1).

THE VIRGIN BIRTH

Thus filled with supernatural glory, Dukdaub (the mother of Zoroaster) became so radiant that she aroused the hatred of the devas, who brought winter, pestilence, and marauders upon the district; and they caused the neighbors to accuse the divine maiden of witchcraft, so that she was banished (Dinkard, VII, ii, 6). Her father sent her to the home of Padiragtaraspo, father of Purushaspo, to whom she became betrothed (Ibid., 10). At this juncture, Ahuramazda sent the archangels Vohu Manu and Ashavahisto into the world; they gave the sacred hom-juice to Purushaspo and caused two virgin cows to conceive. Dukdaub drew milk from these and gave it to her betrothed, who mixed it with the hom-juice. The nature of Zaratust's spiritual body was miraculously present in this divine mixture (remember the Eucharist and the mass?);and as Dukdaub drank of it, she conceived Zaratust, who was the fleshly incarnation of his own pre-existing spirits (Ibid., VII, ii, 10-51; Zad-Sparam, XIII, 1). The immaculate conception of Mary became in due course the Catholic equivalent of the miraculous origin of Dukdaub.

THE REVELATION TO ZOROASTER...JUST LIKE JESUS

At the age of twenty, the young prophet became a wanderer, seeking "Who is the most desirous of righteousness and the nourishing of the poor" (Zad-Sparam, XX, 7); and is said to have journeyed as far as India and China. And, like Jesus, at the age of thirty, he began his active ministry with a sacred baptism and "exaltation" in the waters of the Daitih (Zad-Sparam, XXI, 1-6; Dinkard IX, xiii, I). Thus ordained for his great work, Vohu Mano led him into the presence of Ahuramazda and the archangels (Ibid., XXI, 8-11). There were altogether seven such conferences and apocalyptic visions (Zad-Sparam, XXII, 1) during ten years (Ibid., XXIII, 1) in which Ahuramazda revealed the mysteries of time and eternity to Zoroaster:

- The origin of the world
- The dual nature of the cosmos
- The primeval history of the race
- The role of Angra Mainyu
- The laws of the good religion
- The future millennial saviors
- The secrets of hell and heaven
- The final resurrection and judgement
- The ultimate salvation of mankind
- The cataclysmic renovation of the universe (Zad-Sparan, XXI, 11-19; Dinkard, VIII, 41-42; VIII, xiv, 3-9).

All this, which Zaratust wrote down as he emerged from his successive trances, was therefore later considered the unalterable word of God, which must stand for ever and ever.

THE GREAT TEMPTATION

Just as Zoroaster was approaching the period of his great ministry, he, like Buddha and Jesus, was subjected to his Great Temptation (Vendidad, XIX); Angra Mainyu (Angry Spirit, or Aharman, or Ahriman, as he is known in the later documents) "the Maker of the Evil World," assailed the prophet with fearful terrors and tempted him with magnificent promises; he offered to make him "the ruler of the nations" if he would but "renounce the good religion."

The holy man rejected the offer with scorn. "By whose word wilt thou strike, by whose word wilt thou repel . . . my creatures, who am Angra Mainyu?" Zaratust replied: "The sacred mortar, the sacred cup (Eucharist), the Haoma, the Word of God as taught by Mazda, these are my weapons."

Matt 4:3-11 3 And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. 4 But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. 5 Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, 6 And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. 7 Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. 8 Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; 9 And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. 10 Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. 11 Then the devil leaveth him, and, behold, angels came and ministered unto him. Zaratust tried desperately to win converts, but he was rebuffed wherever he went; for all were wicked unbelievers and heretics, the ungodly, ruffianly, two-legged ashemaogha. But at last, in his fortieth year, he converted a relative and then Frashaostra, his future father-in-law; and then, two years later, King Vishtasp accepted the good religion and Zaratust became the first Zarathrostema, or high priest, of the faith. According to tradition, the prophet was slain at his own altar by the Turanians in his seventy-seventh year (Dinkard, VII, v, 1).

NATURE OF ZOROASTRIANISM

Zoroastrianism was a lusty, life-embracing cult, which sought and promised every physical and material advantage in this life. It like Christianity had its own "prosperity message." Although it was based upon a concept of cosmic metaphysical dualism, it taught also the freedom of the will: it was too primitive an ideology to draw ethical conclusions from speculative doctrines. That it was primitive is obvious:

- For it taught brother-sister marriage (drawn from Osiris and Isis)
- It saw in every blessing of nature the dynamics of the Good Spirit
- It saw in every suffering or calamity, in every weed or pest, in every natural disturbance, the direct intervention of the angry spirit Angra Mainyu (Aharman).

HOLY WATER, FIRE, AND HOLY WIND

Since life and vegetation are impossible without water, thus water became sacred to a vigorous people living on upland plains and was regarded as the holy gift of Ahuramazda (god); and it was given divine personification in the goddess Ardvi Sura Anahita (Cf. Aban-Yast). Water had the power to purify whatever it touched (holy water), and could cleanse the believer from a multitude of deva-impurities: it was therefore used as the sacrament of baptism (wash away sin).

But even more sacred was living fire: for by its agency a higher culture became possible: food could be cooked, houses warmed, metals forged into tools and weapons. Fire was said to be the Son of Ahuramazda (Vendidad, VIII, p. 246), then this "son" of God became the supreme gift of the Creator to mankind! Before the sacred fire, the devas fled cowering. A woman about to give birth kept it always aflame in her chamber, as did the priests within their temples. And, since the gentle breeze was a welcome relief from the fierce summer heat of the upland plains, this came to be known as the Pure Wind, or the Holy Spirit of Ahuramazda.

Matt 3:11 11 I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire: (KJV)

We see above again the Essene influence when John the Baptist, a devoted Essene himself, declared (Matt: 3:11) that he could baptize with water but that after him would come one who would baptize with fire and with the Holy Ghost, John the Immerser was uttering words which came directly from the heart of Zoroastrianism.

ANGRA MAINYU...AHARMAN...THE EVIL ONE...DEVIL

Zoroaster regarded the nomadic tribes to the north as the especial enemies of Ahuramazda; everything from that direction was of Angra Mainyu, and to be ruthlessly destroyed. As a settled agricultural life only was sacred, it became the duty of those of the good religion to stamp out the roving and plundering nomad" — creatures of sin and darkness. The cold north wind was a creation of the Evil One; in Zoroastrian mythology, the near-destruction of the human race had once occurred through the cold of Angra Mainyu, who killed all the crops with frost for seven years, and only a remnant had been saved by Yima, who had thus become, like the Babylonian Noah, a second progenitor of the race (Vendidad, II). To the upland Iranians, cold was a destroyer; to the people living in the valley of the Tigris-Euphrates, it was the flood.

GOOD AND EVIL....A CONSTANT STRUGGLE

The Zoroastrians conceived of the world as a vast battleground on which the forces of good wage a fierce and constant struggle against the powers of darkness. Whenever the beneficent creator brought forth a good thing, Angra Mainyu counter-created an evil one. When Ahuramazda created the good and pleasant land, Iran, "thereupon Angra Mainyu, who is all death, counter created by his witchcraft the serpent in the river, and winter" (Ibid., I, 3). Ahuramazda created the plain, and the good land of Baktria in which to grow the golden grain; but Angra Mainyu created drought, frost, mice, locusts, ants, and other khafstras to destroy it; and among the human kind he sent sin, unbelief, grief, pride, unnatural intercourse, witchcraft, abnormal issues in women, etc.... Ahuramazda gave flocks and herds, but Angra Mainyu sent nomadic robbers to kill and plunder. Ahuramazda created the virtuous wife, Angra Mainyu the vile and wicked courtesan; to frustrate man's sexual virility and women's fecundity, Angra Mainyu created impotence and frigidity; to offset the good dog, he made the wolf; to harass the healthy, handsome man and the well-shaped, industrious woman, he devised 99,999 diseases. To counteract the work of the Mazdean priests, he filled the world with witches and sorcerers. To mislead and destroy humanity, he sowed abroad various false religions, which were later identified as Judaism, Christianity, Manichaeism, and Mohammedanism. To attack the pure worship of the invisible and spiritual Ahuramazda, he inspired men to become heretics and unbelievers and caused them to carve idol-statues and thereby to worship devas in their devil-temples.

Ahuramazda gave his people 10,000 plants, his sacred water, fire, and haoma-juice; he gave also his irresistible Word, the Ahuna-Vairya, the holy formula, by which to exorcise the foul fiend: "I confess myself the worshiper of Mazda, a follower of Zarathustra, one who hates the Daevas, and obeys the laws of Ahura" (Yasts, SBE, XXIII). This served exactly the same purpose as the Sign of the Cross among the Catholics.

The Zoroastrian world was literally alive with good and evil spirits. Whenever anything unpleasant happened to a Mazda-worshiper, this was the work of Aharman; and whenever anyone opposed the good religion, or accepted any other, this was conclusive proof that he was possessed by a deva. A thousand years later, the Roman popes were to proclaim a parallel doctrine.

LAWS AND CEREMONIALS

ZOROASTER THE UNIVERSAL LAWGIVER

Like the priests of Judaism, Brahmanism, and the Catholic Church, the Zoroastrian hieratics claimed the prerogative of universal legislation. The laws dictated by Ahuramazda to Zoroaster and written down by him in the Vendidad cover not only all religious duties, but all civil relationships and ethical values as well. Zoroastrianism was thus a quasi-form of priest-state.

BLAMING EVERYTHING ON TH EVIL ONE....AND THE NEED FOR EXORCISM

Since every physical ill was considered the result of direct interference by Angra Mainyu or his princes of darkness, every case of human illness, including insanity, heresy, or any other aberration, indicated possession by a fiend. The problem was to separate the deva from the victim upon whom it had seized; and this could be accomplished only by superior spiritual power, by spells and exorcisms. This belief and practice are reflected in the New Testament and were absorbed by the Catholic Church, where vestiges of them still continue, even in the United States.

THE HOM-EUCHARIST

The hoary-tree and the Haoma-juice had been regarded as divine many centuries before Zoroaster reorganized and reformed the Mazdean faith. "Every one who eats of it," declared the prophet, "becomes immortal" (Bundahis, XXVII, 4). The Haoma was an intoxicating drink, the predecessor of wine, which imparted a sense of exhilaration, mistaken by millions of primitive people for a divine afflatus. The Zoroastrians believed that it contained a supernatural essence which conferred immortality. At their sacrifices, they ate the sacred mortar, and drank the holy elixir, which were supposed to transform body and soul into eternal essences, suitable for the blessed life in the regions of celestial light.

In Zoroastrianism, there is no soter/savior; that is, there is no god-man who dies for mankind and whose body and blood must be consumed in a holy sacrament as we have seen before. Yet we find in it another Eucharist possessing a certain affinity to Osiris-Dionysus, yet entirely independent in origin. The same yearning for immortality in Egypt and in Persia produced in both a modus vivendi for achieving it: a ritual in which a divine food and drink were to confer eternal life. This was natural since primitive people in many lands believed that we become what we eat. We cannot study the Christian Gospel objectively without realizing that in it the religions of Iran and the Nile met and coalesced.

ZOROASTRIAN THEOLOGY

A MONOTHEISTIC NATURE-WORSHIP

Herodotus declared that the Persians had no images or altars, considered the gods to be supernal spirits, and worshiped the moon, sun, earth, fire, water, and wind (Persian War, I, 131). We read that Ahuramazda is "all-ruling, all-knowing, and almighty . . . a spirit even among spirits; and from his self-existence, single in unity, was the creation of the faithful" (Sikand-Gumanik-Vigar, I, 1-3). At least insofar as the good world was concerned, the Zoroastrians were monotheists.

A COSMIC DUALISM

However, their theology was inseparable from their dualist cosmology, in which we have, on the one hand, the entirely Good Creator, who dwells in the Endless Light; and, on the other, the Evil Creator, Angra Mainyu, who rose from the primeval darkness. It is true that the sacred literature emphasizes the ultimate superiority of Ahuramazda: for he alone has omniscience, prescience, and mercy (Bundahis, I, 1 ff). Angra Mainyu did not even know that his opposite existed (Ibid., 9). Ahuramazda, however, is neither omnipotent nor omnipresent; nor is he the creator of the entire universe since the vast realm of Aharman is not the production of the Good Spirit. These two are primordial and uncreated powers which stand opposed throughout what is known in Zoroastrian chronology as Time. Thus we have a gigantic dualism which governs every phase of nature and affects every thought, word, and deed of every human being.

ZOROASTRIAN CHRONOLOGY & CONCEPT OF TIME

In the Zoroastrian system, time consists of twelve thousand years, divided into four tri-millenniums. In the first of these, all creation lay in quiescence; during the second and third, Ormazd and Ahriman reigned successively; but during the fourth, the two contend for mastery, and at its conclusion in the year 2401, A. D., the God of Light is at last to be victorious.

THE HIERARCHY WITHIN THE SPIRIT WORLD

Ahuramazda had created a whole hierarchy of assistants: first among these, whom he had created from his own splendor (Dinai-i Mainog-i Khirad, VIII, 7). were the seven archangels, the Amesha-Spentas, and the Spirit of Wisdom, his active, creative agency in the universe: a concept startlingly similar to the logos of Zeno the Stoic, Philo Judaeus, and the Fourth Gospel. In the Gathas, the Holiest Spirit appears as the creator of the Ox, the Waters, and all creatures (Yasna, LI, 7). Ahuramazda is called "the holy Father of this Spirit" (Yasna, XLVII, 3).

THE OLDER PANTHEON

We find, beyond these, a whole pantheon of other divinities, probably inherited from a much older Mazdeism or Magianism, all "made by Ahuramazda":

- Mithra, symbolizing the sun, the god of flocks, herds, war, and contracts, and one of the judges who meet the dead at the Kinvad Bridge
- Sraosha, the Incarnate Word, and the protector of the poor (Srosh Yast)
- Ardvi Sura Anahita, the goddess of waters, who makes the seed of all males pure and enables females to bring forth in safety; and millions of good guardian angels.
- Angra Mainyu, however, also had his active agent, the opposite of the Spirit of Wisdom, who was a wicked fiend called Aeshm; he had also his seven archfiends; and he had millions of devas to oppose the guardian spirits at every turn.
- Azi-Dahak, the great demon, the old Babylonian deity, overthrown by Fredun according to Zoroastrian myth when Persian arms conquered the Chaldeans.

We find reflections of these supernatural beings in Jewish literature, beginning with Daniel (apocalyptic literature which was the foundation of the Essenes).

THE DOCTRINE OF TWO GODS

Zoroastrianism postulates a definite ditheism during twelve millenniums of time, while the two great spirits stand opposed to each other for it cannot be denied that Aharman was as unoriginate as Ahuramazda; he was, as it were, the evil and obverse twin of the God of Light (Cf. Gathas, Varna, XXX, 4-5). And it is quite possible that, according to the Zoroastrian system, with prescience, the wicked spirit might ultimately have seized the upper regions, annihilated the Celestial Light, and reduced the universe to chaotic and Stygian darkness. Nevertheless, at the renovation of the world, Aharman and all his irredeemable creatures are to be annihilated, his realm of darkness is to be recovered for the universe of light, and God is to reign alone in the cosmos. Then "all things shall be subdued into him . . . that God may be all in all" (I Cor. 15:28).

THE DOCTRINE OF TWO GODS EXPLAINS THE ORIGIN OF EVIL

This dualism has been impugned because it limits the omnipotence and omnipresence of the creator-god; but it furnishes a logical explanation for the existence of evil. A Zoroastrian author of the ninth century castigates his Christian and Mohammedan opponents because they postulate a single supreme being (In the Sikand-Gumanik-Vigar). He declares that they cannot escape the horns of an obvious dilemma: either their deity is impotent because He permits evil to exist; or else He is unjust and wicked because He punishes His own creatures for the wickedness which He Himself brings upon them. According to the Zoroastrian, it is idle to say that man has free will and is thus morally responsible; for God made him also susceptible to temptation and sent the devil (Ibid., XV, 142) to seduce and destroy him. Curiously enough, the Zoroastrian author quotes passages from the Gospels to prove that Jesus Himself embraced and taught the Zoroastrian doctrine of duality: for He told the Jews that they did the works of their father, the devil; and, since He declared that every tree not sown by the Father must be cast into the fire, there must be another sower or creator (Ibid., XV, 144-145). The fact is, of course, that Essenism, which was the principal source of the Gospel, drew heavily upon Persian ideology.

ZOROASTRIAN'S AHRIMAN IS THE CHRISTIAN DEVIL

The truth is also that Christianity adopted the Persian Aharman, who has no counterpart in authentic Jewish or any other primitive theology, and called him the devil. But it failed to grant him an independent or eternal origin, or to endow him with natural powers sufficient to wreak the devastation attributed to him.

The Zoroastrians demanded:

- If your devil is only a creature fallen from grace, why does your supreme being permit him to persecute and murder the apostles of your Messiah?
- If your God is omniscient and prescient, He foreknow all this: why would He create such an evil race and so miserable a world?
- If the Christian God could by fiat create whatever He wished, then He must have ordained all the sin and misery which exist: He is therefore the author of evil.
- If a prescient and omnipotent God created Satan, He knew what he would do, and is therefore to blame for every wicked act he perpetrates.

The Jewish-Christian God, therefore, must be either wicked or impotent.

AHURAMARDA IS NOT THE SUPREME GOD DURING TIME

The Zoroastrians admitted candidly that the God of Light is neither omnipresent nor omnipotent and that evil exists because Ahuramazda can neither destroy the Evil One nor prevent his activity (Ibid., III, 14-16). The Good Principle cannot destroy Aharman until the appointed ages have run their course. Nor is it possible for Ahuramazda to transform the nature of Aharman or to change darkness into light (Ibid., 18). Actually, there can be no Supreme God until the renovation of the universe has occurred. Thus, evil is inextricably intermingled in the world and in the human soul, and can be extirpated only by degrees until the final consummation (Ibid., IV, 55-59).

THE PRE-EXISTING SAVIOR

Ahuramazda, the G- of light, took further steps to insure his own ultimate victory: first, he caused the archangels to fashion the spiritual body of Zoroaster, the pre-existing savior (which we shall see in the Essenic Book of Enoch) who then dwelt for six thousand years in the Supreme Heaven with the archangels; and, second, he built an impregnable rampart about the heavenly mansions, so that Aharman could never seize this ultimate bastion.

THE MILLENNIUM OF AHARMAN & THE SALVATION OF ONLY A REMNANT

In the year 6000 of Time, the tri-millennium of Aharman began. At the head of millions of fiends, he rushed into the material world, mixed smoke with fire, corrupted the waters, sowed thorns in the earth, covered the trees with bark, destroyed the vegetation, killed the Primeval Ox and distressed Gayomard, and created billions of noxious creatures such as ants, lice, locusts, and destructive beasts. He also dug a great hole in the earth and established there the infernal regions of hell and purgatory. He debased all mankind by filling them with evil thoughts and wicked desires; he made them vicious and corrupt. He filled the world with misery; nature itself served his evil purpose, and generated storms, drouth, earthquakes, and devastating cold. The human race seemed destined only for suffering, extinction, and the everlasting fires of hell. At one time, Aharman sent continuous and murderous frost for seven years and almost succeeded in extirpating mankind. And had it not been that by means of the good Yima Ahuramazda saved a remnant in a well-stocked cave, all would have died about the Zoroastrian year 6300, which corresponds to 3300 B. C.

ZOROASTER REVEALED IN THE FLESH

The complete dominion of Aharman ended with his tri-millennium; for Ahuramazda had not merely fortified his mansions, but had, as we have noted, prepared the instrument (the pre-existent Savior) by which the Enemy would ultimately be destroyed. Aharman could not know that a series of Christs would walk the earth, who would appear to be men among men but who would actually be supernatural incarnations. Over these "anointed ones" Aharman could not defeat; for they would win over the human race to the good religion and, as a consequence, reduce the fiend to impotence; and thus it would eventually be possible to crush and destroy the cosmic monster himself.

And so (in the Zoroastrian year 8970, which was 660 B.C.E. by our reckoning), Ahuramazda sent the great prophet, Zoroaster, into the world. The tenth Zoroastrian millennium and its final tri-millennium began with the ministry of the great prophet, when he was thirty years old, in 630 B.C.E.

THE VISIONS OF ZOROASTER

THE THREE MILLENNIUMS

One of the prophet's most celebrated visions is related in the first chapter of the Bahman Yast. Zoroaster was shown all that would happen during his millennium, that is, the period before the coming of the first Messiah, Hushedar, due A. D. 371. Zaratust saw a great tree with four branches, which symbolized the four ages of his millennium: that of gold, under King Vishtasp; those of silver, steel, and mixed iron under successively degenerating regimes. In another visioned the tree had seven branches, which symbolized "the seven periods which will come." Again, the golden age, like that of Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel, was that of Vishtasp, when "Aharman and the demons rush back to darkness." Then follow the ages of silver, brass, copper, tin, steel, and iron, in which at last the world is again dominated by the fiends. The end of the tenth millennium was to be heralded by the coming of "myriads of demons with disheveled hair, the race of Wrath" (Bahman Yast, II, 24) who were later identified as the Christians. And by what token will men know that the end of the millennium is nigh and the appearance of Hushedar at hand? Ahuramazda declares that in the last days "all men will become deceivers" and affection will depart from the world; the father will hate the son, the son the father; brother will hate brother; "the son-in-law will become a beggar from his father-in-law, and the mother will be estranged from the daughter" (Ibid., 30). All the sacred ceremonials will be treated with contempt; wrath and avarice will take over; and apostasy will be all but universal (Ibid., II, 37). In those terrible days the sun and the moon will show signs; there will be frightful storms (Ibid., III, 4); there will be wars and rumors of wars, and earthquakes, there will be great battles, and so many soldiers will be slain that a thousand women will seek to kiss one man (Ibid., III, 21-22). But Mitro will be victorious and will at last destroy the idol temples and restore the good religion of Ahuramazda (Ibid., III, 36). And then Hushedar (Messiah) will come (Ibid., III, 43-44).

It is evident that the apocalyptic tribulations of Daniel and those described in the New Testament (Matt: 10:5-23, 24:6-31; Mark 13) are appropriated from the literature of the Zoroastrians, who, curiously enough, were persuaded that the conflicts and defeats which beset them about 350 A.D. as a result of Christian aggressions and Manichaean apostasy were the very ones which would precede the coming of their first Messiah, Hushedar, due in 371 A.D..

At the close of each of the last three millenniums of Time (after 6000 years), a great savior was to appear, who would reconstitute the good religion; each of these was to be born through a virgin-birth from a maiden directly descended from Zoroaster himself, and therefore of the divine spiritual body first produced by the archangels in the year 3000 of Time.

HUSHEDAR...THE INCARNATED MESSIAH

Thus, in the Zoroastrian year 9970, the virgin Shemig-abu, who, although of the ripe age of fifteen, has never known a man, "walks up to the holy water" (Ibid., VII, ix, 18-20) and becomes pregnant with Hushedar, the first reincarnation of the Zoroastrian Messiah. At the age of thirty, in the year 10,001 of Time—which falls in A.D. 371 — the sun was to stand still for ten days and Hushedar was to ascend into the eternal light and confer with the archangels. He was then to return to the earth, re-establish the good religion, and one third of the human race was to be converted (Dinkard, VII, viii, 55-60).

AUSHEDAR-MAH

As in the previous formula, in the year 10,971, which was A.D. 1341, the fifteen-year-old maiden Shapirabu, who "has not before associated with men; nor yet afterwards, when she becomes pregnant . . . walks up to the water" and, through contact with this holy element, conceives Aushedar-Mah, upon whose arrival at the age of thirty, the sun was to stand still for twenty days; he too was to have conferences with the archangels, return to the earth, and so thoroughly establish the good religion that two thirds of the human race would become Mazda-worshipers.

THE GREAT SOSHANS

Finally, in the year 11,001 of Time, which fell in A.D. 1371, the twelfth and final millennium was to begin. During this period, such great advances were to be made in medical science that no one would die of sickness or disease; and all wars would cease. During the progress of the millennium, all men and women were to become Mazda-worshipers. In the year 11,941 A.D. the great Soshans (Saoshyant) would be born of the virgin Gobak-abu; she too would conceive by contact with the holy water and give birth to the great benefactor of mankind. At the age of thirty, he too is to have conferences with the archangels, and the sun is to stand still for thirty days. After his birth, there are to be "seventeen years of vegetable-eating, thirty years of waterdiet, and ten years of spiritual food" (Dinkard, VII, xi, 4). Thus the earthly life of Soshans was to comprise fifty-seven years, and the end of Time was to occur in the Zoroastrian year 12,000 which would be 2,400 A. D. During this period, iniquity is gradually to decrease on earth, disease and decrepitude are to disappear, death and persecution will not occur, and multitudes are to be united in the religion of Ahuramazda (Ibid., 4, 6).

ARMAGEDDON

Nevertheless, Aharman will be able to mobilize a vast army which will march upon Iran, the holy nation, where the great and final Armageddon will be fought. The slaughter is to be so great that the rivers of blood will reach the girths of the horses. Soshans smites the hordes of unbelievers and demons, and ushers in the kingdom of righteousness (Bahman Yast, III, 18-21). The great fiend AziDahak, long since defeated by Fredun, and now in the infernal pit (Dinkard, IX, xxi, 10-11), is released, as in Revelation 20:7, and rules for a year and a half with fearful devastation; he slays one third of mankind, and destroys one third of all cattle, sheep, and other creatures (Bahman Yast, III, 56), he smites the water, fire, and vegetation (Ibid., III, 57-58).

RESURRECTION AND FINAL JUDGMENT

After this, comes the resurrection, the final judgment, and the renovation of the world, in which complete triumph is to be achieved by Soshans and Ahuramazda for the benefit of the faithful. That much older Zoroastrian prophecy is simply recreated in our Revelation, in which the Soshans becomes the Judaic Christ, should be sufficiently obvious.

ESCHATOLOGY

HELL AND HEAVEN

We cannot be certain whether the Zoroastrians or the Brahmanas first developed the intense and highly personalized concepts of hell which permeated the Eurasian world centuries before the advent of Christianity;

but we know that it was the Zoroastrians who conceived of an intermediate stage, Hamestagna, which became the Manichaean and Catholic purgatory.

THE KINVAD BRIDGE

According to Zoroastrian doctrine, when a man or woman dies, the disembodied soul remains near the corpse for three days, after which the good soul is approached by a beautiful maiden, who personifies its good conscience; the evil soul, on the contrary, by a fearfully ugly old woman, who symbolizes the evil perpetrated during life (Yast, XXII). Each soul is conducted to the Kinvad Bridge, which separates this life from the next, where it is judged by Mithra, Sraosha, and Rashnu, according to its works of charity, even as in Matthew 25:31-46. If the good thoughts, words, and deeds, outweigh the evil, by so much as "one filament of the hair of the eyelashes" (Sad Dar, II, 3), the Kinvad Bridge becomes a broad highway, and the soul enters the position in heaven which it has earned: the greatest saints proceed to the realm of Endless Light, where they will sit on thrones.

If, however, its evil outweighs the good, the Kinvad Bridge becomes like a razor blade, and the hapless soul falls headlong into hell, which "is sunken, deep, and descending, most dark, most stinking, and most terrible . . . the place of demons and fiends. . .; in it are all stench, filth, pain, punishment, distress, profound evil, and torture" (Dadistan-i Dinik, XXVII, 2), which must continue until the Last Judgment.

But there is a third place, called Hamestagna, which is reserved for those in whom good and wicked works balance and who must remain in a place of considerable discomfort but without intense torture. Hell and Hamestagna (purgatory) are within the circumference of the earth, as in Dante.

Upon physical death (which is seen as the temporary triumph of evil), the soul will be judged at the Bridge of the Separator as stated above, where the soul, it is believed, will receive its reward or punishment, depending upon the life which it has led in this world, based upon the balance of its thoughts, words and deeds. If found righteous, the soul will ascend to the abode of joy and light, while if wicked, it will descend into the depths of darkness and gloom. The latter state, however, is a temporary one, as there is no eternal damnation in Zoroastrianism. There is a promise, then, of a series of saviours the Saoshyants, who will appear in the world and complete the triumph of good over evil. Evil will be rendered ineffective and Ahuramazda, the Infinite One, will finally become truly Omnipotent in Endless Light. There will then take place, a general Last Judgement of all the souls awaiting redemption, followed by the Resurrection of the physical body, which will once again meet its spiritual counterpart, the soul. Time, as we know it, will cease to exist and the seven creations of Ahuramazda will be gathered together in eternal blessedness in the Kingdom of Mazda, where everything, it is believed, will remain in a perfect state of joy and undyingness.

THE LAST JUDGMENT

The Bundahis (XXX) contains detailed exposition of Zoroastrian eschatology. We are told that during the fifty-seven years of the Soshans, all the dead are to be resurrected, righteous and wicked alike; each is roused on the spot where he died; earth and sea surrender their dead, who assume their former bodies. All are gathered before the great judgment seat of the Soshans in the assembly known as Sadvastaran: the wicked, as conspicuous as black sheep among white, are separated from the righteous, and cast into the depths of hell, where frightful punishment is inflicted upon them. As they depart to undergo this torture, they weep so that the tears run down to their legs (Bundahis, XXX, 14), and they upbraid their righteous brethren and friends who did not teach them the good religion during the earthly life.

THE GREAT CONFLAGRATION

Then comes the great fire in which the world burns in fantastic holocaust. The earth becomes as it were a river of molten metal, like the Platonic Periphlegethon, and all men, righteous or wicked, must walk through this liquid fire. To the righteous it will be like a pleasant bath of warm milk, but to the wicked it will be indescribable torture. But "by that pre-eminent ablution, they are thoroughly purified from guilt and infamy . . . and become saintly" (Ibid., XXX, 26).

> "All men become of one voice and minister loud praise to Ahuramazda and the archangels" (Ibid., XXX, 23).

The Soshans will prepare a hush, or Eucharist, made from the fat of the ox and from white hoary; this will 'be administered to all men, and make them immortal. In addition, each adult will assume a body of forty years, and all children one of fifteen. Each man will receive again his own wife and children, but there will, as in Mark 12:25, be no more begetting in the heavenly kingdom, in which all mankind become celestial spirits (Ibid., XXX, 26). Thus we see that Zoroastrianism was the world's first universalist faith, for in the end all men were to be redeemed.

ANNIHILATION OF THE FIENDS

But the end is not yet: even when all men are safely in the supernal regions and human labor is necessary no more, Aharman and his first lieutenant, Azi-Dahak, though defeated, are still present in the sublunary world. Auharmazd and Saoshyant now attack them, and the seven archangels assail the seven archfiends (Ibid., XXX, 29); all these creatures of darkness take refuge in the pit of hell (Ibid., XXX, 30), where they and Aharman, the great serpent, are burned "in the melted metal, and the stench and pollution which were in hell are burned and hell becomes quite pure." Aharman and all his minions are annihilated at last and their like can never exist again.

RENOVATION OF THE WORLD

Auharmazd now "brings the land of hell back for the enlargement of the world; the renovation of the universe arises at his will, and the world is immortal for ever and everlasting" (Ibid., XXX, 32). The earth at last becomes an iceless, slopeless plain; even the mountain whose summit is the support of the Kinvad Bridge, "they keep down, and it will not exist" (Ibid., XXX, 33). Out of the final holocaust, arises a new earth, a renovated universe; in this, all evil is at last destroyed, and all men become blessed saints.

CONCLUSION

Such was the religion of the Zoroastrians. Their magnificent prophecies, their grandiose hopes, have suffered the same fate as every other religious expectation which has ever been proclaimed. Their Hushedar (Messiah) is now 1600 years overdue and AushedarMah is tardy by 600 years. We find here the progenitors of all apocalyptic prophecy. It is true that later writers twisted dates and facts in an effort to make Ardashir into Hushedar; but all such attempts remained feeble and unconvincing. And certainly there has been no vestigial Aushedar-Mah.

From its very beginning, Zoroastrianism envisioned a nation and finally a world united in the worship of the Lord Mazda; to the inspired prophet it was inconceivable that any other cult should dare to advance its pretensions against the God of Light. Zoroastrianism did not seek simply redemption for single, sinful individuals, but the total transformation of the world and of the human race. All who opposed it were agents of Aharman, minions of the foul fiend, children of darkness, as in I Thess. 5:5. With such an orientation, the creed could not avoid extreme intolerance. Zaratust declares that he hates all who do not embrace his religion (Gathas, Varna, XLIV, 11); that to those who do not practice it "shall be woe at the end of life"(Yarna, XLV, 3); and that there can be no well-being in any land where heretics exist, who must be "smitten to death on the spot" (Vendidad, IX, 56). Apostates, made by Aharman, must perish when the good religion is victorious (Dinkard, IX, liii, 2); all who adopt a foreign faith "are worthy of death" (Dadistan-i Dinik, XLI, 3).Ahuramazda commands the prophet to curse all who do not accept the good religion (Dinkard, IX, xxxvii). And again: "There is no other creed through which it is possible for one to obtain the treasure of the worldly and spiritual existences" (Dina-i Mainog-i Khirad, XIII, 17), which is thus paraphrased in Acts 4:12: "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

In its original form, Zoroastrianism was never to be a universal religion and could never be acceptable to anyone except an Iranian; for it was proud and without a guilt-complex, intensely nationalistic, an instrument of Persian policy, and could, therefore, never voice the needs of other races or nationalities. Further more, expressing, as it did, the interests of the dominant classes, it could never appeal to the poor, the defeated, the miserable, the exploited, the downtrodden, the frustrated, the propertiless, as did Buddhism and Christianity, which directed their appeal to the great majority, who, having nothing and never expecting to be anybody in this world, were interested primarily in escaping the bonds of economic servitude.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

The permanent contribution of Zoroastrianism to European life and culture has come to us through its enormous influence upon the New Testament via the Essenes. Among the basic elements which the Synoptics obtained from Zoroastrianism we may mention the following:

- The intensely personal and vivid concepts of hell and heaven
- The use of water for baptism and spiritual purification
- The savior born of a true virgin-mother
- The belief in demons who make human beings impure and who must be exorcised
- The Messiah of moral justice
- The universal judgment, based upon good and evil works
- The personal immortality and the single life of every human soul
- The apocalyptic vision and prophecy
- The final tribulation before the Parousia

In addition, Paul, Revelation, and the Fourth Gospel drew heavily upon Zoroastrianism for elements which are absent from the Synoptics:

- The doctrine of absolute metaphysical dualism
- The Logos concept
- The transformation into celestial spirits
- The millennial kingdom
- Armageddon
- The final conflagration
- The defeat of Satan
- The renovation of the universe
- The celestial city to be lowered from the Supreme Heaven to the earth (Dinkard, IX, xxviii, 3)

In Revelation, as in Zoroastrianism, seven is a holy and mystical number. Furthermore, we may note that until the middle of the third century, the Catholic Church shared with the Zoroastrians their horror for all idols, images, and altars. In the fifth century, the Church began accepting the doctrine of purgatory and early in the seventh this became established dogma.

And there were at least three other elements which Catholic Christianity drew from or shared with Zoroastrianism:

- The utter intolerance toward all other religions and the conviction that these were devil-cults
- The demand on the part of the priesthood to be civil lawgivers as well as the masters of religious ritual and ceremonial

- The adoption of the Zoroastrian Aharman and his creatures as the Christian devil and his imps, wizards, witches, and werewolves

The Church took this infernal character to its heart and made of him the cornerstone of its speculative system.

THE PERSIAN INFLUENCE UPON THE JEWISH MESSIANIC BELIEF (INFLUENCE UPON THE ESSENES)

Among no people was the longing for redemption so lively and the expectation of a speedy end of the world so strong as among the Jews. Since the Babylonian captivity (586536 B.C.) the former Jewish outlook upon the world had undergone a great change. Fifty years had been spent by the Israelites in the land of the stranger. For two hundred years after their return to their own land the Jewish people were under Persian overlordship and religious influence. As a consequence of this they were in close connection politically and economically with the Achaemenidean Empire, and this did not cease when Alexander overthrew the Persian power and brought the whole Eastern world under Greek influence. During this lengthy period Persian modes of thinking and Persian religious views had influenced in many ways the old Jewish opinions, and had introduced a large number of new ideas.

- First of all the extreme dualism of the Persians had impressed a distinctly dual character upon Jewish Monotheism. God and the world, which in the old ideas had often mingled with one another, were separated and made to stand in opposition to each other.
- Following the same train of thought, the old national God YHWH, in imitation of the Persian Ahuramazda (Ormuzd), had developed from a God of fire, light, and sky into a God of supernatural purity and holiness. Surrounded by light and enthroned in the Beyond, like Ahuramazda, the source of all life, the living God held intercourse with his creatures upon the earth only through the instrumentality of a court of angels. These messengers of God or intermediate beings in countless numbers moved between heaven and earth upon his service.
- And just as Angromainyu (Ahriman), the evil, was opposed to Ahurarnazda, the good, and the struggle between darkness and light, truth and falsehood, life and death, was, according to Persian ideas, reproduced in the course of earthly events, so many Jews too ascribed to Satan the role of an adversary of God, a corrupter of the divine creation, and made him, as Prince of this world and leader of the forces of hell, measure his strength with the King of Heaven.

It is certain that the old Israelite YHWH only attained that spiritualized character for which be is nowadays extolled under the influence of the Persians imageless worship of God.

In the struggle of the two opposing worlds, according to Persian ideas, Mithras stood in the foreground, the spirit of light, truth, and justice, the divine "friend" of men, the "mediator," "deliverer," and "saviour" of the world. He shared his office with Honover, Ahuramazdas Word of creation and revelation; and indeed in most things their attributes were mingled. An incarnation of fire or the sun, above all of the struggling, suffering, triumphant light, which presses victoriously through night and darkness, Mithras was also connected with death and immortality, and passed as guide of souls and Judge in the under-world. He was the "divine son," of whom it was said that Ahuramazda had fashioned him as great and worthy of reverence as his own self. Indeed, he was in essence Ahuramazda himself, proceeding from his supernatural light, and given a concrete individuality. As companion in creation and "protector" of the world he kept the universe standing in its struggle against its enemies. At the head of the heavenly host he fought for God, and with his sword of flame he drove the Daemons of Darkness in terror back into the shadows. To take part in this combat on the side of God, to build up the future kingdom of God by the work of a life-giving civilization, by the rendering fruitful of sterile wastes, the extinction of noxious animals, and by moral self-education, seemed the proper end of human existence. But when the time should have been fulfilled and the present epoch come to an end, according to Persian belief, Ahuramazda was then to raise up from the seed of Zarathustra, the founder of this religion, the "virgins son," Saoshyant (Sraosha, Sosiosch, which signifies the Saviour), or, as it ran according to another rendering, Mithras himself should descend upon the earth and in a last fierce struggle overwhelm Angromainyu and his hosts, and cast them down into the Nether World. He would then raise the dead in bodily shape, and after a General Judgment of the whole world, in which the wicked should be condemned to the punishments of hell and the good raised to heavenly glory, establish the "millennial Kingdom of Peace." Hell itself was not to last for ever, for a great reconciliation was to be finally held out even to the damned. Then Angromainyn also would make peace with Ahuramazda, and upon a new earth beneath a new heaven all were to be united to one another in everlasting blessedness. Please understand that these "religious ideas" persisted long before the Jewish people were ever captives of the Persians and were only later introduced into these concepts following the Persian conquering of Babylon and the acquisition of the previous Babylonian Jewish captives.

These ideas entered the circle of Jewish thought and there brought about a complete transformation of the former belief in a Messiah.

THE JEWISH CONCEPT OF THEIR MESSIAH BEFORE THE PERSIAN INFLUENCE

Messiah-that is, the Anointed (in Greek, Christos) originally signified the king as representative of YHWH before the people and of the people before YHWH. According to 2 Sam. 7:13 he was placed in the same relation of an obedient "son" to his "father," in which the whole people was conscious of standing (Ex. 4:22; Deut. 32:6; Hosea 11:1). Then the opposition between the holy dignity of the "Anointed" of God and the humanly imperfect personality of the Jewish kings and their failures led to the ideal of the Messiah being transferred to the future and the complete realization of the rule of YHWH over his people being expected only then. In this sense the ancient prophets had already celebrated the Messiah as an ideal King of the future, who would experience in the fullest sense the high assurances of YHWH'S favor, of which David had been deemed worthy, since he would be completely worthy of them. They had described this future Messiah as the Hero, who would be more than Moses and Joshua, who would establish the promised glory of Israel, dispose the people anew, and bring YHWH'S religion even to the heathen. They had glorified him in that he would span the heavens afresh, establish a new earth, and make Israel Lord over all Gentile nations. In this they had at first understood the Messiah only as a human being, as a new David or of his seed-theocratic king, divinely favored prince of peace and just ruler over his people, just as the Persian Saoshyant was to be a man of the seed of Zarathustra. This "anointed" Messiah was always to be a man and not a Godman or sun-godman. Thus in this sense a Cyrus, only a human being, the deliverer of the people from the Babylonian captivity, the rescuer and overlord of Israel, had been acclaimed Messiah (Isa. 44.28; 45:1).

THE FURTHER DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONCEPT OF THE HUMAN MESSIAH INTO SOMETHING MORE THAN A MAN

But over time, just as Saoshyant had been undesignedly transfigured in the imagination of the people into a divine being and made one with the figure of Mithras, so also among the prophets the Messiah was more and more assigned the part of a divine king. He was called "divine hero," "Father of Eternity," and the prophet Isaiah indulged in a description of his kingdom of peace, in which the wolf would lie down by the lamb, men would no longer die before their time, and would enjoy the fruit of their fields without tithe, while right and justice would reign upon earth under this king of a golden age as it had never done before. Secret and supernatural, as was his nature, so should the birth of the Messiah be. Though a divine child, he was to be born in lowly state (Isa. 9:6; Micah 5:1). The personality of the Messiah mingled with that of YHWH himself, as though it were God himself of whose ascending the throne and journey heavenwards the Psalmists sing (Psm. 47:6,9; 62:12).

THE INFLUENCE OF APOCALYTPIC LITERATURE

Up to now we only see just a handful of examples where the Jewish prophets ascribed "Divine" attributes to the expected deliverer; their Messiah. It is one thing to say that the Messiah is "Godly" and a whole other to say the Messiah "is God." But now with the advent of apocalyptic literature the concept of the human Messiah who is anointed by God will drastically change and become literally God. These alternations of the Messiah between a human and a divine nature appear still more clearly in the Jewish apocalyptics of the last century before and the first century after Christ. Thus the Apocalypse of Daniel (about 165 B.C.) speaks of one who as Son of Man will descend upon the clouds of heaven and will be brought before the "Ancient of Days." The whole tone of the passage leaves no doubt that the Son of Man (barnasa) is a superhuman being representing the Deity. Owing to the fact that the book of Daniel was written around 165 B.C. yet the historical Daniel lived two centuries earlier one is not hard pressed to understand that this is a form of literature is a perfect example of "Pseudepigrapha" or false authorship of a supposed "divine" writ where one also easily sees the blending of prior Persian religious though mixed with Jewish prophetic thought. Please understand that at this time in Israel the "canon" of accepted "Divine" literature was basically closed but many who wished to promote their own unique understanding of "prophecy" would draft and author documents in the names of long dead "heroes" and claim that such was "found" in order to slip in their documents under the disquise of being written by recognized Biblical heroes or prophets of the ancient past. This is why the book of Daniel is included in the historical books of the Jewish Bible today and not the prophetic books where one might expect to find it. Such is a major example of most apocalyptic literature owing primarily to the Essene's influence where they departed long age from normative Judaism and gravitated toward a more apocalyptic understanding of social-political-religious events where they blended Persian/Zoroastrian, Buddhist, and Phythagorean beliefs with Judaism and passed it off as "Divine."

To this new "divine/human" Messiah the majesty and kingdom of God have been entrusted in order that, at the end of the existing epoch, he should descend upon the clouds of heaven, surrounded by a troop of angels, and establish an everlasting power, a Kingdom of Heaven. In the picture-language of the Essene Enoch (in the last decade before Christ) the Messiah, the "Chosen One," the "Son of Man," appears as a supernatural pro-existing being, who was hidden in God before the world was created, whose glory continues from eternity to eternity and his might from generation to generation, in whom the spirit of wisdom and power dwells, who judges hidden things, punishes the wicked, but will save the holy and just (Enoch. xlv.-li). Indeed, the Apocalypse of Esdras (the so-called fourth Book of Esdras) expressly combats the opinion that the judgment of the world will come through another than God, and likewise describes the Messiah as a kind of "second God," as the" Son of God," as the human incarnation of the Godhead (4th Esdras chap vi.1 sqq).

In all of this the influence of Persian beliefs is unmistakable, whether these arose in Iran itself directly, or whether the idea of a God-appointed king and deliverer of the world was borrowed by the Persians from the circle of Babylonian ideas. Here this conception had taken deep root and was applied at different times now to this king.

- Just as in the Persian religion the image of Saoshyant, so also in the Jewish view the picture of the Messiah wavered between a human king of the race of David and a supernatural being of divine nature descended from heaven.
- And just as in the Persian representation of the coming of Saoshyant and the final victory of the Kingdom of Light there would be a preceding period during which threatening signs would appear in the heavens, the whole of nature would find itself in upheaval and mankind would be scourged with fearful plagues, so also the Jewish Apocalypse speaks of the "woes" of the Messiah and describes a period of terror which would precede the coming of the Messiah.

The coming of the power of God was looked upon as a miraculous catastrophe suddenly breaking in from on high, as a conflagration of the world followed by a new creation. The Jewish agreed with the Persian view in this also, that it made a heavenly kingdom of undisturbed bliss "in the light of the everlasting life and in likeness of the angels" follow the earthly world-wide empire of the Messiah. This they imagined on exactly the same lines as the Persian Paradise. There would the holy drink of the "Water of Life" and nourish themselves on the fruit which hang upon the "Tree of Life." The wicked, on the other hand, would be cast into hell and suffer in fearful torments the just punishment of their sins.

The conception of a resurrection of the dead and a last judgment had hitherto been strange to the Jews. In pre-exilic days they allowed the body to die and the soul after death to go down as a shadow without feeling into Hades (Sheol), without disturbing themselves further about its fate. Now, however, with the doctrine of the destruction of the world by fire and the general judgment, the idea of personal immortality entered the world of Jewish thought. Thus it is said by Daniel that on the day of judgment the dead will rise again, some waking to everlasting life, others to everlasting perdition. "But the teachers will shine as the brightness of heaven, and those who led the multitude to justice as the stars for ever and ever." With the acceptance of personal immortality the whole tone of religious thought was deepened and enriched in the direction of thought for the individual. Former Jewish morality had been essentially of a collective kind. It was not so much the individual as the people viewed collectively that was looked upon as the object of divine solicitude. At this point the position, the road to which had been already prepared by the prophets, was definitely established, that the individual hoped for a personal religious salvation and as a consequence felt in direct personal relationship with YHWH. God indeed remained, as the Persians had taught them to understand him, the superhuman lord of heaven enthroned in pure light, the source of all life, the living God. His metaphysical qualities, however, his dazzling glory and unconquerable might were ever more and more overshadowed by his moral attributes: goodness, grace, and mercy appeared as the most prominent features in the character of YHWH. God seemed a loving father who leads his children through life with kindly care, and without whose consent not a hair of one of his creatures could be touched. The strong tendency within Judaism, represented by the upper currents of pharisaic rabbinism, continually drew the national boundaries closer, and was ever more anxiously occupied with a painfully strict observance of the letter of the law and a conscientious observance of ritualistic ordinances. Ethics threatened to be extinguished under a system of conventional rules of an essentially juristic nature. Yet all the while a more human and natural morality was arising, an inward piety, warm-hearted, popular, and sound, which broke through the narrow limits of Jewish nationalism, and sent a fresh current into the heavy atmosphere of official legality. It was then that the groundwork of later Christian ethics was laid in the purified morality of the psalms, aphorisms, and other edificatory writings of a Job, Baruch, Jesus son of Sirach, etc. It was then that the Jewish Monotheism set itself to extend its sway beyond the boundaries of its own land and to enter into competition with the other religions of antiquity, from which it was to draw back vanquished only before a matured Christianity.

PYTHAGOREANISM & THE ESSENE RELIGIOUS SYNTHESIS...PUTTING IT ALL TOGETHER

Remembering what we have learned so far, let us not forget that it would be these Essenes of first century A.D. which would, after the crucifixion of Jesus, identify Jesus with their theological Angel-Messiah which was likewise crucified in the heavens. Thus, we find this group of Pythagorean-Buddhists, who are today labeled "Essenes," gravitating toward the Jesus Movement in Palestine. These Essenes brought with them their syncretistic religious beliefs which were an amalgam of Indian, Buddhist, and Pythagorean religious beliefs which were immersed within Second Temple Judaism. Today we call these religious beliefs "Christianity."

HISTORICAL SKETCH

Many think of Pythagoras, cir. 580-500, only as a geometrician; but his activities included every field of knowledge. Diogenes Laertius declares that he did not "neglect medicine,'' and that he was the first who taught metempsychosis (Life of Pythagoras, I, p. 11-14). And he was the first who propagated this doctrine in the Graeco-Roman world, declaring that he could remember four previous incarnations (Tertullian, De Anima, XXVIII). He made important contributions to music and astronomy; he was a metaphysician, a natural philosopher, a social revolutionary, a political organizer, and the universal theologian. He was one of those all-embracing intellects which appear at rare intervals.

Ancient literature teems with references to Pythagoras. From the beginning of his manhood, he was engaged in intense political activity; and he was driven from his native Samos in 529 B.C.E. by the tyrant Polycrates, who judged him subversive. He there. upon migrated to Italy, and at Croton established a school of philosophy where he lectured to classes consisting of six hundred students. He created also a political organization which exercised a very wide influence. This consisted of celibate brotherhoods whose objective was their own moral regeneration through a communist reorganization of society (notice the connection to the later Essenes). The Pythagorean order was therefore at once economic, religious, and political. Although it must originally have been designed only as a community of dedicated saints, the astonishing fact is that the Pythagoreans in less than two decades became so numerous and so powerful that they were able to assume the public power without any resort to force. Since this was a drastic reconstitution, which sought to halt the progress of society into private property, by reversion to communism, violent repercussions were inevitable. In 510 B.C.E., the tyrant Cylon attacked the revolutionaries and drove them out of Croton after which they reorganized at Metapontium, where Pythagoras met his death by an assassination concerning which various versions are extant. According to one, he was burned in a temple, like Zoroaster; according to another, he was murdered in a beanfield, because he would not cross it; according to a third, he starved himself to death as a protest against the prevailing luxury and gluttony.

Following the death of Pythagoras, the brotherhoods again grew rapidly in what was known as Magna Grecia (southern Italy) until about 450 B.C.E., when the protagonists of private property and monogamic marriage assaulted the saints everywhere, murdered them indiscriminately, and sacked and burned their residences. Diogenes Laertius says that many others were burned at the stake in mass executions. Thus, the world's first communist revolution (or counter-revolution) was drowned in its own blood. Everything indicates that the Pythagoreans, like the early Buddhists, practiced nonviolence and non-resistance; for even though they were at one time in control of society, they neglected to provide themselves with arms; and they never raised their hands in self-defense. Their only weapons remained a fervent appeal to the moral sense, the threat of hell, and the promise of eternal bliss in heaven. The Buddhist-Pythagorean-Essene morality required of one smitten upon one cheek to turn the other also (sound familiar?).

THE PYTHAGOREAN MOVEMENT BECOME PRIMARILY A RELIGIOUS CULT

The massacres at Croton of the Pythagorean brotherhood marked the end of Pythagoreanism as an overt political force. One of its outstanding protagonists, Lysis, escaped to Thebes, in Greece, where he became the tutor of the noble Epaminondas. Philolaus, one of the great expositors of Pythagorean philosophy, also lived and worked in Thebes at the end of the fifth century; but he was able to return to Italy with others of the brethren, including Archytas, where they established a great center at Tarentum. After 350 B.C.E., Pythagoreanism became far less a philosophical school than a purely religious cult; and as such it continued to attract devotees and exercise direct influence for at least seven or eight centuries. This we learn from many sources; and particularly interesting is a passages in Justin Martyr which explains that when, as a youth, he eagerly sought enlightenment, he went first to a "very celebrated" Pythagorean; but when he was told that before he could be initiated into esoteric mysteries, he must first master music, geometry, and astronomy, he was discouraged and turned to the Platonists instead. Presumably, these also required too much; for shortly we find him a Christian lecturer in Rome.

We learn something of practical Pythagoreanism as it existed in the first century from The Life of Apollonius of Tyana (by Philostratus), according to which this prophet and wonder-worker had a divine birth, absorbed the wisdom of Pythagoras, and practiced celibacy, vegetarianism, and voluntary poverty; he healed the sick, cured the halt and the blind, drove out devils, restored the dead to life, foretold the future, and taught the mysteries of religion. Finally, it was said that he never died, but went directly to heaven in a physical assumption (does this sound familiar with what is written in the New Testament about Jesus?).

THE RELIGIOUS PHILOSOPHY OF PYTHAGORAS AND ITS INFLUENCE UPON LATER ESSENE THEOLOGY

MONOTHEISM

The Pythagoreans were definite monotheists, as various Christian writers bear witness: "God is one; and He is not . . . outside of the frame of things, but within it; but, in all the entireness of His being, is in the whole circle of existence . . . the mind and vital power of the whole world" (Clement of Alexandria, Exhortation, VI). According to this pantheistic concept, God becomes a universal, spiritual force, an idea which the Stoics were to adopt. It is clear that no anthropomorphism could attach itself to such a theology; and the Pythagoreans naturally forbade any representation of the deity in pictures or statues,—in this respect resembling both the Jews and the Zoroastrians.

DUALISM

A passage in Archelaus (Disputation with Manes, p. 51) attributes the dualism of Manes to Pythagoras, who was thus credited with originating the doctrines he borrowed from the Brahmanas and the Persians because he first proclaimed them in Greece. The Zoroastrian base of Pythagorean metaphysics is revealed in the doctrine that the soul, which is our higher principle, is imprisoned in this mortal body as in a tomb, and that the latter is governed by evil passions, which are our indwelling Furies [desires] (Hippolytus, Refutation, VI, xx-xxi). We must not, declared Pythagoras, be the slaves of our own bodies (Ibid., xxii); and we can improve and save our souls by escaping from the domination of the flesh.

NEGATIVE ATTITUDES TOWARD SEX

As sexual consummation was considered the prime pandering to the indwelling Furies [desires], every passion, in fact, every symbol related to it must be repudiated. We know that the Pythagoreans felt an overwhelming horror for beans; Diogenes Laertius says that this was, according to Aristotle, because they resemble the human testicles. Hippolytus declares that it was because, when they decay, they emit an odor similar to that of human seed; and when sprouting from the ground, they resemble the female genitals (Ibid., I, ii).

REPUDIATION OF MARRIAGE

And thus we find that by the sixth century B.C.E. there had already appeared three important movements in which men repudiated marriage: and for three quite different reasons. The primitive Orpheans did so because of what they considered the extreme misconduct of women; the Buddhists to escape Brahmanic exploitation; and the Pythagoreans because of metaphysical dualism, which made all sexual passion the mark of ultimate wickedness, the essence of original sin. One needs to take note that the Essenes would later develop from a Zadok movement which welcomed marriage into a cult of celibate communists. One easily sees the influence of the Orphic, Buddhist, and Pythagoreans upon the Essenes in these instances.

DOCTRINES OF HEAVEN AND HELL & THE DESCENT INTO HELL BY THE MASTER

Perhaps the most important single element in the Pythagorean myth was the descent of the Master into hell and his seven-year residence there, which made him the final authority on this subject. In spite of the skepticism of Tertullian, Eusebius, and other Christian writers, the ancient pagans believed this tale just as implicitly as Christians accept the existence of heaven and hell, which, oddly enough, Pythagoras himself first introduced into the occident. Diogenes Laertius states that when Pythagoras returned from the nether world, he related that he had seen Homer and Hesiod suffering tortures because of their slanders against the gods; and he says that Hermippus had related that the great prophet "came up withered and looking like a skeleton, then went to the assembly and declared that he had been down to Hades . . . His disciples were so affected that they wept and wailed, looking upon him as divine." Pythagoras assured all who did not embrace his doctrine and discipline that the tortures of this dreadful place were prepared especially for them, while mansions in heaven awaited his own elect. One needs to take just a second and think about the exclusive salvation as espoused by the Essenes, as influenced by Pythagoras, as well as the Essenic religious evolution which today is called Christianity. According to Eusebius, "Pythagoras . . . declared to the Italians that the doctrines which he had received . ..were a personal revelation to himself from God" (Oration of Constantine, IX).

SOCIAL COMMUNISM

In order to comprehend Pythagoreanism, we must understand the great social forces at work in that extraordinary sixth century B.C. Private property, class divisions, and economic exploitation had broken down the equalitarianism of the primitive community: it was therefore communism which was conservative or reactionary, and private property which was dynamic and revolutionary, carrying within itself an intense individualism, constituting a new center of loyalty, which in time made the adhesions of communal society impossible. Pythagoreanism sought to re-establish communism, but on a higher plane than that of primitive society, which was an automatic growth; the communism of Pythagoras was to be regulated by the strictest social control. It was intended to achieve the greatest possible good, but for a society consisting of, and acting in unison as, self-determining individuals. Pythagoreanism certainly did not succeed in its objective; but it did remold the ethical standards, the spiritual interests, the speculative doctrines, and the metaphysical concepts of the ancient Greek world. Had it not been for Pythagoras, the doctrines of hell and heaven might never have permeated the occident.

Not only did that sixth century consolidate the position of private property; it was also the first in which man became introspective and self-conscious. It was therefore a period of great religious upheaval throughout the world; men began asking the ultimate questions: what are we? whence came we? whither do we go? what is the mystery of life? In Persia it was Zoroaster who attempted to solve these conundrums; In India it was Gautama and Mahavira; in China it was Confucius; in Judea it was Ezekiel and Jeremiah; and in Greece it was Pythagoras, the greatest of them all.

Now let us make a summary statement. If you know anything about the Essenes, you just read in the account of Pythagoreanism the main tenants of the Essenes. The Essenes had as their core doctrines:

1. Monotheism
2. Dualism
3. Negative attitudes on sex
4. The repudiate of marriage
5. Beliefs in the doctrines of Heaven and Hell
6. Belief in judgment after death
7. The descent into hell of their Angel-Messiah following his cosmic crucifixion
8. Escape into eternal bliss through sacramental initiation and communal brotherhood
9. Social Communism

Answer for yourself: Does any of this sound familiar when you read of the Essenes? But more than that, are not these beliefs to be found in either the earliest Christian sect as found in the pages of the New Testament or espoused in Gentile Catholic Church dogma? They sure are! Again, this is more than a coincidence. The above is proof positive that the Essenes in the days of Jesus were not a conservative Jewish sect; rather, they had rejected much of Judaism and gravitated more toward Pythagorean-Buddhist beliefs.

THE PYTHAGOREAN ORPHEUS

Pythagoras, late in the sixth century B.C.E., incorporated in his religious synthesis the Eleusinian Dionysus. He appropriated the soter (savior) of the Eleusinia, who was born as Zagreus from Zeus and Persephone, who was killed as a child and eaten by the Titans, who was reborn from Semele as Dionysus, and who became the savior of mankind. But we must separate the Orphism which Onomacritus engrafted upon the Eleusinia and that proclaimed by Pythagoras. The former contains not the slightest hint of the Brahmanic metempsychosis (Indian reincarnation), the Buddhist ethics, or the Persian dualism and eschatology with which Orphic-Pythagoreanism is surcharged. When Diodorus speaks of Orpheus' "fabulous account of his experiences in Hades and the punishments of the unrighteous . . .which are figments of the imagination" (History, I, p. 96), he was referring to a document written by Pythagoras or a Pythagorean, and, as usual, accredited to the Thracian prophet.

PYTHAGOREAN POEMS

Pythagoras created his Neo-Orphic system, including its metempsychosis, eschatology, ascetic discipline, and communist brotherhoods, he set forth these innovations in "some poems of his own making" which he ascribed "to Orpheus" (Diogenes Laertius, Life of Pythagoras, I, 1). Even as Onomacritus wrote Orphic poems describing the death of Zagreus and the origin of the human race, so Pythagoras wrote others embodying his own doctrines, which he, like his predecessors, ascribed to the original prophet.

THE PYTHAGOREAN SYNTHESIS OF ALL EXISTING RELIGIONS

That Pythagoras absorbed the religions of Greece, Egypt, Persia, Chaldea, and India we learn from sources, of which the following are typical:

"Pythagoras . . . had himself initiated into the rites and mysteries not only of Greece, but also of foreign countries . . . he learned Egyptian . . . journeyed among the Chaldeans and the Magi" (Diogenes Laertius, Life of Pythagoras, I, 1).

Clement of Alexandria declares that Pythagoras was a pupil of Zoroaster and a disciple of the Brahmanas [India] (Clement of Alexandria, Misc., I, xv).

Hippolytus states that "Pythagoras came to Zaratus the Chaldean, who explained to him that there are two original causes of things . . . two daemons, the one celestial, the other terrestrial" (Hippolytus, Refutation, I, ii).

A passage in Herodotus proves that even in 450 B.C.E. it was well known that the Orphic-Bacchic mystery was also Pythagorean and that its funerary customs were Egyptian (Herodotus, Persian War, II, p. 81).

Pythagoras appropriated the ultimate Eleusinian savior, because he was the center of every mystery-cult. In the new synthesis, however, soteriology was only a single element: for now, at long last, eschatology and social or class ethics became equally fundamental in the doctrinal theology of Greece.

By creating this amalgam, Pythagoras revolutionized the thinking and the morality of the western world in a way that still hangs heavily over our entire culture. The dying god-man was no longer sufficient for eternal blessedness, and, since this involved an elaborate system of ethical renunciation, religion ceased to consist merely in ceremonies, rituals, and festivals, or even in an elaborate and difficult theology: it became a radically transformed way of life, a rigorous and lifelong discipline.

PRE-PYTHAGOREAN ESCHATOLOGY AND THE SYNTHESIS FROM OTHER RELIGIONS

Egyptian:

At this point, let us briefly recapitulate the eschatology from which Pythagoras drew in order to formulate his own. In Egyptian religion one finds that only a small proportion of all souls ever reach the judgment seat; the rest simply fade into nothingness. Those fortunate enough to stand before Osiris and to be adjudged worthy by him, were admitted to the Elysian Fields, where they continued in very much the same manner as in their earthly lives. Those souls adjudged wicked were destroyed when the beast Apep ate the heart and when the Khu was thrown into the Lake of Fire. The concepts of metempsychosis, universal immortality, or a system of post-mortem punishments were unknown.

Persians:

In Persia, the immortality of every human soul was assumed. But there was no metempsychosis: each birth involved the creation of a new soul which could belong to one human being only. At death, the righteous went to heaven, the wicked to hell, where terrible tortures were to be inflicted upon them until the renovation of the universe. For those who were neither wicked nor righteous, a third place, Hamestagna, was prepared, in which souls would be retained until the judgment. Finally, the Zoroastrians were universalists: at the renovation of the universe, all souls were to wade through a river of molten metal for three days, and, as a result of this purification, achieve everlasting blessedness.

Brahmanism-India:

Again, one finds that the eschatology of the Brahmanas was quite different: for, together with the caste system, they devised the doctrine of transmigration and gave souls to every fish, fowl, insect, and beast. And to the caste system and to the doctrine of metempsychosis, they added a realistic concept of hell-torture, more detailed and ferocious than that of Persia. All of this was an instrument of class suppression and exploitation, but, as it turned out, the doctrine of hell was a two-edged sword: for the Gainas and Buddhists turned it against their enemies, the Brahmanas.

THE PYTHAGOREAN SYNTHESIS

Greek Communism:

Neither Buddhism nor Gainaism had been established in India at the time when Pythagoras could have journeyed there; but the ideology of these movements was already rife, and the Samian sage could have absorbed them, as he certainly did. There was, however, an important difference: for the Pythagoreans did not repudiate labor; but instead of working for an exploiter or for self-aggrandizement, they were the first who established the principle: from each according to his ability, to each according to his need.

The Amalgam:

Orphic-Pythagoreanism was the world's first great synthesis of religious components. We find, first, the Dionysiac sacrament, by which the devotees were believed to achieve divinity; second, the doctrine that souls transmigrate from age to age until, by Orphic initiation and life, they attain blessed immortality or, by outrageous sin and crime, are consigned to eternal hell-torture: third, the conviction that all humanity is metaphysically separated into the children of light and those of darkness, the Elect and the Reprobate, and that only the former have the power of adopting the Orphic way of life; fourth, the persuasion that the essence of righteousness consists in renouncing all carnal and material things, all the sensuous pleasures of this world; fifth, the conclusion that by adopting the celibate, communist, vegetarian, and equalitarian way of life, all aggressions will cease and salvation be assured.

Pythagoras imported into the Grecian world the metaphysics and eschatology of Persia, the metempsychosis of Brahmanism, the ethics of the Upanishads, and the funerary customs of Egypt, and united all these with the Orphic-Dionysiac soteriology. The only significant alterations made by him were, first, his institution of a perpetual hell for the incorrigibly wicked and his abolition of Nirvana in favor of eternal mansions in heaven for his Orphic saints; and, second, his rejection of an idle mendicant brotherhood in favor of one which was industrious and self-supporting and, therefore, proud and aloof, self-respecting, and independent. Buddhist monachism was adopted by the Catholic Church; the Pythagorean by the Essenes.

THE PYTHAGOREAN BROTHERHOODS

A Way of Life:

Since all the literature of the elusive Pythagorean brotherhoods has been lost, and since they provoked nothing but contempt from the great pagan writers, we are forced to glean our knowledge of them from fragmentary references. We find in them at a time even preceding Buddhist monachism, a religion which was not merely a mystery-cult, not simply a theology and an eschatology, but an all-embracing way of life. These tightly-knit groups of celibate men who renounced family and private property were called thiasoi and constitute one of the most astonishing phenomena of history. Their metaphysical and speculative doctrines were those of Plato and Vergil; but their discipline and their soteriology were something totally different.

Initiates Became Bacchoi:

It is very doubtful that these brotherhoods possessed temples, or constituted religious congregations in the modern sense; but it is certain that they were bound together by the strictest vows and by the strongest moral, doctrinal, and emotional bonds.

Vows, Discipline, and Sacraments:

All Pythagoreans were vegetarians who renounced sex, family, and private property. There were also societies of female celibates, because we read that "the virgin daughter of Pythagoras was the head of a band of virgins and instructed them in chastity" (quotation from Plato's Timaeus, reproduced by Jerome, Against Jovianus, I, 42). We are told that Pythagoras "distributed his pupils into two orders, and called the one esoteric, but the other exoteric. And to the former he confided more advanced doctrines.... Whenever anyone repaired to him with a view of becoming his follower, the candidate-disciple was compelled to sell his possessions, and lodge the money with Pythagoras, and he continued in silence to undergo instruction, sometimes for three, but sometimes for five years. And on being accepted, he was permitted to associate with the rest; and remained as a disciple, and took his meals along with them [this is identical with the corporate structure of the Essene community and brotherhood]. If otherwise, however, he received back his property, and was rejected. These persons, then, were styled Esoteric Pythagoristae (Hippolytus, Refutation, I, ii).

The Esoterics were the Elect who, at the end of life, would escape the circle of birth and death; the holy meals to which they were finally admitted were the daily sacrament in which they consumed the body of Dionysus symbolically and so became immortal Bacchoi (sure sounds like the mass in the Catholic Church to me…which finds its origin in sun-worship). Initiation was an irrevocable step; once the hand was laid to the plough, there must be no turning back. Origen tells us that "the Pythagoreans used to erect a cenotaph to those who had apostasized from their system of philosophy, treating them as dead" (Contra Celsum, III, ii). Diogenes Laertius declares that the Pythagoreans practiced baptismal purification constantly to renew and maintain their sanctity, a ceremonial which the Jewish Essenes adopted from them (Diogenes Laertius, Life of Pythagoras).

Teachings and Practices:

Laertius declares that Pythagoras forbade his disciples to pray for themselves; he enjoined chastity; he required them "to put all their possessions into one common stock," he lectured to them for five years while they remained silent, after which, if they passed their examinations, they were permitted to speak to the Master and be initiated into the brotherhood. He forbade not only the eating but also the killing of any animal or other living creature, since all of these share with us the privilege of possessing a soul; his disciples ate uncooked food only and pure water was their drink. Together with his Esoterics, Pythagoras wore a spotless white robe of linen; wool was prohibited, since it came from an animal. He prescribed the most intense ethical soul-searching as a dally discipline. He forbade all use of oaths, declaring that it is a man's duty "to make his own word carry conviction." He required his disciples to give honor and precedence to their elders in the order of their worth and seniority. He taught that we must regard nothing as our own private property, that we must support the established government, that we must never injure any living creature, that we must never give way to such emotions as fear, grief, or hatred. He believed that gods (divine agencies) and men are akin, that is, that they are emanations from the same universal soul, which is God. Providence is a divine fact, and constitutes that fate by which the world and every individual life is ordered. The soul is distinct from physical life, is alone immortal, and its essence is Reason, which is indestructible. "The most momentous thing in human life is the act of winning the soul to good," that is, of enabling it to escape this physical prison house and the power of the Furies which infest it. We must always pay divine worship to God, in reverent silence, in white robes after daily purification, which is to be had by cleansing and lustration, by avoiding contact with death and birth and all pollution, by abstention from the meat of animals, and by performing the mystical rites of the cult.

Communist Brotherhood:

We must also emphasize that, according to the Pythagoreans, the practice of communist brotherhood was the minimum prerequisite for blessed immortality, since only under such a system can ethical purity be attained or injury to our fellow-men be avoided. Aggression and exploitation are not, according to Pythagoras, the only crimes: the mere enjoyment of comfort or personal wealth while others suffer want is a sin for which there can be no forgiveness and cries for vengeance to the throne of God.

Emotional Basis of Communism:

The ethical foundation of Pythagoreanism was simply that, since it is impossible to obtain private wealth except through social injustice, and more important, since all members of the human race are blood brethren and therefore equally worthy, it is impious for any one of them to possess more than any other. This is the overwhelming fact which all the Elect will realize and the principle by which they will reconstruct their lives. Under this morality, it becomes the inescapable duty of the capable and the industrious to support those who cannot or do not work. It is obvious that this can never be a rational principle: it belongs in the realm of emotion.

SPREAD OF PYTHAGOREANISM

Fervent Missionaries:

In Pythagoreanism we have the first great fusion of almost all the basic elements which constitute the Gospel Jesus; and we know that the ancient world was filled with erudite and fervent missionaries who preached these doctrines in a manner similar to that later described in the Christian Didache. It was these propagandists whom Plato regarded with such loathing and contempt. "Mendicant prophets," he declared, "go to rich men's doors and persuade them that they have a power committed to them by the Gods of making an atonement for a man's own or his ancestor's sins by sacrifices or charms . . . binding heaven, as they say, to execute their will. And they produce a host of books written by Musaeus and Orpheus . . . according to which they perform their ritual, and persuade not only individuals, but whole cities, that expiations and atonements for sin may be made by sacrifices . . . which . . . are equally at the service of the living and the dead; the latter sort they call mysteries, which they say redeem us from the pains of hell, but if we neglect them we shall incur the most dreadful doom" (The Republic, II).

Such were these Orphic prophets who claimed the power to bind and to loose in heaven; who performed mysterious rituals, sacrifices, or sacraments intended to save the soul from hell; who claimed authority and power to relieve the tortures of the damned; who based their preaching upon scriptures said to be divinely revealed; and who promised to redeem their disciples from their personal as well as their original sin.

Continuity of the Thiasoi:

We know from a passage in Plato that in his day the Pythagorean societies were well known: "Even in this day such as denominate themselves from the Pythagorean manner of life appear to be somehow eminent beyond others" (Ibid., X). Although we possess only scant information concerning the thiasoi after the fourth century B.C.E., there is little doubt that they continued at least to the time of Josephus; for he declares that the Essenes "live the same kind of life as do those whom the Greeks call Pythagoreans" (Antiquities, XV, x, 4) which proves that both of these disciplines still flourished during his lifetime.

After having read this then there is no way to say otherwise than the Essenes, who became the backbone of the early Christian movement in Palestine, were the first Christians and Christian theology was grafted and shaped by them. Often this "theology" was diametrically opposed to Moses and the Prophets, and their oral traditions were later recorded by them as "Divine Oracles" and they would shape the doctrines later associated with Jesus of Nazareth. What is of major importance for the Christian to realize is that many of these Essene doctrines regarding salvation as attributed to Jesus were nothing more than earlier Essene doctrines concerning their sun-godmen redeemer (Angel-Messiah) which originated from sun-worship. Sadly, we read these documents today, like the New Testament, never realizing we are reading a great synthesis of theology and ideas which found their origins in Pythagoreanism, Buddhism, Brahmanism, Zoroaster, Egypt, and even earlier. To find the truth about the historical Jesus takes a lot of reading and investigation. I hope this has helped by giving you a few more puzzles pieces in constructing the truth about Yeshua.

MITHRAISM... A ZOROASTRIAN SYNTHESIS

The worship of Mithra had been carried to completion under the Arsacids, whose language was Pahlavi, whose religion was Zoroastrian, and who founded the Parthian Empire in 248 B.C.E. Mithraism issued from the heart of Zoroastrianism, but absorbed various Chaldean (Babylonian) characteristics, including much zodiacal and astrological symbolism, and was profoundly influenced by the ubiquitous mystery-cults of Asia Minor, particularly that of Attis-Cybele, which, as we have seen, flourished in Phrygia, a territory in the domain of the Arsacidae.

When Christianity arose two centuries later, it did so independently of Mithraism; yet Christianity and Mithraism were astonishingly similar, because they were composed of elements which were the common possession of Asia Minor. Renan declared that had Christianity not conquered, Mithraism would have emerged victorious; our own opinion is that the child of Mithraism known as Manichaeism would have become the faith of the ancient world.

THE CHURCH FATHERS SPEAK

Here then we have the world's second great religious synthesis. Because of its similarity to Christianity, the fathers could only declare that the devil had established Mithraism for the sole purpose of sowing confusion;

Justin Martyr declared: "Jesus took bread, and . . . said, 'This do ye in rememhrance of me, this is my body'; and, after the same manner, having taken the cup and given thanks, He said, 'This is my blood'; and gave it to them . . . Which the wicked devils have imitated in the mysteries of Mithra, commanding the same thing to be done" (First Apology, LXVI).

Tertullian was certain that all rival cults were the devil's handiwork: "Washing is the channel through which they are initiated into the sacred rites of some notorious Isis or Mithras, . . . at the Eleusinia they are baptized to achieve regeneration, and the remission of their sins. Which fact being acknowledged, we recognize here also the zeal of the devil rivalling the things of God, while we find him, too, practicing baptism"(On Baptism, V).

Tertullian states that Mithra "in the kingdom of Satan, sets his marks on the forehead of his soldiers; celebrates also the oblation of bread, and introduces an image of resurrection.... What also must one say to Satan's limiting his chief priest to a single marriage? He, too, has his virgins; he, too, his proficients in continence.... Satan has shown such emulation in . . . administration of Christ's sacraments" that he has "succeeded in adapting to his profane and rival creed the very documents of divine things and of the Christian saints" (Prescription Against Heretics, XL).

And again: "Blush . . . to be condemned by some soldier of Mithras.... Let us take note of the devices of the devil, who is wont to ape some of God's things with no other design than, by the faithfulness of his servants, to put us to shame" (De Corona, 15).

THE CLOSE PARALLEL TO THE ESSENES AND CHRISTIANITY

The fact is that the parallel between Mithraism and Essenism and apostolic Christianity was actually far more extensive than any of the early Fathers implied:

- All three taught almost identical doctrines concerning heaven and hell
- All three taught almost the identical doctrines concerning the last judgment
- All three taught almost the identical doctrines concerning the immortality of the soul
- All three practiced the same sacraments, those of baptism and the communion of bread and wine
- All three taught Regeneration through the second birth
- All three had the same conception concerning the inter-relationship of their members,—that all were mystical brethren.
- All three believed that its founder was mediator between God and man
- All three believed that through their mediator alone was salvation possible
- All three taught that their mediator would be the final judge of all
- All three taught the doctrine of primitive revelation
- All three emphasized the constant warfare between good and evil
- All three required abstinence and selfcontrol
- All three accorded the highest honor to celibacy

Answer for yourself: Where did these doctrines which were shared by all three (Mithraism, Essenism, and primitive Christianity) come from? Well, have you read the previous articles? If you did, then you know know for yourself how religious synthesis of these beliefs originated and and were handed down and assimilated by succeeding nations.

We need not be surprised at these similarities, since we know that Mithraism and Christianity were alike based upon universal doctrines and practices already ancient with age before these cults appeared.

THE LATER CHRISTIAN DEBT TO MITHRAISM

Christianity borrowed significant elements from Mithraism after they had become active competitors:

- Justin Martyr declared that "in a certain cave near Bethlehem . . . Mary brought forth the Christ . . . those who presided over the mysteries of Mithras were stirred up by the devil to say that in a place called among them a cave, they were initiated by him" (Dialogue With Trypho, LXXVIII).
- The Christians, in time, made Sunday, which the apostolic Church had never observed but which had always been sacred to the Mithraists, their holy day.
- And, after several centuries, they made the 25th of December, which had always been celebrated as the birthday of Mithra, that of Christ also.
- Until the fourth century, and in some eastern churches as late as the sixth, the Christians celebrated Epiphany, or January 6, both as the date on which Jesus was born and that on which he was anointed into Christhood at His baptism. It is interesting to note that this was the very day which for centuries had been hallowed by the Egyptian cult of Persephone as that on which she gave birth to Dionysus, known as the aeon.
- The ancient Mazdeans had glorified December 25 as the day when the sun-god was reborn, for then it was apparent that the days were growing longer and that life would again revive. During the preceding night, the devotees of Mithra kept vigil; and when the dawn fringed the earth with its first gleam of light, the priest emerged from the temple to announce triumphantly: "The God is born!"

And so when the Christians made December 25 the birthday of their savior also, they made as great a concession to the Mithraists as they had previously made to the Attis-Cybele cult when they accepted March 22-25 as the date of Christ's passion.

HISTORICAL SKETCH

Although Mithraism does not seem to have made much progress among the Greeks, it spread rapidly among the Romans and the barbarians. We learn from Plutarch (Life of Pompey, 24) that the cult was introduced into the Roman Empire in 67 B.C.E. by pirates. It was attractive to the emperors and the nobles, because it taught that kingly authority is granted by Ormazd: it counted Nero, Commodus, Aurelian, Diocletian, Galerius, Licinius, Julian, and many senators among its devotees. Since Mithra was the invincible god of battle, soldiers were his particular favorites; and, with Mithra's his cross branded upon their foreheads, they carried his cult to the farthest limits of the Empire. Since Mithra taught the necessity of stable government, civil servants were among his ardent supporters. And, since he thundered against social injustice and preached the brotherhood of man, the poor, the exploited, and the slaves embraced his worship by myriads, prepared to die for the faith. Mithraism, then, encouraged by the state, spread among the poor, through the army, and everywhere in the civil service. Hundreds of Mithraeums were established along the trading routes of Africa, Italy, Gaul, Spain, Germany, Britain, and the Orient. Slaves from the Middle East, transported to Rome and the provinces, sang hymns to Mithra from the Indian Ocean to points beyond the Pillars of Hercules.

The power of Mithraism lay in 4 areas:

- Its syncretism
- Its flexibility
- Its universality
- Its attractiveness to various classes

The weakness of Mithraism in 3 areas:

- Mithraism could not point to an historical godman savior as had prior mystery religions
- Mithraism abandoned the Messianic concept
- Instead of making any provision for women, it regarded them, since they were the cause of erotic desire, as the instrument of the Evil One.

Each of the above strengths and weaknesses you now have seen in the prior articles as we chronicled the development of pagan mysteries from nation to nation; some mysteries had some of the above religious tenants, while not all; and others had their own compliment but none included all of the above religious beliefs. Again, let us understand that these pagan mysteries were "flexible" and this ensured their success and spread throughout the peoples.

THE ORIGINAL MITHRA

Mithraism elevated the most dynamic deity of the Zoroastrian pantheon into a position of pre-eminence. Mithra was a very ancient deity; and, since he appears in the oldest myths of both Persia and India, we know that he antedated 2000 B.C.E. Although he was not an Ameshaspenta, that is, one of the original seven divine powers, he was one of the greatest creations; and he must have grown progressively with the imperial expansion under Cyrus and the Achaemenides. He was the lord of heavenly light always identified with the sun; he was the god of truth, cattle, agriculture, and the wide pastures; he was also the god of battle, the protector of the good men of Ahuramazda, and one of the judges who met all souls at the Kinvad Bridge. He was, finally, the power or agency by which Ahuramazda created mankind and all other good creatures which live upon the earth; he became the Logos, for he is called "the incarnate Word" (Mihir Yast, VII, 25). Mithra became so great that he was at last substantially equal to Ahuramazda himself; and we read in the sacred scriptures of Zoroaster: "We sacrifice unto Mithra, the lord of all countries, whom Ahuramazda made the most glorious of all the heavenly gods. So may Mithra and Ahura, the two great gods, come and give us help!" (Mihir Nyayis).

Mithra granted every benefit to the righteous and visited the wicked with condign punishment (Mihir Yast, VIII, 29); he was "victory-making, army-possessing, and all-knowing" (Ibid., ix, 35); he smote all his adversaries, the unbelievers, the creatures of Ahriman (Ibid., XIII, 59); he was the just and merciful god "whom the poor man, who follows the good law, when wronged and deprived of his rights, invokes for help, with hands uplifted" (Ibid., XXII, 84); he was the god who kept and protected his devotees in this world and gave them salvation in the next (Ibid., XXIII, 93); he required sacrifices from the faithful, who must first prepare themselves with lustrations and penitential stripes (Ibid., XXX, 122); he was the god of immortality, who confers everlasting mansions upon the true believers.

Such was the Mithra of Zoroaster.

MITHRAIC MYTH AND DOCTRINE

The new mystery-cult retained Ormazd and Ahriman, but abandoned the old Ameshaspentas and Yazatas; it accentuated the metaphysical dualism of Zoroastrianism, emphasized and re-oriented its eschatology, and absorbed a variety of foreign elements. Thus panoplied, it set forth to win dominion over the human mind.

As no Mithraic scriptures or documents are extant, our analysis of the cult must be based upon fragmentary references and upon sculptures, inscriptions, and basreliefs. All this material has been gathered into a single monumental work (Tests & Monuments, Figures, Reliefs And Mysteres Of Mithra, by Franz Cumont), from which the following reconstruct lion emerges.

THE MYTHRAIC MYTH

The new Mithra was born miraculously, in a cave, on the 25th of December; this event was witnessed only by some shepherds, who brought gifts and adored the new-born god, a mythology reproduced in Luke 2:8-20. Having grown into a sturdy youth, he set out to become the master of the earth. First he made the sun subject to his will and was therefore associated with this luminary; he was also identified with the bull, or ox, of Zoroastrianism, which it became his duty to capture and slay. He did this reluctantly, since it was the pristine creation of the good god; but the sacrifice was imperative, because from the soul of the bull arose all the celestial spheres and from his body sprang all the life of earth, including man. From the carcass of the bull grew all useful herbs; from its spinal marrow, wheat; from its blood, the grape, which furnished the wine used in the mysteries; and from its seminal fluid issued all animals serviceable to mankind. In many of the reliefs depicting the slaying of the bull, ears of grain sprout either from its body or from the wound, somewhat as was the case with the slain Osiris; and we find Mithra holding a drinking horn in his left hand and receiving a bunch of grapes from the sungod. The bull was sacrificed that mankind might have the bread of life, and Mithra drank his wine-blood eucharist.

Through identification with the slain bull, therefore, Mithra became the creator of all good creatures, and of all the beneficent things that grow upon the earth, as well as the progenitor and savior of man. But now Ahriman entered upon his role as the Great Adversary; and Mithra became the protector of all good men, of all useful creatures and herbage, as well as the mediator between Ormazd and the human race. When Ahriman sent a terrible drought that would have destroyed mankind, Mithra saved it by shooting an arrow into a rock from which copious streams of water emerged. When Ahriman sent a great flood, and later a great fire, Mithra enabled the human race to survive. His work now complete, Mithra celebrated ceremonially a Last Supper and returned to Ormazd (Heaven); but continued from the celestial mansions to protect and encourage his devotees.

MITHRAISM RETAINED DUALISM

Mithraism retained the basic cosmogony and metaphysics of Zoroastrianism; that is, it conceived of the material world as the domain of Ahriman, which Mithra had invaded to reclaim it for Ormazd. The soul of man comes from the celestial sphere, but his body from darkness. All that is physical is of Ahriman, all that is spiritual of Ormazd. All useful creatures and beneficent forces are the gifts of the latter through the agency of Mithra; all those which bring disaster or destruction are the counter-creations of Ahriman.

MITHRA THE SAVIOR/SOTER

The central element in the Mithraic myth is the slaying of the bull, which is replete with Osirian soteriology; this made of it a mystery-cult and of Mithra a savior-god. The event is depicted in countless friezes and bas-reliefs which have been found in the ruins of Mithraeums. Mithra is represented as a powerful youth thrusting his sword into the side of the sacred bull: the scorpion and the serpent, creatures of Ahriman, are depicted as attacking and attempting to drink the blood of the animal and thus to prevent the birth of mankind.

CEASELESS WARFARE BETWEEN GOOD AND EVIL

In the Mithraic system, as in the Zoroastrian, there is a constant struggle between good and evil, light and darkness, the spiritual and the physical. In this bitter war, man can hope for victory only by the ceaseless aid of Mithra, and by suppressing and mortifying his Ahrimanic nature; he must employ constantly the sacraments of baptism, lustration, and the communion of bread and wine to achieve mystical union with the god. As the slaying of the bull was the central element in the soteriology of the cult, it practiced the taurobolium in the same manner as the cult of Cybele. Initiates were placed under a grating, above which the sacred animal was ceremonially slain; thus incarnadined, the newly-inducted member was drenched and so saved in the blood of the bull.

MITHRAIC ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP

MITHRAIC CONGREGATIONS

The Mithraic congregations were not communal groups like the Pythagorean thiasoi; except that they contained no female communicants, they were quite similar to modern church congregations. Each was small, comprising perhaps a hundred members; as the number of converts increased, new units were established. Since Mithra was born in a cave, the "churches" themselves were built underground, or at least so as to simulate subterranean conditions.

THE ORDERS

Jerome informs us that the Mithraic mystic passed through seven degrees or orders (Epistle, XVII, 2), which reflect Chaldean influence. They succeeded one another as follows: Corax, or Raven, signifying a messenger; Cryphius, or Hidden, indicating esoteric; Miles, or soldier, symbolizing the warfare of good against evil; Leo, the Lion, representing fire; and then in order, Perses, Heliodromus, and Pater, or Father, which consisted of the order of priesthood.

THE INITIATION

Actual initiation into the order, however, began with the degree of Miles, when the member was branded in the forehead with the figure of a cross. Thereafter, the communicant was inducted into the higher mysteries: he took an oath never to reveal the secrets of the order and he underwent frequent purificatory lustrations. When inducted into the degree of Leo, he was purified with honey, and baptized, not with water, but with fire, as John the Baptist declared that his successor would baptize. After this second baptism, initiate. were considered participants, and they received the sacrament of bread and wine commemorating Mithra's banquet at the conclusion of his labors.

SPECULATIVE DOCTRINES

THE SOUL

Mithraism, like Platonism, taught that all souls pre-exist in the ethereal regions. At the birth of each new human being, one of these descends into a human body and by this process a portion of Ormazd is imprisoned in the cofl~n-clay of Ahriman. Only the human body, the material prison-house, perishes at death.

METAPHYSICAL DUALISM

At birth begins for every human being the great struggle between spirit and matter, light and darkness, good and evil, soul and body, the indwelling Ormazd and Ahriman, which must go on until death. Those members of mankind in whom the lower elements prevail are Children of Darkness; those in whom the higher are victorious, the Children of Light. This is the same metaphysical dualism which permeated Pythagoreanism, Essenism, and the Pauline theology, all of which called for the suppression of material, carnal, or worldly desires; in short, for an asceticism based not upon economic but upon metaphysical imperatives.

MITHRAIC ESCHATOLOGY

The eschatology of Mithraism was in part similar to but also in part different from that of Zoroastrianism. Neither had an eternal hell: but Mithraism was not universalist: again, its doctrine in this respect was that of Paul. At death, the elect souls are sent by Mithra direct to heaven; others are consigned to a con. dition of sleep until the final consummation, when Mithra will appear to reawaken them. A great and wonderful bull, like that pristine bovine, will appear; Mithra will separate the good from the bad, judge all according to the deeds they have done, slay the sacrificial bull, serve to the redeemed a final and immortalizing eucharist prepared from this animal, and send these fortunate ones to reside forever with the Elect. The terrestrial universe will then be consumed by a great conflagration in which all the wicked, including Ahriman and his demons, will be annihilated.

Mithraism, therefore, divided the human race into three classes: first, the spiritual, the Elect, the higher initiates into that cult, who were to be admitted to heaven immediately upon death; second, the wicked, the evildoers, the incorrigibly material, who will be destroyed in the final holocaust; and, third, the lesser Mithraists, who strive for the higher things but succeed only in part, and those essentially good members of mankind who have not participated in the communion. The souls of these will sleep during the ages which intervene between death and the final consummation (a doctrine later known as soul-sleeping); their grossness will then be purged away and blessed immortality conferred upon them by the ultimate eucharist.

THE DECLINE OF PERSIA AND THE HELLENIZATION [GREEK INFLUENCE] UPON ZOROASTRIANISM

Persian power gradually rose and can be considered to have peaked during the reign of Xerxes, from 486 B.C.E to 465 B.C.E. This is the time, also, when the portents of decline occured. When Xerxes' invasion of Greece failed, the military loss was of such calibre that the Persians never again undertook a major military operation against the Greek mainland - also, this signalled the defeatability of the Persian troops that had hitherto been continuously victorious. This was, however, not sufficient to dislodge the Persian Empire just yet. With Darius II Greece finally fell under Persian rule through several clever political and military actions - it was, however, not military superiority that conquered Greece, but exploitation of the Greek inter-city-state strife that allowed Persia to move in successfully. As the reign of Artaxerxes II came to a close during the last years of the 5th century B.C.E. the empire suffered a rise in anarchistic behaviours by small prinicipalities. This was, however, completely surppressed when the vicious reign of Artaxerxes III began. He crushed all rebellions and the empire reached its former glory as it had been under Xerxes little less than a hundred years earlier. This Persian dominance ended with the rise of Alexander who with his superior army of phalanx, following the assassination of his father, Philip of Macedon, began to fulfill his dream for world conquest. With the Macedonian victory at Gaugamela on October 1, 331 B.C.E. the Persian empire essentially ceased to exist. However, the reign of Alexander was short lived, and with his death in Babylon on June 13, 323 B.C.E. another series of wars arose between his generals for dominance, as Alexander had left no heirs. In less than 20 years, Seleucus succeeded in gaining control, beginning the short reign of the Seleucid empire. This, empire, however, did not include all of the Persian empire - the eastern fronteirs west of the Indus were lost, as well as small kingdoms in Media, Armenia (in the southern Caucasus), Pontus and Cappadocia. For several years, the Seleucid kings attempted to maintain the empire, but, because of its great expanse, enemies had too many points of attack that the Seleucid armies could not maintain at once. However, eventhough constant war plagued the empire, Mazdaism, and what was now the cult of Mithra - that is Mithraism - gained its Hellenistic veneer and through the Greek veins of the empire, was able to spread and properly root itself in centers in Armenia and Cappadocia. If one is to discount the ancient Aryan origins, then indeed, this is the time and place that Mithraism can be said to have it's birthing place. However, as eventhough throughout the following centuries, Mithraims maintained a thick Hellenic and Chaldaean skin, its inner mysteries remained fully Iranian in nature, and as such, the link between the Mithraism of the 4th century B.C.E. can not be severed with that of the ancient Aryan deity worship. One of the most significant Hellenic contributions of this time was that of iconography. The Mithraic preists in step with the traditions of Mazdaism and Zoroastrianism did not utilize symbolic representations of their gods. This radically changed with the advent of Hellenic influences which culminated in a distinct iconography for the Mithraic followers. It can be surmised that at this time the images of the tauroctony, that is, the bull slaying, that form one of the central scenes within the later Roman mithraeums (real or artificial cave structures in which the Roman Mithraists worshipped) were being formed. Unfotunately, as so few documents have survived on Mithraism, save the passages from Porphyry (3rd century Greek historian), Dio Christosom (2nd century Greek philosopher) and the polemics of the early church fathers, the origins and nature of many of the Mithraic images that have survived can only be analyzed in terms of educated speculation. Some images can be traced back to their origins more effectively than others; we have for instance the birthing scene of Mithra. In Armenian legends Mithra was born in a cave of a virgin mother, Anaitis - which earlier legends posited as his sexual partner, although, her personification as Ishtar, could have easily mutated in various fashions throughout the centuries; also, in Mazdian legend, as related to us by Porphyry, Mazdian was to have concecrated a special cave for the worship of Mithra; and it is known, symbollic caves were not uncommon in the ancient world. We also have the scene of the birth of Mithra from a rock or sea of water, the latter of which can be clearly traced back to Mazdian creation mythology.

THE FALL OF THE SELEUCIDS AND THE FIRST ROMAN CONTACT WITH MITHRAISM

By the mid 2nd Century B.C.E. the Seleucid empire was beginning to crumble and a general chaos began to errupt. Various districts bid for independence; the most priminent break away kingdoms was that of the Arsacids. In the east, under the leadership of Mithradates I, they wrested regions of Bactria away and in the west Media was subdued. Also, by the beginning of the first century B.C.E. the Romans began making their bids for regions on Anatolia. In the east Scythian tribes began to cleave territories away. It was not until Mithradates II and Phraates III that the empire was restored to a reasonable order. This was the Parthian Empire. However, even as it maintained the visage of an empire, there were significant structural differences between it and the Achaemenid dynasty of a few centuries before - primarily, it was much weaker, as can be seen its lack of effort in assimilating the various smaller states within the empire into a single fuctional unit, as had been done by the Achaemenids.

What are of primary interest here are four points:

- The donning of Parthian kings of composite names including the root "Mithra" exemplified the significant stature that Mithra bore in the religion. This was not only a phenomena in the east within the Parthian dynasties, but also the West in kingdoms such as that of Pontus, which was established by Mithradates I Ctistes who, during the the wars of the Diadochi (the battles of the Greek generals following Alexander's death) forged his Pontic Kingdom. The region of the Pontic Empire eventually stretched from Cappadocia, its northeastern Anatolian home to include much of Anatolia, the Crimean region, and parts of what is now southern Ukraine under the reign of Mithradates IV Eupator. Skirmishes between the Pontic kingdom and Greece marked different points in its timeline, until it was eventually conquered by Pompey in 66 B.C.E., marking the end of one of Rome's greatest adversaries.
- The Romans in their drives into Asia Minor, for the first time came significantly in contact with Mithraism. One of those contacts is recorded by Plutarch, who explained how during the Mithradatic wars between Rome and the Pontic kingdom, Cilician pirates hired themselves out to the king; some were noted to perform strange rite atop mount Olympus in praise of the god Mithra which, and Plutarch admits, were religious mysteries later preserved by the Romans. This in itself creates a hardy link between the later Romanized Mithraism and the Mithraism begotten from Mazdaism. At any rate, as can be clearly seen from the nature of Mithra himself, or Mithras as the Romans called him, he had a great appeal towards the military from his own spiritually militarisitic nature. In the Avesta he was understood as the god in whom invocation would bring victory in battle, and this without doubt, would be appealing to any soldier weighted by the mortal vicissitudes of war.
- Moreover, by this time Mithraism had reached the status of a mystery cult. Many Romans had become disillusioned by the flagrant hypocrisy and dun coloured nature of their religion and found in Mithraism a spark of eastern mysticism and power that was far more attractive.
- Roman military policy dictated that Roman legionaries not serve in a district that they were born or raised in, and were often stationed in far regions of the empire - also, Roman armies during the first century B.C.E. and the centuries during the Christian era were constantly sent to combat various foes, be it Germanic tribesman in the region of the Danube, or to quell disruption in Asia Minor, and as such often found their officers and legions intermingling. For these reasons Mithraism quickly spread through the Roman occupation armies in Asia Minor, primarily through proselytizing legionaries.

DIFFUSION OF THE FAITH OF MITHRA

As the cult of Mithra bolted throughout the channels of military command and contact it was able to quickly reach the farthest regions of the Roman Empire. Rome itself became a prominent stronghold of the faith by the first century C.E. and mithraeums can be found as far north as Britain. Also with the traffic of oriental slaves, the faith was constantly reinforced by contact with believers from the east, which bolstered the mystery status of the religion; and this also openned up the faith to non-military Roman citizens through contact with their slaves. However, in its early stages within the Roman Empire, Mithraism was primarily a cult of the poor and lower classes - essentially a solder's and slave's religion, and it wasn't until the late second and third centuries C.E. that it had reached a high enough status that imperial interest began to be noticed. But even with the initiation of emperor Commodus (C.E. 180 - 192) it was no more than a passing fancy. It wasn't until C.E. 274 that Mithraism gained a more prominent status when Aurilian declared the institution of a Roman State Cult of Sol Invictus (The Unconquerable Sun); he erected a magnificent temple to Mithra in Rome and coins of the time reflect the awesome power with which the Mithraic Unconquerable Son bore with the inscription declaring that the Sun is the Lord of the Empire. The Romans naturally associated Mithra with the sun as Mithra had since Zoroastrian times been associated with the rise of the sun - and indeed, the sun in Avestan scriptures was understood as his chariot - and now this symbolic fussion of Mithra and the Sun reflected Mithraism's final dialect - that is, it's Romanization. Finally in c. 307 Mithra's prominence within the Roman Empire was solidified by Diocletian by his public dedication to Sol Invictus Mithras, acclaiming him as "protector of the empire." However, Mithra's reign within the empire was not long - the pagan aristocracy began to fade under furthering Christian conversions and finally in 394 under Theodosius the cult all but disappeared. However, Mithraism's descent from history - eventhough it's tenets survived into the middle ages in other sects such as that of Mani (Manicaenism) would not come without its bearing its final stamp upon the world - its impression upon Christian Doctrine.

ROME AND MITHRAIC MYSTERIES

The Roman Mithraism that so spread across the stretches of the empire was a fascinating instance of a Mystery Religion. At a time when people [in Rome] were becoming disillusioned by an obviously impotent deity structure, Mithraism offered unto its adherents a sense of being in touch with an ancient arcane knowledge; by this time, all that was of oriental nature bore a great fascination - a fascination that even to this day is seen in the west. And it was less than coincidence that the later Christian Mysteries would furnish rites and understandings of the divine equally compelling to the populace throughout the Roman Provinces. By the first century C.E. Mithraism within the Empire had been spreading for several decades and by the beginning of the second century was firmly rooted within the Roman military circles. The particular synthesis that came to be known to the Romans as Mithraism owed many of it's aspects to it's earlier formations as were known to still be worhsipped within much of Anatolia, Armenia, and what was to become the Sassanid Empire. Although, the romanized version had a thick coating of Hellenic iconography, it's central tenets were wholly Mazdaic in origin; for instance:

The rendition of Mithras (as the Romans called him, as opposed to the Persian Mithra or Mihr) riding a chariot of the sun across the heavens, overseeing the world, which can be seen constantly upon numerous Roman monuments dedicated to the god, was a direct adoption of his protrayal within the Avesta.

- The Roman understanding of Mithras as a warrior
- The Roman understanding of Mitras as a mediator between the eternal god of creation and the forces of evil - was also a direct adoption from the Avestan illustration of his duties.

Indeed, unlike some have claimed that Mithras was linked to his Iranian origins by name only is a grave mistake. By the time the cult of Mithras had migrated to eastern Asia Minor, namely within Pontus and Cappadocia, and following the Macedonian triumph, the famous Mithraic scholar, F. Cumont, agrees Mithraism took on it's final forms, donning a Hellenic coat and a western visage. And it is this form that diffused throughout the Roman Empire. A primary aspect of Mithraic worship was that of the Mithraeum - that is, a grotto or cave, or as was more often the case, an underground crpyt with vaulted ceiling - represting the place of birth of Mithras. It was a tightly controlled structure insofar as the entrance of light was considered, clearly so as at key points in the liturgy control symbollic beams of light could be made to shine through. It was the place of initiation for new members into the religion and a place for members to congregate and pray together. It consisted of a narrow isle flanked on both sides by a broad raised bench on which the worshippers, rarely more than 50 in number, could kneel or recline. At one end stood the representation of Mithra slaying a bull with a raven watching from above; a dog and snake would be shown leaping into the bull's wound, and a scorpion would be shown at the bull's genitals. This symbolic icon would universally present in all Mithraeums found from the British isles to Rome. Also, this imagine of the Tauroctony would be surrouded by smaller images filled with mythical scenes or symbolic figures. The interepretation of the Tauroctony has long been a point of contention among scholars. It is known that the bull was a symbol in Zoroastrian lore, as is clearly found in the Avesta, a symbol of nature's fruitfulness; upon it's death from within it's corpse sprung out a myriad of vegitation that filled the world. Mithra's position within the Avesta as "lord of the pastures" could have been captured symbolically in this iconography as his causing the growth of the fields, just as does the sun, by killing the bull. Other scenes present within the images surrounding the Tauroctony are his springing for from a rock, shooting an arrow at a cliff to bring forth water, chasing the bull, feasting with his twelve apostles right before his ascension into the sky upon his chariot of the sun. As the Greek philosopher Porphyry relates to us, there was also a Mithraic rite utilizing honey which was connected to symbolism of great antiquity. He writes, "The Ancients moreover used to call the priestesses of Mother Earth Bees, in that they were initiates of the Terrene Goddess, and the Maid herself Bee-like. They also called the Moon the Bee, as Lady of Generation; and especially because [with the Magians] the Moon in exaltation is the Bull, and Bees are Ox-born - that is, souls coming into birth are Ox-born - and the God [Mithra] who steals the Bulls occulty signifies generation." There is a more astronomically based interpretation of the Tauroctony currently being
